For the reasons outlined in this message, I respectfully request that the Congress take appropriate action to carry out the recommendations contained herein.

77. CONGRESSIONAL AUTHORIZATION FOR THE PRESIDENT TO EMPLOY THE ARMED FORCES OF THE UNITED STATES TO PROTECT FORMOSA, THE PESCADORES, AND RELATED POSITIONS AND TERRITORIES OF THAT AREA: House Joint Resolution 159 (84th Congress, 1st Session), January 29, 1955¹

Whereas the primary purpose of the United States, in its relations with all other nations, is to develop and sustain a just and enduring peace for all; and

Whereas certain territories in the West Pacific under the jurisdiction of the Republic of China are now under armed attack, and threats and declarations have been and are being made by the Chinese Communists that such armed attack is in aid of and in preparation for armed attack on Formosa and the Pescadores,

Whereas such armed attack if continued would gravely endanger the peace and security of the West Pacific Area and particularly of Formosa and the Pescadores; and

Whereas the secure possession by friendly governments of the Western Pacific Island chain, of which Formosa is a part, is essential to the vital interests of the United States and all friendly nations in or bordering upon the Pacific Ocean; and

whereas the President of the United States on January 6, 1955,¹ submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification a Mutual Defense Treaty between the United States of America and the Republic of China,² which recognizes that an armed attack in the West Pacific area directed against territories, therein described, in the region of Formosa and the Pescadores, would be dangerous to the peace and safety of the parties to the treaty: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be and he hereby is authorized to employ the Armed Forces of the United States as he deems necessary for the specific purpose of securing and protecting Formosa and the Pescadores against armed attack, this authority to include the securing and provision of such related positions and territories of that area now in friendly hands and the taking of such other measures as he judges to be required or appropriate in assuring the defense of Formosa and the Pescadores.

This resolution shall expire when the President shall determine that the peace and security of the area is reasonably assured by international conditions created by action of the United Nations or otherwise, and shall so report to the Congress.

SECURITY COUNCIL CONSIDERATION OF THE QUESTION OF HOSTILITIES IN THE FORMOSA (TAIWAN) AREA: Remarks by the United States Representative³ Before the Security Council, January 31, 1955⁴

In the few remarks which I shall make I shall first refer to the item proposed by New Zealand⁵ and then to the item proposed by the Soviet Union.⁶

The United States favors inscribing the item proposed by New Zealand. We agree that the hostilities in the area of the Chinese offshore islands have produced a situation which endangers the maintenance of international peace and security. The present menacing situation results directly from intensified Chinese Communist military pressures against the offshore islands which began on September 3, 1954, when the Chinese Communists without warning initiated a heavy and long continued artillery barrage against Quemoy. Chinese Communist land, sea, and air assaults against the offshore islands from the Tachens to Quemoy have continued intermittently since that date. Only recently, the Chinese Communists attacked and overran the island of I-chiang, which up to then was under continuous control of the Government of the Republic of China.

The forces of the Government of the Republic of China have limited their response to these attacks to operations of a purely defensive character in the immediate vicinity designed to reduce the capacity of the Chinese Communists to continue the attacks.

The danger to the peace which exists as a result of this situation can only be removed through the cessation of hostilities.

The United States Government believes that recourse to the Security Council is desirable and therefore endorses the initiative commendably taken by the New Zealand representative in this matter.

Now, Mr. President, let me say a word about the Soviet item. The Soviet Union tells us not to interfere, if you please, in the internal affairs of another country. That is the phrase. Here it is—you can read it for yourself—from the letter signed by the Soviet representative, “the intervention of the United States of America in the internal affairs of China,” etc.

Now, Mr. President, when I hear the Soviet Union telling others not to interfere in the internal affairs of another country, I really feel that I can honestly say that I have heard everything!

Here is this Soviet regime which always interferes to the maximum extent possible in the internal affairs of all countries, which has interfered and is interfering with deadly effect and to the fullest extent of its power in the internal affairs of China—here is this regime in a tone of unction, if you please, making a charge of interference against the United States.

Now, Mr. President, it is not necessary for me to say that the United States has never interfered in the internal affairs of China and that the entire letter of the Soviet representative and the Soviet Union item is a preposterous cold war fraud.

As a matter of fact, the Soviet statement this morning committed a whole series of flagrant inaccuracies, a few of which I shall briefly correct as follows:

The message of President Eisenhower to Congress¹ does not threaten the Chinese Communists with war. There is not one aggressive syllable in it. It is purely defensive. It reflects the true views of Dwight Eisenhower, our President, who is known to his countrymen and is known all over the world as a man of peace, as a man who knows the horrors of war and who is deeply dedicated to peace.

Then the resolution passed by Congress,² and passed by almost unanimous vote, is also purely defensive. It is aimed entirely at preventing aggression.

The Mutual Security Treaty³ to which reference was made is entirely defensive. It has no aggressive or offensive potentialities whatsoever. What is aggressive in the modern world, Mr. President, is communism. There is the real aggressor. The Soviet representative knows full well that the international Communistic organization which his Government controls continues its attempts to dominate the world. He must know that if the Soviet Union were to give up its support of the international Communist movement, the greatest obstacles to organizing peace would disappear.

The Soviet representative's utterances this morning let the cat out of the bag. I say this because the Soviet Union's actions today leave no room for doubt that international communism would certainly like to take over Formosa or any other place on this earth if it could.

Now, Mr. President, in accordance with our custom, we will not oppose putting the Soviet complaint on the agenda, specious though it is. We are not afraid of a discussion. In fact, we welcome it. And we are satisfied that after we have told our story all but the hard-core professional Communists will applaud what we have done.

Our whole effort—the whole effort of the United States Government—is for peace. The world knows that we agreed to a truce in Korea,¹ to a settlement in Viet-Nam;² the world also knows, as Sir Anthony Eden once pointed out, that no one has ever been enslaved by the United States.

What the Soviet Union proposes is the standard Communist line. I doubt if many persons really believe it, least of all those who utter it and write it. I hope I will be proved wrong, but I very much fear that this latest Communist move is merely a rather obvious smoke-screen to conceal the Communist refusal to agree to a cessation of hostilities.

If the Communists really are opposed to war and violence, as their statement affirms, they can easily demonstrate it by joining the peace-loving nations of the world in supporting a cessation of hostilities. That is why we of the free world are here today.

The United States agrees that the Security Council should invite the Chinese Communist regime to send a representative to be present at the Council's discussion of the New Zealand item. We believe that in any effort to end an armed conflict to which the Chinese Communist regime is a party, it is useful for this regime to be present. This was our attitude in 1953 concerning the Korean Political Conference.³ It is also the case here and now.

Our support for this motion has no bearing whatever on the question of our opposition to the representation of China by the Chinese Communists in the United Nations or in any body thereof. Nor does our support for this motion imply any change in our established attitude against recognition of the Chinese Communist regime.

TO SEND A REPRESENTATIVE TO THE SECURITY COUNCIL
DISCUSSION OF THE FORMOSA (TAIWAN) QUESTION: Cablegram From the Secretary-General of the United Nations to the Chinese Communist Premier,¹ January 31, 1955²

I HAVE THE HONOUR TO TRANSMIT TO YOU THE FOLLOWING INFORMATION:

THE SECURITY COUNCIL AT ITS 690TH MEETING ON 31 JANUARY 1955 DECIDED TO INCLUDE THE FOLLOWING ITEMS IN ITS AGENDA:

"1. LETTER FROM THE REPRESENTATIVE OF NEW ZEALAND DATED 28 JANUARY 1955 TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE SECURITY COUNCIL CONCERNING THE QUESTION OF HOSTILITIES IN THE AREA OF CERTAIN ISLANDS OFF THE COAST OF THE MAINLAND OF CHINA (S/3354).³

"2. LETTER DATED 30 JANUARY 1955 FROM THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS ADDRESSED TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE SECURITY COUNCIL CONCERNING THE QUESTION OF ACTS OF AGGRESSION BY THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AGAINST THE PEOPLES REPUBLIC OF CHINA IN THE AREA OF TAIWAN AND OTHER ISLANDS OF CHINA (S/3355)."⁴

IN APPROVING ITS AGENDA THE COUNCIL DECIDED THAT IT WOULD COMPLETE CONSIDERATION OF THE FIRST ITEM BEFORE PROCEEDING TO DISCUSS THE SECOND.

IT FURTHER DECIDED TO EXTEND AN INVITATION TO THE CENTRAL PEOPLES GOVERNMENT OF THE PEOPLES REPUBLIC OF CHINA TO SEND A REPRESENTATIVE TO BE PRESENT IN THE COUNCIL DURING THE DISCUSSION OF THE FIRST ITEM AND TO PARTICIPATE IN THE DEBATE IN ORDER TO PRESENT THE VIEWS OF YOUR GOVERNMENT.

80. UNITED STATES ASSISTANCE TO THE REPUBLIC OF CHINA IN THE EVACUATION OF THE TACHEN ISLANDS:
Statement by the Department of State, February 5, 1955⁵

The Government of the Republic of China has informed the U.S. Government that it will redeploy its military forces from the Tachens, a group of small islands 200 miles north of Formosa, to other positions. It has requested the aid of U.S. forces in protecting and assisting the redeployment of these military forces and the evacuation of such civilians as desire to leave those islands. The U.S. Government has given orders to the Seventh Fleet and other U.S. forces to assist in this operation.

The U.S. Government has further advised the Chinese Government that with the object of securing and protecting Formosa, in conformance with the congressional resolution approved January 29, 1955,¹ the U.S. Government will extend assistance to the Republic of China in defending such related positions and territories now in its hands as the United States deems to be essential to the defense of Formosa and the Pescadores.

It is hoped that these steps will contribute to a cessation of Communist attacks and to the restoration of peace and security in the West Pacific.

1. CONDITIONS FOR UNITED STATES DEFENSE OF QUEMOY AND THE MATSU ISLANDS: Transcript of a News Conference of the Secretary of State, March 15, 1955 (Excerpt)²

At his news conference on March 15, Secretary Dulles was asked a series of questions relating to United States defense commitments in the Far East and Southeast Asia and its plans for implementing these arrangements. He was asked at the outset whether the United States would commit American forces to specific points in the area. Secretary Dulles made the following reply:

No, there has been no change in the basic U.S. policy which I announced first at Manila³ and repeated at Bangkok.⁴ That is that we believe that our most effective contribution to the defense of the entire area is by a strategic force with a high degree of striking power by sea and by air. That power is available to be used wherever the occasion arises. U.S. policy is not to split that power up into fragments of which one part is irrevocably committed, let us say, to Korea, and another part irrevocably committed to Japan, and another part irrevocably committed to the Ryukyus, and another part irrevocably committed to Formosa, and another part irrevocably committed to the Philippines, and another part irrevocably committed to various parts of Southeast Asia.

If you are going to divide our strength up, and irrevocably commit parts of it to each one of the areas which are in danger and which we are committed to help to defend, you may not have enough at the area which is attacked. We don't know where the attack is coming, and a commitment which would deprive us of the right to use our full power wherever the need arose would not, in my opinion, be in the interests of anybody involved.

Asked how this related to the possible defense of the Islands of Quemoy and Matsu, the Secretary replied:

The situation there is inherently speculative because it depends upon the intentions and purpose of the Chinese Communists. The treaty that we have with the Republic of China excludes Quemoy and Matsu from the treaty area. That was done with much thought and deliberation. Therefore, the treaty does not commit the United States to defend anything except Formosa and the Pescadores, and to deal with attacks against that treaty area.

Public Law 4,¹ which authorizes the President to use the armed forces of the United States in relation to the defense of Formosa and the Pescadores, also allows the President to use those armed forces in relation to related areas if in the opinion of the President that is necessary or appropriate for the defense of Formosa and the Pescadores.

Therefore, the issue is, would an attack on Quemoy, Matsu, perhaps elsewhere, be part of an attack against Formosa and the Pescadores? If so, then both under the treaty and under the law the President would presumably react with U.S. force. If the President judges that the attack is not related to an attack on Formosa and the Pescadores, then neither the treaty nor the law gives him authority to act.

Up to the present time the Chinese Communists have indicated that their operations in the Formosa Straits are designed against Formosa and the Pescadores. When islands such as the Tachens were taken over, they did not say, "We have now regained some islands"; they said, "We have now gained a better position from which to attack Formosa." So that as the situation now stands, on the basis of the record made by the Chinese Communists, it would seem that their operations are designed against Formosa and the Pescadores.

Because of that fact, when I was in Taipei for our consultations there,² and there were also military consultations, account was taken of the fact that it might in the future be judged by the President that the defense of Quemoy and the Matsu Islands was called for because of the intention of the Chinese Communists to make their operations an attack against Formosa. On the other hand, I don't know whether an attack will come; I don't know when it will come, it may be next week, it may be next year, it may be never. I cannot foresee or attempt to judge for myself, much less on behalf of the President, what the circumstances may be. Therefore, it is inevitable that the situation should be in some ambiguity, because, as I say, these areas are outside of the treaty area and the question of the U.S. use of force for their defense depends upon the circumstances under which an attack upon them occurs.

Secretary Dulles was asked about the statement of the British Foreign Secretary that the British were seeking to get a renunciation of force by both the Chinese Communists and the Chinese Nationalists. Is that in agreement with our position and did you discuss that with Mr. Eden, the Secretary was asked. He replied:

I made clear, as I think the President has repeatedly made clear, that we do not believe in or desire the solution to these problems to be worked out through the use of force, and that a cease-fire, which would end the actual hostilities in this area, would be welcomed by the United States. So far, there has been no evidence whatever that the Chinese Communists would accept a cease-fire, and, as you recall, they rejected an invitation to come to the United Nations Security Council to discuss that matter.¹

Asked whether the renunciation of the use of force without a renunciation of a claim, as Mr. Eden suggests, would be considered the equivalent of a cease-fire by this Government, the Secretary replied:

Well, if there were a renunciation of the use of force, that would meet the immediate requirements of the situation and there would be no necessity that I can see for anybody, either on the Republic of China's side or the Communists' side, to renounce what they might call their legal pretensions, their legal claims.

Asked what the United States position would be if an attack on Quemoy and Matsu were accompanied by renunciation of the use of force against Formosa, Secretary Dulles replied:

Well, it would depend a good bit on whether we accepted that renunciation at face value, or whether we judged it as merely a trick or a device. If in fact the President judged that there was no attack against Formosa and the Pescadores, then it would be questionable whether the treaty and the law gave authority to use the armed forces of the United States. But, as I say, we have learned before now that the Communists' protestations are not necessarily to be taken at face value.

2. DEFENSE OF THE FORMOSA (TAIWAN) AREA: Transcript of a News Conference of the Secretary of State, April 5, 1955 (Excerpt)²

At his news conference on April 5, Secretary Dulles was asked about the prospects of war or peace in the Formosa area. Secretary Dulles made the following reply:

To answer that question would require me to read the minds of people to whom I have no access; that is, the Communist leaders in Peiping. We have made perfectly clear our desire that there shall be no war, our desire that there shall be a cease-fire. So, if there is any war, it will be entirely due to the provocation and initiative of those who unfortunately may not be subject to the pacific purpose which they proclaim. If, in fact, the Chinese Communists are faithful to what they talk about—peace—then there will be no fighting in the area.

Asked whether the release of the Chinese students on April 2¹ was intended as an indication of our preference for peace rather than war, the Secretary replied:

In a broad sense you can say that it was indicative of our desire to keep our relations with the Chinese Communists on, you might call, a civilized, peaceful basis. We did not desire to be in a position of holding any persons as hostages, and in fact they have never been so held. We have pushed ahead to complete the process of clearances, including the necessary legal steps which have to be taken, I believe, by the Department of Justice. As soon as those were completed, we announced these people were free to go.

In the same way, we recently turned back at Hong Kong seven Communist fishermen that had been picked up in a storm and rescued. In some quarters the suggestion had been made that we should hold them as a barter. We do not believe in bartering human beings, and we hope that our conduct and example in that regard might possibly have some influence in Communist China.

Asked whether this was done at the suggestion or request of Mr. Hammarskjold, Mr. Dulles replied:

No. Mr. Hammarskjold is dealing only with the prisoners of war who were in the United Nations Command, and he has not concerned himself particularly about the civilian situation. As far as I am aware, Mr. Hammarskjold was not informed about the steps we were taking to release these civilians. He was informed of the steps which we took to release the seven fishermen that I referred to. That took place some weeks ago.

Asked whether any new steps had been taken or if any were in prospect to find a common allied position with regard to Formosa either through diplomatic channels or through the United Nations, Secretary Dulles replied:

We are in close contact with the nations having an interest in that part of the world, and we have frequent discussions with their representatives. There is a very active exchange of advice steadily going on with reference to this situation. We all realize it is a highly dangerous situation, and we want to eliminate to the maximum degree possible the dangerous elements there. Whether we shall succeed or not, as I said before, depends very largely upon whether the Chinese Communists are willing to have an abandonment of force.

Asked to comment on the fact that the Canadians have stated publicly that they would not back us if war comes out of Quemoy and Matsu and whether that represented a divided allied position, the Secretary replied:

No. On the contrary, as a result of my trip up there there is a much closer understanding between our two Governments than had existed before. We have never expected that if there were a war in the Formosa area the Canadian Government would be a participant in that war. They have no treaty arrangements of any kind which relate to that part of the world, and that kind of support has never been anticipated. I think there is now an understanding of the problem and that our relations in that respect are much better than they have been before.

Asked whether he believed that the overall world position of the United States would necessarily be weakened or might in fact be strengthened if the United States were to base its commitments in the Formosa area exclusively upon Formosa and the Pescadores, the Secretary replied:

I have said many times, and I am glad to have a chance to say again, something which I can repeat by heart: The only commitment of the United States in that area is based exclusively on Formosa and the Pescadores.

We have a treaty which confines the treaty area to Formosa and the Pescadores.¹ We have a law which says that the armed forces of the United States can be used in that part of the area for the defense of Formosa and the Pescadores.² We have no commitment of any kind, sort, or description, expressed or implied, which binds the United States to anything except the defense of Formosa and the Pescadores.

Now you get to the question—if there seems to be an attack against Formosa and the Pescadores, how do you defend against that attack? That is the only question. Some people say that we should announce in advance precisely how we are going to defend and carry out our commitment on Formosa and the Pescadores and to say we will carry out that commitment by doing this or by not doing that. Once you extend your commitment to defend Formosa to a commitment as to particular means which you may use for defense, then you are getting into very difficult ground. We have a commitment, certainly, to defend the United States of America. But nobody yet has required us to state publicly precisely what the means would be of defense in the event of certain types of attack which cannot be predicted. I repeat—again and again and again—that our only commitment is to defend Formosa and the Pescadores and if there were no challenge to Formosa and the Pescadores, then there wouldn't be any question as far as we are concerned of fighting in that area.

Asked if he were saying in that connection that we would not aid the Chinese Nationalists to defend Quemoy and Matsu for the sake of Chinese Nationalist morale, Mr. Dulles replied:

Unless that were vital for the defense of Formosa and the Pescadores. It all comes back to that.

83. RELAXING TENSION IN THE FORMOSA (TAIWAN) AREA: Statement by the Department of State, April 23, 1955¹

The Department of State has received press reports concerning the statement of Chou En-lai at the Bandung conference.² The United States always welcomes any efforts, if sincere, to bring peace to the world. In the Formosa region we have an ally in the free Republic of China, and of course the United States would insist on free China participating as an equal in any discussions concerning the area.

If Communist China is sincere, there are a number of obvious steps it could take to clear the air considerably and give evidence before the world of its good intentions. One of these would be to place in effect in the area an immediate cease-fire. It could also immediately release the American airmen and others whom it unjustly holds. Another could be the acceptance of the outstanding invitation by the Security Council of the United Nations to participate in discussions to end hostilities in the Formosa region.³

84. POSSIBILITY OF NEGOTIATING A CEASE-FIRE ARRANGEMENT: Transcript of a News Conference of the Secretary of State, April 26, 1955⁴

Q. Mr. Secretary, would you agree with Senator George that the United States should sit down and talk with Red China even though Nationalist China might not be present?

A. That depends on what we talk about and whether there is evidence that such talks would be held in good faith on both sides. We are not going to talk about the interests of the Republic of China behind its back.

² Statement of Apr. 23, 1955: "The Chinese people are friendly to the American people. The Chinese people do not want to have war with the United States of America. The Chinese Government is willing to sit down and enter into negotiations with the United States Government to discuss the question of relaxing tension in the Far East and especially in the Taiwan area" (New York Times, Apr. 24, 1955, p. 1).

⁴ Department of State Bulletin, May 9, 1955, pp. 755-759.

Q. Mr. Secretary, I believe you said you would try to find out if the Communists are sincere. What steps do you have in mind to do that?

A. There are inquiries that we can make through friendly governments to find out what the Communists have in mind. For example, the statement as made by Chou En-lai the last day at Bandung is somewhat cryptic in that he said in substance that no conference should deny the sovereign right of the People's Republic to "liberate" Taiwan. If that means that the Communists are not prepared to talk about a cease-fire in the area, if they are not willing to give up the achievement of their ambitions through force, then obviously there would be no reason that I can see to talk with them.

Q. Mr. Secretary, in the light of what you said this morning, are we right in assuming that the conditions, or what seem to be conditions, in the Saturday statement of the State Department¹ are not regarded by you as conditions prior to discussion with the Chinese Communists?

A. There are two paragraphs in the State Department release, as I recall. The first paragraph said in substance that we would not discuss a disposal of the area in the absence of the Chinese Nationalists. That stands as a precondition. We are not going to deal with the rights of the Chinese Nationalists, and their claims, in their absence.

Now, the other paragraph mentions certain things which it said would clear the air and be evidence of sincerity. Those are not stated as conditions precedent. It said that it would be helpful if the Chinese Communists would release our flyers, etc. Those things were not stated as conditions and were never intended to be conditions. They are very much like what the President and I often said in relation to the rulers of the Soviet Union—that it would be very helpful evidence of their sincerity if they would do certain things such as signing the Austrian treaty. That was one of the things mentioned 2 years ago by the President in his "Chance for Peace" address.² Nevertheless, that was never regarded as an indispensable prerequisite to talking with the Soviet Union. Actually, before any Austrian treaty, I did meet with the Soviet Union at Berlin.³

Q. Mr. Secretary, did you see the statement or approve the statement before it was issued on Saturday?

A. No, I was away. When I get away I am really away, up there.

Q. Mr. Secretary, there is a report that the statement was very badly received by our friends and elsewhere in the free world. Will you comment on that?

A. No, except I am not aware of the fact.

Q. Mr. Secretary, would official talks, as proposed by the Chinese Communists, be tantamount to a semirecognition of the Red Government?

¹ Statement of Apr. 23, 1955; supra.

³ i. e., the Berlin Foreign Ministers meeting of Jan. 25-Feb. 18, 1954.

A. No, we have made that perfectly clear when we talked to them before. Remember that it would be nothing new for us to talk with the Chinese Communists. We negotiated the armistice in Korea¹ with the Chinese Communists. We had some discussions with the Chinese Communists at Geneva.² We made it perfectly clear on both occasions, in fact, it was said explicitly in the Berlin resolution which convoked the Geneva conference,³ that the fact that we met together would not involve diplomatic recognition. Of course that would also be explicit in any further talks we had.

Q. Mr. Secretary, would you be willing to undertake direct negotiations with the Chinese Communists providing they agreed to participation of Nationalist China, or would you prefer that they be held under the auspices of the United Nations?

A. We believe it to be preferable that negotiations should be held under the auspices of the United Nations, and I do not give up hope that they might be held under those auspices. I read last night, the first time I had a chance to do so, the final communiqué of the Bandung conference.⁴ What impressed me, as I read through it, was the extent to which that communiqué talks about the United Nations. Almost every paragraph brings in the United Nations and the various activities of the United Nations. Since that communiqué was acceptable to the Chinese Communists, perhaps they do not have such a repugnance to the United Nations as seemed to be the case when last January they were invited by the United Nations to have discussions.⁵

Q. Mr. Secretary, are you planning to take any steps to revive the United Nations effort in this matter?

A. I doubt whether it is useful to revive the United Nations effort at this particular juncture without preliminaries to find out if it would be apt to succeed.

Q. Mr. Secretary, do we definitely plan to make these inquiries through friendly governments? I think you said we might.

A. I said we might because these matters all require a certain amount of deliberation. What was said at Bandung is coming in gradually—some I only got this morning, in fact, from some of the friendly governments. Therefore, we have not had an opportunity yet to formulate anything so definite that I could speak in the past tense, as of something already decided.

Q. Mr. Secretary, do you attach any significance to the fact that the Chinese Communists proposed bilateral negotiations with us and that the Russians not long ago proposed a 10-power conference to discuss the same matter, or the Formosa issue?

A. I noticed that fact, and I thought it had a certain significance.

Q. Which would you prefer?

A. Well, I found quite unacceptable the Soviet proposal for a 10-power conference with the composition suggested and with the omission of the Chinese Nationalists from that group. Much depends on what it is you are going to discuss—the subject matter of the conference. The agenda, so to speak, itself operates to determine to a considerable extent who it is that ought to be there. So far we are very much in the dark as to what might be discussed.

Q. Mr. Secretary, does that mean you would not rule out bilateral talks? You would not rule it out?

A. No.

Q. Mr. Secretary, you started to say you would attach some significance to this, and then you did not say what significance you would attach—

A. It tends to confirm the fact that in this area the Chinese Communists exercise, I think, a measure of independence. I think that their basic policies are undoubtedly coordinated with the Soviet Union and that the Party discipline is exerted in both countries along fundamental lines. But certainly as respects details, the application of agreed principles, there is a far greater measure of independence exercised by the Chinese Communists than is the case with reference to the satellite countries of Europe, for example.

Q. Mr. Secretary, in the Chou En-lai proposal he spoke not only of the specific Formosa problem but of the general Far East problem. Is it your view that our position is that we should settle the Formosan problem before we get into a larger discussion with Communist China, or is it possible to have a larger discussion in which Formosa can be a part of it?

A. The first thing, it seems to me, that requires to be determined is whether we must prepare for war in that area or whether there is apt to be a cease-fire in the area. One cannot very well settle matters under the threat of a gun. So far there has been nothing but war threats in the area. There has been and there is still continuing a very large buildup, particularly of Chinese Communist air capabilities, in the Formosa Straits area. There has been until quite recently a very violent propaganda campaign to the effect that they were going to take Formosa by force and that the islands, such as Tachen, were useful to carry out their program of force. As I say, you do not negotiate—at least, the United States does not negotiate—with a pistol aimed at its head.

The first thing is to find out whether there is a possibility of a cease-fire in the area. That is a matter which can be discussed perhaps bilaterally, or at the United Nations, or possibly under other circumstances. But I regard a cease-fire as the indispensable prerequisite to anything further. When you get into further matters, then the interests of the Chinese Nationalists would naturally come to play a very large part.

Q. Mr. Secretary, have the Nationalist Chinese accepted the concept of a cease-fire? Are they prepared to accept a cease-fire in that area?

A. They have indicated opposition to a cease-fire in the area, and in that respect our views do not wholly coincide. At the time when New Zealand put this matter on the agenda of the Security Council, there was, as I recall, a statement issued by the Chinese Nationalists indicating they did not favor a cease-fire in the area.

Q. Mr. Secretary, you said that, after discussing the cease-fire, in other matters the interests of the Chinese Nationalists would play a part. Do I understand correctly from what you said that the presence of the Chinese Nationalists would not be indispensable for the discussion of a cease-fire?

A. Not as far as concerns a cease-fire which involved the possible interests of the United States, which has undertaken to react to an attack against Formosa. If we could get assurances there was to be no attack against Formosa, we would accept those.

Q. Mr. Secretary, it has been suggested that the move by the Chinese Communists—by Chou En-lai at Bandung—did not come as a complete surprise but in fact you had some information, or at least expectations of it—that it figured in your discussions with the President in Augusta and it may perhaps have played some part in the mission of Assistant Secretary of State Robertson and Admiral Radford at Formosa.¹

A. I would say this: It is no secret that we have hoped that the Bandung conference² would result in a more peaceful attitude on the part of the Chinese Communists. I have sometimes said that I felt that a great deal would depend, as far as the future is concerned, on whether the Chinese Communists came away from Bandung feeling that they had a green light to go ahead and take Formosa by force or whether they felt that to do so would antagonize the good will of the free Asian countries which they were seeking.

It is that thought which influenced us as far back as the Bangkok conference. There, you may recall, was introduced a resolution of greeting to the Bandung conference³ and an expression at that time of the hope that the Bandung conference would set in motion forces for peace. After I was at Augusta with the President, you may recall that I said then that the President hailed the Bandung conference and called on it to "exert a practical influence for peace where peace is now in grave jeopardy."⁴ We have all along believed that if the Chinese Communists would get in contact with the opinion of the free peoples, the free nations of Asia, they would realize much more fully than they have so far that their policy of relying upon force, the policy to which I alluded in the opening statement,¹ was a policy which it was not in their best interests to follow.

I don't think that there occurred any moral or spiritual conversion on the part of the Chinese Communists. But I do think that there may have been a realization of the fact that a real peacefulness, instead of just talk about peace while carrying on war, was from their standpoint the best policy. If that has happened, it is something which we can be very glad about.

Q. Mr. Secretary, do you attribute these encouraging developments to Mr. Hammarskjöld's negotiations?

A. I doubt if there is any discernible relationship between the two.

Q. I just wanted further clarification of my question as to whether these considerations played a part in the mission of Admiral Radford and Secretary Robertson in Formosa.

A. They played a part, although I would not say a decisive part.

Q. Mr. Secretary, how much are you able to tell us this morning about the mission of Admiral Radford and Secretary Robertson?

A. Very little, other than to say that the situation in that area has been precarious. We did not know whether it would take a turn for the better or the worse as a result of the Bandung conference. I have referred already to the buildup that is proceeding on the China mainland, which has very distinct military implications, some of which in turn have political implications. In view of that it seemed useful to have another high-level talk and to have Assistant Secretary of State Robertson and Admiral Radford canvass the political and military aspects of the situation in the Formosa Straits in the light of new developments which had occurred. It was a general, overall review of the factors, political and military, and it seemed useful to carry that on in a personal, direct way at a high level, such as has been done, rather than depend upon cable communication, which in these matters is not always satisfactory.

Q. Mr. Secretary, could you persuade them to be a little more friendly to the idea of a cease-fire?

A. I can't add to what I have said except to say this—Secretary Robertson and Admiral Radford did not go out there with the idea of exerting any coercive pressures upon the Chinese Nationalists. They went over to sit down together as allies, as partners, to discuss the situation that is developing. I must say frankly that I do not yet know fully today what the outcome of their discussions has been.

Q. You would like to have the Nationalists be more receptive to the idea of a cease-fire?

A. There has been no secret of the fact that the United States has hoped for a cease-fire in the area. The President made that perfectly clear in his message to the Congress.¹ That was last January when he spoke of what we then thought was the most hopeful route of action before the United Nations to bring about a cease-fire and the acceptance of a principle of the United Nations that nations should renounce force to accomplish their objectives. There has been some difference of viewpoint between the Chinese Nationalists and ourselves with respect to that matter, but I am not in a position to say to what extent that was discussed at Taipei or what the result was, because I haven't heard.

Q. Mr. Secretary, do I understand you correctly that it would be possible for us to accept a declaration from the Chinese Communists as to their willingness to agree to a cease-fire without participation of the Chinese Nationalists in any such declaration?

A. I think the United States would welcome an assurance of the abandonment of force by the Chinese Communists in whatever way it came.

Q. Should it be made a public statement?

A. I think it should be public, for unless it was made public we would not have the adequate sanction of the weight of public opinion behind it.

Q. Mr. Secretary, can you get it down to this: Do we consider it our turn now to get in touch with the Chinese Communists, or do we consider that we must hear more from the Chinese Communists about this peace conference that Chou En-lai originally proposed?

A. I don't know about this question of whose "turn" it is. However, I would say this: When the issues are as grave as those that confront us in the Formosa area, we are not disposed to stand upon protocol.

A proposal has been made which may or may not be sincere, which may or may not have any substance to it. We believe that the circumstances under which it was made are apt to give it a greater degree of credibility than perhaps if it had been made under other circumstances. It was made to and in the presence of a very large group of other countries, made to them first privately and then it was made publicly. Therefore, a statement made under those conditions carries greater weight than if, for example, it had been a pure propaganda statement issued by Peiping radio sometime.

Now, since a statement was made under those circumstances, we are disposed to try to probe it further. As to the order of events, if we should get a further clarification which would come spontaneously from the Chinese Communists, that would be well and good. But we shall not merely sit around and wait on that. We may probe the thing ourselves to find out if it has any substance.

As I say, there was an ambiguous phrase about their sovereign right to "liberate" Formosa which could not be any way impaired. Now, I have said previously that we would not expect the parties to this struggle, whether the Chinese Nationalists or the Chinese Communists, to renounce their ambitions. We don't expect that to be done any more than we expect that to happen in the case of Germany or Korea or Viet-Nam. But even though they retain their ambitions—retain their claims—they might renounce the use of force to satisfy their claims and their ambitions. Now I don't know whether what Chou En-lai said was intended to be responsive to what I had previously said on that phase of the matter, or not. That is one of the things which I think deserves further exploration.

Q. Can you tell us what are the mechanics, what you are doing to find out, what is happening as far as our Government is concerned? Mohammed Ali, the Pakistan Premier, this morning reported he had a conversation with Chou and that Chou En-lai told him the door was still open a crack. Also, Chou En-lai told him he felt there was a possibility of successful negotiation, or implied that. He also said Chou En-lai made to him what he regarded as a reasonable proposition for the settlement of the present crisis. He didn't give the details. Have you asked Mohammed Ali to tell you what the details are or asked him to give the reaction of the U. S. to this conversation? What are we doing? That is what I want to know.

A. I thought I had made clear, in answer to a prior question, that we have not yet done anything—that the information which is prerequisite to sober, intelligent action is only beginning to come in. Only a few minutes ago did we receive word through the Pakistan Embassy of what you refer to, and we have not yet collected all the relevant data. Until we have all the relevant data we are not going to go off doing things.

Q. Mr. Secretary, why should you insist that this evidence of sincerity should be made public? Would you be satisfied with assurance given through diplomatic channels, shall we say, by private diplomacy?

A. Well, that is a hypothetical question and I wouldn't want to respond categorically to it. But it does not seem to me that it is possible to make plans on the assumption that there will be a cease-fire in the area unless we can let it be known. It affects all of our own thinking and all of our own planning and the planning of the Chinese Nationalists, and it is quite incredible to me that there should be a secret agreement to have a cease-fire. I would think it would be quite a problem as to how to keep it secret.

85. NEGOTIATIONS WITH COMMUNIST CHINA FOR A CEASE-FIRE ARRANGEMENT IN THE FORMOSA (TAIWAN) AREA: Statement by the Secretary of State at a News Conference, July 26, 1955¹

Last April at the Bandung conference Mr. Chou En-lai suggested that there should be bilateral talks with the United States. He said, "The Chinese people do not want to have war with the United States. We are willing to settle international disputes by peaceful means."

Immediately (on April 23, 1955) the Department of State responded by stating that "the United States always welcomes any efforts, if sincere, to bring peace to the world."² Then at my subsequent press conference (April 26, 1955) I referred to Mr. Chou En-lai's statement and said, "Whether or not that was a sincere proposal remains to be seen. Perhaps the Chinese Communists are merely playing a propaganda game. But we intend to try to find out. In doing so we shall not, of course, depart from the path of fidelity and honor to our ally, the Republic of China."³

Developments since then indicate the possibility of obtaining beneficial results from a continuance of the talks which have been going on at Geneva for the past year and their restoration to the original ambassadorial level.

Four out of the 15 United Nations prisoners of war have been released.⁴ A few more United States civilians have been released. These results, though meager, are something. Chinese Communist warlike activities, such as had been displayed in relation to I-chiang and Tachen,⁵ have not been resumed and there has been something approximating a de facto cease-fire in the Taiwan (Formosa) area. The former belligerent Communist propaganda about Taiwan and against the United States has recently been somewhat subdued.

In addition, various governments which have diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China have indicated their own belief in the desire of the Chinese Communists to pursue a peaceful path.

Under these circumstances the United States proposed on July 11 to Mr. Chou En-lai that the talks that had been going on at Geneva, recently at the consular level, should be somewhat raised in level and enlarged in scope. This proposal was made through the intermediary of the United Kingdom, which represents the interests of the United States in Communist China. There was prompt acceptance of this proposal and, after the date was agreed to, a mutually agreed communiqué with reference to it was arrived at and simultaneously issued in Peiping and in Washington yesterday morning.⁶

It was made clear that the offer of the United States did not imply any diplomatic recognition whatsoever. It was also made clear that we were not prepared in any way in these talks to make arrangements which would prejudice the rights of our ally, the Republic of China.

The United States will be represented at Geneva on August 1 by our Ambassador to Czechoslovakia, U. Alexis Johnson. It was Ambassador Johnson who represented the United States in the Geneva talks with the Chinese Communists when these talks first began a year ago.¹ Prior to that, as a Departmental officer, he devoted himself largely to the Korean Armistice negotiations.

The United States is concerned with getting back the American civilians still detained in Communist China. In this connection we are prepared to discuss with the Chinese Communists the status of the few Chinese students in the United States who desire to return to Communist China and who the Chinese Communists claim, without foundation, are prevented.

We also want to reinforce the efforts of the United Nations to get back the Americans who as members of the United Nations Command in Korea became prisoners of war and are still held by the Chinese Communists.

As to other practical matters which might be considered, the United States would like to be sure of precautions taken against a repetition of such incidents as involved the shooting down of the Cathay airliner with loss of American lives and injury to American civilians.²

Of course, the basic thing is that which I pointed out in my press conference of April 26, namely, "whether we must prepare for war in that area or whether there is apt to be a cease-fire in the area."³

The United States believes that whatever may be the differences which now divide countries, these differences should not be settled by recourse to force where this would be apt to provoke international war. The United States has itself consistently acted on that belief. Whenever we give any military assistance, it is under the explicit condition that it will not be used for aggressive purposes. There is no doubt but what East Germany is part of Germany, but Chancellor Adenauer has given solemn assurance that he will not use force to unite his country.⁴ There is no doubt that North Korea is a part of Korea, but the security treaty which we made with the Republic of Korea⁵ makes clear that the United States will not extend its protection other than to areas which we recognize as having been lawfully brought under the jurisdiction of the Republic of Korea, and we do not believe that aggressive force is such a lawful means. There is no doubt but that North Viet-Nam is part of Viet-Nam, but we stated in connection with the Indochina armistice that we were opposed to any renewal of aggression to bring about the unification of Viet-Nam.⁶

Both the Republic of China and the Chinese People's Republic claim that the area held by the other is part of China. But in connection with the mutual security treaty which the United States made with the Republic of China,¹ it was agreed that the Republic of China would not use force except as a matter of joint agreement, subject to action of an emergency character which was clearly an exercise of the inherent right of self-defense.²

We believe that the principle of nonrecourse to force is valid not merely for the United States and its allies but that it is valid for all.

We shall hope to find out in the forthcoming talks whether the Chinese Communists accept the concept of a cease-fire in accordance with the United Nations principle of avoiding any use or threat of force which could disturb the peace of nations.

No doubt the Chinese Communists will have matters of their own to bring up. We shall listen to hear what they are, and if they directly involve the United States and Communist China we will be disposed to discuss them with a view to arriving at a peaceful settlement.

As President Eisenhower said last night,

... the United States will go to any length consistent with our concepts of decency and justice and right to attain peace. For this purpose we will work cooperatively with the Soviets and any other people as long as there is sincerity of purpose and a genuine desire to go ahead.³

That is the principle which will govern the continuation of our talks with the Chinese Communists at Geneva.

86. NEGOTIATION OF A BROAD CEASE-FIRE ARRANGEMENT IN THE FORMOSA (TAIWAN) AREA: Transcript of a News Conference of the Secretary of State, August 2, 1955 (Excerpt)⁴

At his news conference on August 2, Secretary Dulles was asked a series of questions regarding the ambassadorial talks at Geneva between the United States and the People's Republic of China. Following is a transcript of that portion of the news conference.

Q. Mr. Secretary, are there any obstacles presently on the return of Chinese in this country to the mainland, and do you know of any case of any Chinese here who have been prevented from returning?

A. No, there are no restrictions whatsoever on the return to China of any of these Chinese here, particularly students, who have expressed a desire to return, and we have tried to ascertain who of them does desire to return. Now Mr. Chou En-lai in his speech the day before yesterday, I think it was, or 3 days ago, said something about financial difficulties.¹ I can't answer whether any of them are in such financial difficulties that they haven't got the money to pay their fare home. That is a question which will no doubt be looked into as a result of the talks taking place at Geneva. But as far as any legal impediments are concerned, I can say categorically that there are none.

Q. Mr. Secretary, about how many of these students are there who want to return to China? You said last week that there were a few.

A. It is in the general order of under 50. I am sorry I don't have the precise number in my mind.

Q. Mr. Secretary, in that statement of Chou En-lai's, he reiterated an argument that he made before, namely, that there was no point in discussing a cease-fire with the United States, since there is no shooting between the two countries. You have taken the point of view, I believe, that the cease-fire is a matter of discussion. How do you reconcile those differing views?

A. I would gather that Mr. Chou En-lai is using that word in a rather technical sense, whereas I have used it in a broad sense. It is quite true that there is no fighting going on at the moment between the Chinese Communists and the United States military forces in the area. On the other hand, there has been very considerable danger of such fighting. And what I have wanted to bring about was an assurance that the Chinese Communists were not planning to use military force in order to achieve their ambitions in that area.

I made that quite clear, I think, in several statements which I have made, and particularly in the statement which I made last week.² I was very glad to note that Mr. Chou En-lai quoted with apparent approval one statement which I had made to the general effect that whatever were the differences which divided countries it should not be sought to resolve that difference by use of force, and I thought in general the tone of the speech indicated his going further in the renunciation of force than anything he had said before.

Q. In other words, if I might follow that, what you are seeking is not a cease-fire in the terms that perhaps most Americans have been thinking about between the Nationalists and the Chinese but something much broader, in terms of perhaps a U.N. Charter declaration, between the Chinese Communists and the United States?

A. That is correct. And also you must bear in mind that a display of military activity there by the Chinese Communists which was designed to possess themselves by force of Formosa would bring into play our treaty of defense with the Republic of China.

Q. Mr. Secretary, could the United States give the Chinese Communists assurances in any such discussions that the Chinese Nationalists would not engage in force?

² Statement of July 26, 1955; supra.

A. I think that the treaty arrangements which we have with the Republic of China make it quite clear that it is in our mutual contemplation that force shall not be used.¹ The whole character of that treaty is defensive. That is underlined throughout the treaty itself and in the concurrent understandings that were arrived at in that connection; so while the United States would not feel that it was in a position to act as in any sense an agent for the Republic of China, nevertheless I do think that the whole pattern that has been woven there by the United States is in itself evidence that we accept for ourselves, and in our alliances seek to make it a principle of those alliances, that force shall not be used to achieve national ambitions. That is the same principle which we invoke and which we hope will guide the Chinese Communists, and we naturally accept it for ourselves. As you probably know, all of the agreements under which we give military assistance to various countries are very explicit in their provisions that the equipment shall not be used for any aggressive purpose.

Q. Mr. Secretary, does this also apply to the South Korean declaration of today, I believe it is, that they wish to recover areas below the 38th parallel, including Kaesong and the Ongjin Peninsula? ²

A. It would apply equally to that, yes.

Q. Mr. Secretary, you have said that you don't expect the idea of a broader no-shooting arrangement to come about out of these current Geneva talks. Do you envisage a high-level talk or how do you expect to bring this about?

A. I would expect this to come about primarily as a declaration of policy which leaders or the rulers of a country would make rather than as the subject of a bilateral agreement.

Q. Mr. Secretary, will you elaborate a little more on this broader agreement relating to a cease-fire? Just how do you expect it to evolve? Does it have a U.N. connection, for example?

A. No. What we hope to arrive at by progressive steps is a situation where the Chinese Communists will have renounced the use of force to achieve their ambitions. That is the thing I have been emphasizing and driving at for months because, if they are not willing to do that, if they want to use force to achieve their ambitions, that will almost surely start up a war the limits of which could not be defined in advance. How that is brought about I don't know. That is a matter of policy for the Chinese Communists. I don't know how they will choose to make that clear, if indeed they do make it clear. I already have said that the speech of Chou En-lai of last Friday went further in that direction than anything that he has yet said. I hope that what is taking place either at Geneva or outside of Geneva, and the whole trend of world events, will create a situation o that we can feel that we are not under the threat of war from the situation in that area. I said in my press conference of April 26,¹ you may remember, that the United States was not willing to negotiate with a pistol at its head; that the first thing to do is to find out whether there was a threat of war there because, if that was the case, then as far as the United States is concerned it would be quite impossible to negotiate these practical matters.

I pointed out last week that a number of things had happened which indicated that the pistol had been laid down and that it made it possible to try to clear up now some of these practical matters between us. But the important thing is that the pistol should be permanently discarded, and we hope that the trend of events will bring reassurance on that point.

Q. Mr. Secretary, in connection with the Communists laying down their pistol, is there any relation between that and SEATO, the Southeast Asia defense alliance?

A. Obviously the laying down of the pistol is applicable to the situation in Indochina as well as to the situation in the Formosa straits. We have there a series of armistice agreements² which purport to bring the fighting there to an end. Obviously any resumption of that fighting would be violating the principle to which we have alluded.

Q. We would not be willing, for instance, to trade a declaration by the Reds abandoning the use of force for our abandoning SEATO, or disbanding SEATO?

A. Absolutely not, any more than we would be prepared to abandon the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. We are absolutely convinced that these collective security organizations are in the interest of peace. We know that they are defensive in purpose and in spirit, and we believe that they are in harmony with the general trend of the times which brings every community to organize itself on a collective security basis. The old days when each had to defend his own home with his own gun have passed. We have a central police force; we have a central fire department. The whole idea of getting security through collective action rather than individual action is in our opinion a tremendous advance. Now the Soviets and Communists seem to take the view that each country should stand alone on its own feet, that there shouldn't be any collective organizations for security. We believe that is turning the clock back to go in that direction, and we are not disposed to turn the clock back by dismantling either NATO or the so-called SEATO, the Manila Pact.³

I explained that at Geneva.⁴ I said this North Atlantic Treaty Organization isn't anything directed against the Soviet Union. If there weren't any Soviet Union in the world today it would be almost as important because it ties together, it integrates, these nations who make up its membership in a way which makes it most unlikely and impractical that any one of them shall assume an offensive nationalistic action of its own. That is its essential value. As I say, even if so-called tensions between the East and West were totally resolved, I believe that this type of organization should persist and that that marks the enlightened future which we should seek.

Q. Mr. Secretary, do you think that parallel with an easier relationship with the Soviet Union there is now developing an easier relationship with Red China? Is that the import of much that you have said?

A. The release of the fliers, the release of the civilians, if it comes about, such statements as are made by Chou En-lai, if I interpret them right and if they are sincere and permanent parts of policy, might mark the beginning of a new phase in Chinese Communist relations with the rest of the world. I pointed out some time ago that the Chinese Communists seem to be much more violent and fanatical, more addicted to the use of force than the Russians are or have become. Whether or not there is going to be a change in that respect I don't know. There are some auguries, but we always have to remember the adage that one swallow does not make a summer.

The Problem of United States Nationals Detained in Communist China

87. IMPRISONMENT OF UNITED STATES NATIONALS BY CHINESE COMMUNIST AUTHORITIES: Statement by the Department of State, May 21, 1951 ¹

The Department of State has been extremely concerned for an extended period of time over the imprisonment by Chinese Communist authorities of a number of American nationals, now believed to number more than 30. At least some are definitely known to have been allowed no communication with anyone outside. In most cases, the local Chinese Communist authorities have given no explanation of the arrests or any information concerning the welfare or whereabouts of the persons arrested. Access has been denied to legal counsel and to British officials, who have been representing American interests in Communist China since the closure of our consulates. This Government has been in constant communication on this subject with the British Government.

On April 30, the British Chargé d'Affaires at Peiping, acting on instructions of the Foreign Office, made representations to the responsible Chinese Communist authorities at Peiping on behalf of all Americans arrested, as well as the United Kingdom, Canadian, and Australian nationals under arrest. He appealed to these authorities to take appropriate steps to permit those imprisoned to have access to legal counsel and to friends outside. It was hoped that their speedy release would be effected, on humanitarian no less than on equitable grounds. No reply has yet been received by the British Government from the Chinese Communist authorities.

The Department of State has also been concerned for some time over the continued denial by Chinese Communist authorities of exit permits to certain Americans, including a number of Shanghai businessmen, some of whom have been endeavoring for over a year to leave China. Arbitrary refusal to permit aliens to depart from a country is of course a violation of the elementary principles of international law and practice.

88. DETENTION OF UNITED STATES NATIONALS: Statement by the Department of State, December 12, 1951¹

The Department has for some time been concerned about detention of Americans by officials of the Chinese Communist regime.² Meanwhile information on the general situation in which Americans in Communist China find themselves has been made available to any who inquire.

The Department, however, has refrained from making individual names public. It has advised the relatives or associates of persons detained that publicity in individual cases was a matter for their decision and it has not discouraged those who wished to give publicity to the arrests.

The Department has refrained from publicizing the names and specific situations of those persons or all of the action the Department has taken in their behalf for two major reasons: (1) requests of relatives or associates of the person concerned that no publicity be given for fear of jeopardizing the person's welfare; and (2) warnings by countries assisting in making representations to the Chinese Communists that in their opinion official publicity, particularly during the period of their activity on our behalf, might jeopardize the success of their efforts.

Americans are not the only ones under detention in Communist China. There are numerous other foreigners also under arrest, including nationals of countries which have recognized the Chinese Communists and which have established diplomatic relations in Peiping. All foreigners face these same difficulties.

In this connection it will be recalled that the Department issued a series of warnings to American citizens in China to evacuate that country before the Communists took over unless they were prepared to remain under hazardous conditions. The American Embassy in China on July 26, 1949, publicly warned all Americans in China that the Chinese Communists "had demonstrated an inability or unwillingness to afford adequate protection to foreigners or to safeguard their individual liberties, particularly in connection with arrest, detention, trial and mob action."¹

Many Americans left in the face of these warnings, and where no adequate means of transportation were available this Government assisted them in departing by providing military air and sea transport.

There are still about 300 Americans in Communist China. Most are engaged in business or missionary activities, and are not in prison, although some 30 had been reported to be under house arrest. Seven of these are now reported to have been released. However, as in some instances final confirmation has not yet been received, the Department cannot make their names public. The situation is complicated by the difficulty in obtaining accurate and up-to-date information in many cases.

Two of the 32 persons formerly listed as in prison have now been released and have left China. In addition, Philip Cline, who had been under arrest, was released from prison, but died in a Chinese hospital. The Department has also received further information reporting that one person formerly believed to be under house arrest is now in prison and that two additional Americans were arrested in August and September, leaving this total at 32.

The Department continues to make every effort to free those held in prison or detained against their will. The Department, however, does not consider it advisable at this time to make public all the details regarding the steps it is taking and has taken to accomplish the release of detained Americans.

89. CONTINUED DETENTION OF UNITED STATES NATIONALS: Statement by the Department of State, October 9, 1953²

The Department of State is very seriously concerned over the continued imprisonment, detention and maltreatment of American citizens in Communist China. There are now 33 Americans in Chinese Communist jails, some of whom have been imprisoned for 2 years. The Chinese Communist regime has not published the charges on which most of these Americans are being held. The Chinese Communists have not answered the numerous protests and notes which the British representatives in Peiping have presented on our behalf.

In the case of the 3 Americans seized on the yacht Kert last March 21, the Chinese Communists have released no information, despite the appeal made by the British representative at Peiping on March 28, 1953.

We have also asked the Soviet Union to assist on several occasions. The first request was made by our Embassy at Moscow in September 1951. On March 25 of this year Ambassador Lodge asked the Soviet delegate during debate at the United Nations if the Soviet Union could furnish any information about the Americans,¹ including Donald Dixon and Richard Applegate. Our Embassy in Moscow also has made several approaches to the Soviet Foreign Office this year.

The Department will not overlook any possibility of obtaining the release of all the Americans unjustly imprisoned by the Chinese Communists or denied the right to leave Communist China.

90. NEGOTIATIONS AT THE CONSULAR LEVEL FOR THE RELEASE OF UNITED STATES NATIONALS: Statement by the Department of State, March 1, 1955²

While U.N. Secretary-General Hammarskjöld continues his efforts to secure the release of American military personnel of the United Nations Command imprisoned in Communist China,³ a continuing effort is also being made by the U.S. Government to secure the release of other detained and imprisoned Americans. Yesterday the U.S. Consul General at Geneva met with a Chinese Communist representative to renew U.S. demands for release of these American citizens from their unwarranted detention. The Communist representative, however, reiterated the Communist position that no Americans are being unjustly detained.

This was the 11th in a series of meetings held at Geneva since last June on this subject. During this period 18 Americans who had been imprisoned or otherwise detained have left Communist China, including Dr. Malcolm Bersohn and Mrs. W. A. Rickett, who were released on the Hong Kong border on February 27.

Twenty-six American civilians, including John T. Downey and Richard G. Fecteau, remain in jail; three are under house arrest; and twelve others are still denied exit permits.

The Consul General also inquired specifically as to the welfare of a number of the detained Americans from whom no correspondence has been received although the Communists gave assurances in June 1954 that all detained Americans would be permitted to correspond with relatives. He requested that the Chinese Communist Red Cross expedite mail deliveries. He also sought assurances that imprisoned Americans who need medical attention or hospital care would receive it.

The Communist representative stated that those who were ill would receive medical care and attention. He promised to reply later to the Consul General's requests for information on the welfare of Americans who had not been heard from and stated that Red Cross channels were available for transmission of letters and small parcels, including food and medicines, from the families.

91. RESCINDING OF RESTRAINING ORDERS ON CHINESE STUDENTS IN THE UNITED STATES: Statement by the Department of State, April 2, 1955¹

The program of emergency aid to Chinese students and scholars is expected to terminate on June 30, 1955.² This, of course, does not affect the regular exchange program which is in effect between the United States and the Republic of China. No grants for tuition or maintenance under this emergency program can be continued or renewed after June 30, no requests for thesis or dissertation costs received after this date can be honored, and no requests for emergency medical expenses can be given consideration. Chinese students and scholars who desire to return to the Far East and who are eligible for travel grants to cover minimum expenses for transportation must be in actual travel status on or before June 30 in order to qualify for the grants. However, grantees wishing financial assistance for return travel prior to June 30 must present through their university representative substantial evidence to the Department of their need of financial aid for this purpose and of their definite arrangements for departure. All applicants for travel grants must present written permission from the Immigration and Naturalization Service to leave the country.

It has been brought to the attention of the Department of State that some Chinese students may refrain from applying to the Immigration and Naturalization Service for permission to depart from the United States for fear of being refused. This fear apparently is based on the fact that a number of technically trained Chinese students have in the past been refused permission to depart from the United States under section 215 (a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952.³ In this connection the Department wishes to point out that the cases of such students have been in process of reexamination. As a consequence, restraining orders were rescinded on March 31 by the Immigration and Naturalization Service in the cases of 76 of these students, who are now free to depart, and it is anticipated that action will shortly be completed by the Immigration and Naturalization Service on the few remaining cases.⁴

92. CONTINUED NEGOTIATIONS AT THE CONSULAR LEVEL FOR THE RELEASE OF UNITED STATES NATIONALS DETAINED BY CHINESE COMMUNIST AUTHORITIES:
Statement by the Department of State, June 1, 1955¹

As part of a series of talks that have been in progress ever since the Geneva Conference last summer, our Consul General at Geneva, Mr. Franklin C. Gowen, has just had another conversation with the Chinese Communists. On May 16 he requested a meeting with the Chinese Communist representative to take up again the question of the continuing detention and the welfare of American citizens in Communist China. The Chinese Communists agreed to meet with Mr. Gowen on May 30.

The meeting was held at the Hotel Beau Rivage at Geneva where the other meetings have also been held. At that time the Chinese Communist representative informed Mr. Gowen of the prospective release of the four Air Force men, who have been released, and a statement was volunteered that the purpose of their release was to relieve international tensions. Mr. Gowen reviewed the plight of the other Americans still held and he renewed his request for information that had been promised on all cases of Americans imprisoned or otherwise detained by the Chinese Communists. He presented revised lists of Americans, both military and civilians, held in Communist China, and he renewed demands for their release.

In the lists which Mr. Gowen presented, there were 53 names, as follows: 42 civilians, of whom 25 are imprisoned, four are under house arrest, and 13 have been refused exit visas; and 11 military admittedly being held by the Chinese Communists, as well as the 11 Navy and Coast Guard personnel whom the Red Chinese have specifically denied they hold.

With reference to cases of Chinese students in the United States, the Consul General pointed out that restrictions have been removed and that those students who have expressed a desire to return to their home in China are free to do so.² That has been known for some time. Nevertheless, the Consul General stressed it again.

The Chinese Communist representative stated that he would send a report of the meeting to his government, together with the revised lists of Americans held in China, and he said that the questions Mr. Gowen had raised would be examined and he would reply later. No date has been set for another meeting. Presumably that will await word now from the representative of Red China.

93. NEGOTIATIONS AT THE AMBASSADORIAL LEVEL FOR THE RELEASE OF UNITED STATES NATIONALS: Joint Communiqué by Representatives of the United States and Communist China, July 25, 1955¹

As a result of communication between the United States and the People's Republic of China through the diplomatic channels of the United Kingdom, it has been agreed that the talks held in the last year between consular representatives of both sides at Geneva should be conducted on ambassadorial level in order to aid in settling the matter of repatriation of civilians who desire to return to their respective countries and to facilitate further discussions and settlement of certain other practical matters now at issue between both sides. The first meeting of ambassadorial representatives of both sides will take place on August 1, 1955 at Geneva.

94. AGREED MEASURES FOR THE RETURN OF UNITED STATES AND CHINESE CIVILIANS: Joint Statement by Representatives of the United States and Communist China, September 10, 1955²

The Ambassadors of the United States of America and the People's Republic of China have agreed to announce measures which their respective governments have adopted concerning the return of civilians to their respective countries.

With respect to Chinese in the United States, Ambassador U. Alexis Johnson, on behalf of the United States, has informed Ambassador Wang Ping-nan that:

1. The United States recognizes that Chinese in the United States who desire to return to the People's Republic of China are entitled to do so and declares that it has adopted and will further adopt appropriate measures so that they can expeditiously exercise their right to return.

2. The Government of the Republic of India will be invited to assist in the return to the People's Republic of China of those who desire to do so as follows:

A. If any Chinese in the United States believes that contrary to the declared policy of the United States he is encountering obstruction in departure, he may so inform the Embassy of the Republic of India in the United States and request it to make representations on his behalf to the United States Government. If desired by the People's Republic of China, the Government of the Republic of India may also investigate the facts in any such case.

B. If any Chinese in the United States who desires to return to the People's Republic of China has difficulty in paying his return expenses, the Government of the Republic of India may render him financial assistance needed to permit his return.

3. The United States Government will give wide publicity to the foregoing arrangements and the Embassy of the Republic of India in the United States may also do so.

With respect to Americans in the People's Republic of China, Ambassador Wang Ping-nan, on behalf of the People's Republic of China, has informed Ambassador U. Alexis Johnson that:

1. The People's Republic of China recognizes that Americans in the People's Republic of China who desire to return to the United States are entitled to do so, and declares that it has adopted and will further adopt appropriate measures so that they can expeditiously exercise their right to return.

2. The Government of the United Kingdom will be invited to assist in the return to the United States of those Americans who desire to do so as follows:

A. If any American in the People's Republic of China believes that contrary to the declared policy of the People's Republic of China he is encountering obstruction in departure, he may so inform the Office of the Chargé d'Affaires of the United Kingdom in the People's Republic of China and request it to make representations on his behalf to the Government of the People's Republic of China. If desired by the United States, the Government of the United Kingdom may also investigate the facts in any such case.

B. If any American in the People's Republic of China who desires to return to the United States has difficulty in paying his return expenses, the Government of the United Kingdom may render him financial assistance needed to permit his return.

3. The Government of the People's Republic of China will give wide publicity to the foregoing arrangements and the Office of the Chargé d'Affaires of the United Kingdom in the People's Republic of China may also do so.

5. FAILURE OF THE CHINESE COMMUNIST AUTHORITIES TO IMPLEMENT THE AGREEMENT OF SEPTEMBER 10, 1955: Statement by the Department of State, December 16, 1955¹

The Chinese Communists on December 15 issued a statement defending their continued detention of U.S. civilians in China. At the same time they accused the United States of not complying with the agreed announcement of September 10¹ regarding the repatriation of civilians to Communist China.

Because the Communist statement contains many errors, this statement is being made. The facts show that the United States has scrupulously complied with its agreement and that Chinese in the United States are now and have at all times since the announcement been free to leave.

Unfortunately the same is not true with respect to the Chinese Communist performance of its agreement to permit U.S. civilians to "expeditiously" return to the United States. Of the 19 U.S. citizens in Communist China who were being prevented from returning on September 10, the date of the Chinese Communist agreement, only 5 have been released.

U.S. Ambassador Johnson has repeatedly protested to Communist Ambassador Wang, in the Geneva talks, the failure of the Communists to permit U.S. citizens to leave China. He has also protested the cruel and inhuman treatment of those concerning whom facts are available.

The answer to these protests has been the public statement by the Communists charging that the United States has not permitted Chinese to leave the United States.

In the agreed announcement of September 10, the Chinese Communist Ambassador declared:

The People's Republic of China recognizes that Americans in the People's Republic of China who desire to return to the United States are entitled to do so, and declares that it has adopted and will further adopt appropriate measures so that they can expeditiously exercise their right to return.

This declaration is simple, clear, and positive. It says that any U.S. citizen has the right to leave China and that the Communists have taken or will take the necessary steps so that those who wish may leave "expeditiously." No distinction is made as between those in prison and those out of prison. All U.S. citizens who wish to leave should have been out of Communist China long before this. The continued holding of these U.S. citizens by the Communists is a violation of their agreed announcement, for which the United States must continue to protest.

As for the Communist charge that the United States is preventing Chinese from leaving the United States, it is sufficient to point out that not a single Chinese has been refused exit. If anyone knows of any Chinese who wishes to leave and who claims he is being prevented, he should communicate at once with the Department of State or the Indian Embassy at Washington, D. C., which the United States has agreed may render assistance. The Indian Embassy has made no representation that any Chinese is being prevented from leaving.

It is unfortunate that the Chinese Communists have seen fit to make a public announcement containing charges which are without foundation. This cannot conceal the fact that U.S. citizens continue to be held in prison by the Communists in violation of their public announcement of September 10. It is to be hoped that these U.S. citizens will be permitted promptly to leave Communist prisons and return to their homes.

Ship and Plane Incidents in the China Area

96. COMMUNIST CHINESE ATTACKS ON FOREIGN SHIPS AND PLANES IN THE CHINA AREA: List (July 1950-June 1954) Released by the United States Mission at the United Nations, September 19, 1954¹

July 20, 1950: British S.S. Tak Shing was fired on by Chinese Communist shore batteries in the vicinity of Lafsami, the ship's location possibly within 2 miles of Lafsami.

July 24, 1950: The Panamanian ship S.S. Flying Dragon was fired on by Chinese Communist shore batteries on Lafsami. The ship was hit.

August 2, 1950: An Air France plane was fired on by Chinese Communist A/A guns, Ladrone Island.

August 3, 1950: The 300-ton British freighter Nambee was fired on by Chinese Communist shore batteries on the Nam Shan Islands. There were no hits and no casualties.

August 6, 1950: The American ship S.S. Steel Rover was fired on by Chinese Communist shore batteries in the Lama Island group; the ship was just entering Hong Kong.

August 7, 1950: The British ship S.S. Hand Sang was fired on by Chinese Communist shore batteries in the Lama Islands; the ship was just outside Hong Kong waters; two British officers were slightly wounded.

August 8, 1950: The Norwegian ship S.S. Pleasantville was fired on by Chinese Communist shore batteries in the Lama Islands. The ship was just outside Hong Kong.

August 13, 1950: A Pacific Overseas Airways plane, under U.S. flag, was fired on by Chinese Communist machine guns from an island near Macao.

August 17, 1950: The British destroyer Concord was repeatedly shelled by Chinese Communist batteries on the Lama Islands, then by batteries on the Ling Ting Islands. One enlisted man was wounded.

September 16, 1950: The British ship S.S. Sing Hing was fired on by Chinese Communist shore batteries from the Lama Island group.

September 17, 1950: The British ship S.S. Mahadevi was fired on by Chinese Communist shore batteries in the Lama Island group.

¹ Department of State Bulletin, Oct. 4, 1954, pp. 505-507. The list was released to the press by the U.S. representative to the United Nations on Sept. 19, 1954.

October 7, 1950: The Danish S.S. Emilie Maersk was fired on by Chinese Communist shore batteries on the Lama Island group.

November 7, 1950: Portuguese sloop Goncalo Velho was fired on by Chinese Communist shore batteries on the Lafsami Islands. The ship was just outside Hong Kong waters on the regular Hong Kong-Macao route.

December 8, 1950: A Panamanian flagship was shelled by Chinese Communist shore batteries off Wu Yu Island, near Amoy. No damage, no casualties.

December 9, 1950: The British tug Allegiance was fired on by shore batteries at Putao (Pak Leak) Island, in the Wan Shan Island group. The tug was returning from the rescue of the Philippine S.S. Joseph S. The master and two crew members were slightly injured.

February 13, 1951: The British-registered Callex II, a motor vessel, was shelled by Chinese Communist shore batteries on Ling Ting Island. The ship was outside Hong Kong waters. The British master and British chief officer were injured.

April 10, 1951: The British ship Jade Leaf on its way from Hong Kong to Chuen Chow was forced by weather conditions to anchor near Namao Island, off Swatow. The master did not know that the area was prohibited. The ship was fired on by Chinese Communist shore-battery machineguns. The ship was hit once and there were no casualties. Later, while entering Swatow, the ship was buzzed by unidentified planes.

April 16, 1951: Chinese Communist shore batteries on outer Ling Ting Islands fired on the British S. S. Victoria Peak causing some of the cargo to ignite.

May 3, 1951: The British tug, Caroline Moller, while towing barge, was fired on by Chinese Communist shore batteries on the Ling Ting islands.

June 3, 1951: The British S.S. Edith Moller was shelled by Chinese Communist armed junk and shore batteries near Hong Kong.

June 8, 1951: The Danish ship Marieskou, while going up the Pearl River estuary, was shelled by Chinese Communist island batteries.

August 12, 1951: Enroute Hong Kong to Chuanchow, the British S.S. Jade Leaf took shelter in Tang Sang harbor. The ship, being mistaken for Nationalist, was attacked by the Chinese Communists. The attack resulted in the killing of the boatswain.

September 2, 1951: Between Hong Kong and Macao, the British flag Yu Men, on the regular Hong Kong-Macao run, was fired on by a Chinese small craft.

November 26, 1951: A vessel off Swatow fired on a U.S. Navy plane.

January 1952: The Asiatic Petroleum Company's oil lighter BPM 88, sailing under British flag, was intercepted and detained by the Chinese Communists, on the fringe of Hong Kong territorial waters.

September 25, 1952: On the regular Hong Kong-Macao route the British flag S.S. Tak Shing was fired on and detained by an armed Chinese Communist naval vessel. The Tak Shing was taken to Lafsami Island where two passengers were removed.

September 25, 1952: In answer to the distress call, the H.M.S. Mounts Bay and consort arrived to give escort to the Tak Shing to Hong Kong. While still in British territorial waters, 4 miles from Lafsami, Chinese Communist shore batteries fired on the Mounts Bay. The Mounts Bay returned fire and silenced the batteries.

October 13, 1952: While pursuing a suspected smuggling junk, a Hong Kong revenue launch in the vicinity of Ling Ting Island was fired on by a Chinese Communist shore battery.

November 2, 1952: A Chinese Communist armed junk took into custody two British seamen in a whale boat sailing around Hong Kong Island—about half way between Lama Island and the Ling Ting Islands. The men were taken to Canton, questioned intensively, and were returned to Hong Kong on March 19, 1953, having been detained for more than 4 months.

January 18, 1953: Chinese Communist A/A fire off Swatow shot down U.S.N. Neptune plane. U.S.C.G. Mariner crashed taking off after rescue. U.S. destroyer fired on by shore batteries, later chased by hostile craft. Total casualties were eleven missing.

March 21, 1953: Chinese Communist gunboat seized U.S. yacht Kert about 5 miles west of Lantau Island, 6–7 miles north of Lafsami. The following Americans were taken into custody and not released until September 1954: Richard Applegate, Benjamin Krasner, and Donald Dixon. Three Chinese, who were with the Americans, have not been released.

April 30, 1953: A Chinese Communist gunboat attacked a British-registered motor junk in international waters near Soko Island and Sang Lau Point off the southwest tip of Lantau Island. After taking refuge in British waters, a Chinese Communist gunboat and four Communists in naval uniform pursued the junk and after some shooting took it. The Hong Kong Marine Department later rescued the crew.

May 25, 1953: As it was leaving Amoy, the British S.S. Nigelock received small arms fire from Communist-held Hu Hsu Island.

June 30, 1953: At Scrag Point Chinese Communist shore batteries fired on the S.S. Hydralock of British registry.

September 9, 1953: A Chinese Communist gunboat fired on Hong Kong ML 1323 in disputed waters in the Pearl River estuary. Resulting casualties: 6 British navy crew members and one captain of the Royal Hong Kong defense force killed.

November 11, 1953: Chinese Communist shore batteries fired on S.S. Inchulva, under British flag, while entering Wenchow.

November 12, 1953: The S.S. Inchulva again attempted to enter Wenchow. It was again shelled with no damage.

June 4, 1954: Chinese Communists took British forces yacht Elinor which, while on a pleasure cruise, entered Chinese Communist waters through navigational error. Two officers and 7 men aboard were detained till July 10.

97. PROTEST AGAINST ATTACK ON BRITISH CATHAY PACIFIC AIRLINER: Note From the United States Government to the Chinese Communist Authorities at Peiping, Transmitted by the British Chargé d'Affaires,¹ July 27, 1954²

[First Note]

The Government of the United States protests vigorously against the barbarous and lawless attack on July 23, 1954 at approximately 8:45 a.m. local time, against a British Cathay Pacific unarmed and defenceless commercial airliner and its passengers. This unwarranted unprovoked attack occurred over international waters about 30 miles south of Hainan Island. It resulted in the killing of three United States citizens, including two children of tender age, two and four years, and the wounding of three other United States citizens, including a child aged six. The Government of the United States demands appropriate punishment of all the persons having responsibility for this criminal attack as well as compensation for the victims and families of the deceased. The Government of the United States demands that measures be taken to guard against a repetition of such action and the British Government be informed of the nature of such measures.

98. PROTEST AGAINST ATTACK ON UNITED STATES AIRCRAFT IN RESCUE WORK ON THE BRITISH CATHAY PACIFIC AIRLINER: Note From the United States Government to the Chinese Communist Authorities at Peiping, Transmitted by the British Chargé d'Affaires, July 27, 1954³

[Second Note]

The United States Defence authorities have received an official report from the United States Naval authorities in the Pacific that on July 26 at approximately 10:05 a.m. local time two United States carrier-based aircraft while searching the area of attack on the Cathay Pacific Aircraft were attacked and fired on by two Chinese LA-9 aircraft. This incident occurred well over the international waters approximately 13 miles from Hainan. The United States pilots involved report that during this wanton and unprovoked attack a Chinese gunboat also opened fire on the United States aircraft which, as stated above, were engaged on a mission of mercy search in the vicinity for possible survivors of the incident of July 23. The Government of the United States protests most strongly against these attacks and demands that those responsible be adequately punished, that immediate effective steps be taken to ensure that there be no repetition of this deplorable attack and that the British Government be informed as to the nature of such measures. The Government of the United States reserves its right to present a claim for possible damage and injury after thorough investigation has been completed.

99. REJECTION OF SOVIET CHARGES OF UNITED STATES INTERFERENCE WITH THE SOVIET TANKER TUAPSE: Note From the American Embassy at Moscow to the Soviet Foreign Ministry, June 26, 1954 ¹

The United States Government refers to the Soviet Government's note of June 24 regarding interception of the Soviet tanker Tuapse by a war vessel of the destroyer type in Far Eastern waters.²

The United States Government rejects as completely without foundation the allegations made by the Soviet Government that Naval Forces of the United States have seized or otherwise interfered with the movement of the Soviet tanker in question.

100. RENEWED REJECTION OF SOVIET CHARGES: Note From the American Embassy at Moscow to the Soviet Foreign Ministry, July 4, 1954 ³

The United States Government refers to the Soviet Government's note of July 2 ⁴ with further reference to the Soviet tanker Tuapse.

The Soviet Government is well aware that the vessel in question was not seized by the naval forces of the United States and that it has not been detained by United States authorities. The United States Government therefore has nothing further to add to its note of June 26 ⁵ rejecting the unfounded charges of the Soviet Government in this matter.

101. DENIAL OF ANY RESPONSIBILITY IN THE CASE OF THE TUAPSE AND ITS CREW: Statement by the Department of State, August 8, 1955 ⁶

The Soviet Chargé d'Affaires presented an aide memoire ⁷ to the Under Secretary this afternoon concerning the case of the Soviet tanker Tuapse. The aide memoire expressed the satisfaction of the Soviet Union that 29 members of the Tuapse crew have returned to the Soviet Union but stated that the Soviet Government was disturbed by the fact that 20 members of the crew were still being held and that the tanker itself had not been returned. The aide memoire said that the Soviet Government expects the United States Government to take the necessary measures for the return of the remaining members of the crew of the Tuapse. The aide memoire concluded by saying that the Soviet Government expects the Government of the United States of America will take appropriate steps toward the return to the Soviet Union of the tanker.

In commenting on the contents of the Soviet aide memoire, the Under Secretary stated to the Soviet Chargé that he wished to make very clear that the case of the Tuapse and its crew was one entirely within the jurisdiction of the Government of the Republic of China and that the United States Government had nothing whatever to do with it. So far as the cases of the men who have chosen not to return to the Soviet Union are concerned, the Under Secretary said he was not personally acquainted with the details in this regard. However, he noted to the Soviet Chargé that if the United States Government had any control over the matter, which it did not, the attitude of the United States Government would be that the men were perfectly free to make up their own mind as to where they wished to reside.

102. DENIAL OF POLISH CHARGES OF UNITED STATES INTERFERENCE WITH THE POLISH TANKER PRACA:
Note From the American Embassy at Warsaw to the Polish Foreign Ministry, October 20, 1953¹

The Embassy of the United States of America presents its compliments to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and on instructions of the United States Government has the honor to reply to the Ministry's note of October 12² with respect to the interception of the Polish flag tanker Praca by naval forces of the Chinese Government. The United States Government rejects categorically the false charges contained in the Ministry's note and wishes to make clear to the Polish Government that the United States Government had no connection with the detention of the Praca.

103. DENIAL OF POLISH CHARGES OF UNITED STATES INTERFERENCE WITH THE POLISH FREIGHTER GOTTWALD: Statement by the Department of State, May 21, 1954¹

In a note of May 15² delivered to the American Embassy in Warsaw the Polish Government referred to a report that the Polish merchant ship Gottwald had been intercepted by naval forces of the Government of the Republic of China. As in the case of the Polish tanker *Praca*³ which was similarly intercepted in October 1953, the Polish Government sought to impose upon the U.S. Government responsibility for the action against the Gottwald. On May 20 this Government replied to the Polish note through our Embassy in Warsaw. The substantive portion of our note is as follows:

"The U.S. Government rejects as completely without foundation the allegations made by the Polish Government. The United States Government has had no connection whatever with this incident.

"Furthermore, as has been clearly stated before, and as the Polish Government must be well aware, propaganda charges involving the United States Government in the Praca case are also completely false."

104. DENIAL OF ANY RESPONSIBILITY IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRACA AND THE GOTTWALD AND THEIR CREWS: Note From the American Embassy at Warsaw to the Polish Foreign Ministry, December 8, 1954⁴

The Embassy of the United States presents [its] compliments to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and refers to its note of November 20, 1954.⁵ The United States Government again rejects as without basis in fact the version contained in that note of the interception of the Polish-flag vessels Praca and Gottwald. The United States had no connection with this action or with the decision of so many crew members from these ships to seek asylum.

These vessels were intercepted by the naval forces of the Republic of China. If the Polish Government is genuinely interested in pursuing this matter in a practical way rather than in dispatching a series of notes purely for propaganda purposes, it could seek a solution of this issue with the Government of the Republic of China through diplomatic channels.

The note of the Polish Government refers to the presence in the area of the Island of Formosa of aircraft of the United States Navy. These United States aircraft operate in conjunction with the Seventh Fleet of the United States Navy, which has been ordered by the President of the United States to patrol the waters around Formosa in order to prevent an attack on that island. The mission of the Seventh Fleet has been and will continue to be to contribute to the security of the Far East. The United States reaffirms its intention to devote its efforts to the maintenance of peace and stability in that area and hopes that other governments will contribute their efforts to the same end.

In discussing the decision of the officers and crew of the two vessels to seek asylum in the free world, the Polish Government's note reveals its concern that large numbers of Poles have fled from their homeland. Many of these people who have escaped from political and religious persecution in Poland, or have refused to return there, have sought asylum in the United States. The United States Government, true to its traditional policies of granting asylum to those suffering from oppression, has welcomed and will continue to welcome persons such as the Polish officers and seamen from the Praca and Gottwald who sought refuge in this country.

105. FINAL REJECTION OF POLISH ALLEGATION OF RESPONSIBILITY IN THE CASES OF THE PRACA AND THE GOTTWALD: Note From the American Embassy at Warsaw to the Polish Foreign Ministry, February 21, 1955¹

The Embassy of the United States of America presents its compliments to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and in accordance with instructions received from the United States Government has the honor to reply to the Ministry's note of February 12, 1955,² concerning the detention of two merchant vessels, the Praca and the Gottwald, by the navy of the Government of the Republic of China.

The United States Government has repeatedly and categorically rejected the Polish Government's false charges alleging United States responsibility in this matter. The United States Government once again rejects these charges and wishes it clearly understood that the United States considers inadmissible the Polish Government's attempt to determine the applicability of United States legislation to alleged United States conduct.

On December 17, 1954, by a vote of 44 to 5, the General Assembly of the United Nations rejected similar charges made against the United States by the Soviet Union.³ The United States Government is confident that that decision was an accurate reflection of world opinion in recognizing the true nature and purposes of such accusations as are contained in the present note of the Polish Government.

KOREA

A. UNITED STATES MILITARY AND ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE PRIOR TO THE OUTBREAK OF THE KOREAN CONFLICT

1. REJECTION OF THE KOREAN AID BILL BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES: Statement by the President, January 21, 1950¹

I am releasing herewith a letter which I have received from the Secretary of State about the action of the House of Representatives in rejecting the Korean Aid Bill on Thursday² by a vote of 193-191. I entirely concur in the Secretary's views as to the seriousness of this action and the necessity for its speedy rectification. I shall take up this matter with Congressional leaders and urge upon them the need for immediate action, in order that important foreign-policy interests of this country may be properly safeguarded.

LETTER FROM THE SECRETARY OF STATE [January 20, 1950]

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The Department of State received with concern and dismay the report that the House of Representatives had rejected the Korea Aid Bill of 1949 by a vote of 193 to 191. This action, if not quickly repaired, will have the most far-reaching adverse effects upon our foreign policy, not only in Korea but in many other areas of the world. It has been fundamental to our policy that in those areas where a reasonable amount of American aid can make the difference between the maintenance of national independence and its collapse under totalitarian pressure, we should extend such aid within a prudent assessment of our capabilities. The American people understand this policy and have supported our extending aid in such circumstances; the success of such aid is a matter of public record.

The Republic of Korea owes its existence in large measure to the United States, which freed the country from Japanese control. The peoples of the Republic of Korea, the other peoples of Asia, and the members of the United Nations under whose observation a government of the Republic was freely elected, alike look to our conduct in Korea as a measure of the seriousness of our concern with the freedom and welfare of peoples maintaining their independence in the face of great obstacles. We have not only given the Republic of Korea independence; since then we have provided the economic, military, technical, and other assistance necessary to its continued existence. Of the current program of economic assistance we are extending to Korea, half was provided by the Congress during the previous session.¹ The withholding of the remainder would bring our efforts to an end in mid-course. It is our considered judgment that if our limited assistance is continued the Republic will have a good chance of survival as a free nation. Should such further aid be denied, that chance may well be lost and all our previous efforts perhaps prove to have been vain.

We are concerned not only about the consequences of this abrupt about-face in Korea, whose government and people have made valiant efforts to win their independence and establish free institutions under the most difficult circumstances, but we are also deeply concerned by the effect which would be created in other parts of the world where our encouragement is a major element in the struggle for freedom.

It is difficult for us to believe that the members of the House of Representatives who voted against this measure took sufficiently into account the serious implications of this action upon the position of the United States in the Far East. These implications were set forth in considerable detail in hearings before the committees of Congress by the Department of State, Department of Defense, and the Economic Cooperation Administration.²

In our judgment it would be disastrous for the foreign policy of the United States for us to consider this action by the House of Representatives as its last word on the matter.

2. MUTUAL DEFENSE ASSISTANCE AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA, JANUARY 26, 1950¹

Preamble

The Governments of the United States and of the Republic of Korea:

Desiring to foster international peace and security, within the framework of the Charter of the United Nations, through measures which will further the ability of nations dedicated to the purposes and principles of the Charter to develop effective measures for self-defense in support of those purposes and principles; and without prejudice to continue[d] exertion of maximum efforts to obtain agreements to provide the United Nations with armed forces as provided by its Charter, and to obtain agreement among member nations upon universal regulation and reduction of armaments under adequate and dependable guarantee against violation;

Recognizing that measures to eliminate insecurity caused by fear of aggression will enhance the progress of economic development;

Considering that, in furtherance of these principles, the Government of the United States has enacted the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949² providing for the furnishing of military assistance by the United States of America to the Republic of Korea; and Desiring to set forth the understandings which govern the furnishing of assistance by the Government of the United States under the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, and the receipt of such assistance by the Republic of Korea;

Have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I

1. Each Government, consistently with the principle that economic recovery is essential to international peace and security and must be given clear priority, will make or continue to make available to the other, and to other Governments, such equipment, materials, services, or other military assistance as the Government furnishing such assistance may authorize and in accordance with such terms and conditions as it may agree. The furnishing of any such assistance as may be authorized by either party hereto shall be consistent with the Charter of the United Nations. Such assistance as may be made available by the United States of America pursuant to this Agreement will be furnished under the provisions, and subject to all of the terms, conditions and termination provisions, of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, and such other applicable United States laws as may hereafter come into effect. The two Governments will, from time to time, negotiate detailed arrangements necessary to carry out the provisions of this paragraph.

2. The Government of the Republic of Korea undertakes to make effective use of assistance received pursuant to paragraph 1 of this Article for the purposes for which such assistance was furnished, and that Government will not, without the prior consent of the Government of the United States, devote assistance so furnished to purposes other than those for which it was furnished.

3. The Government of the Republic of Korea undertakes not to transfer to any person not an officer or agent of such Government, or to any other nation, title to or possession of any equipment, materials, or services, pursuant to paragraph 1, without the prior consent of the Government of the United States.

ARTICLE II

In the event that Article VIII of the Economic Cooperation Agreement between the Government of the Republic of Korea and the Government of the United States, signed on December 10, 1948.¹ at Seoul, Korea, shall cease to be in force prior to the termination of this Agreement, the Government of the Republic of Korea will, for so long as this Agreement remains in force, facilitate the production and transfer to the Government of the United States, for such period of time, in such quantities and upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon, of raw and semi-processed materials required by the United States of America as a result of deficiencies or potential deficiencies in its own resources, and which may be available in Korea. Arrangements for such transfers shall give due regard to reasonable requirements for domestic use and commercial export of Korea.

ARTICLE III

1. Each Government will take appropriate measures consistent with security to keep the public informed of operations under this Agreement.

2. Each Government will take such security measures as may be agreed between the two Governments in order to prevent the disclosure or compromise of classified military articles, services or information furnished by the other Government pursuant to this Agreement.

ARTICLE IV

The two Governments will, upon request of either of them, negotiate appropriate arrangements between them respecting responsibility for patent or similar claims based on the use of devices, processes, technological information or other forms of property protected by law in connection with equipment, materials or services furnished pursuant to this Agreement. In such negotiations, consideration shall be given to including an undertaking whereby each Government will assume the responsibility for all such claims of its nationals and such claims arising in its jurisdiction of nationals of any country not a party to this Agreement.

ARTICLE V

The Government of the Republic of Korea will, except as otherwise agreed to, grant duty-free treatment and exemption from internal taxation upon importation or exportation of products, property, materials or equipment imported into its territory in connection with this Agreement.

ARTICLE VI

1. The two Governments will, upon the request of either of them, consult regarding any matter relating to the application of this Agreement or to operations or arrangements carried out pursuant to this Agreement.

2. The Government of the Republic of Korea will accord, to duly authorized United States representatives, facilities freely and fully to observe the utilization of assistance furnished pursuant to this Agreement.

ARTICLE VII

The two Governments recognize their mutual interest, consistent with mutual security and recovery objectives, in effective controls over the export of war-potential materials, equipment, and, in so far as practicable, technical data; and the two Governments will consult with a view to taking measures for the accomplishment of these ends.

ARTICLE VIII

1. This Agreement shall enter into force upon signature and will continue in force until three months after the receipt by either party of written notice of the intention of the other party to terminate it. This Agreement shall be submitted to the Korean National Assembly for ratification.

2. This Agreement shall be registered with the Secretary General of the United Nations in compliance with the provisions of Article 102 of the Charter of the United Nations.

Done in duplicate, in the English and Korean languages, at Seoul, Korea, on this 26th day of January 1950. The English and Korean texts shall have equal force, but in case of divergence, the English text shall prevail.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, the respective representatives, duly authorized for the purpose, have signed the present Agreement.

3. ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE TO THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA: The Far Eastern Economic Assistance Act of 1950, February 14, 1950¹

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act be cited as the "Far Eastern Economic Assistance Act of 1950".

SEC. 2. To enable the President until June 30, 1950, to obligate funds heretofore appropriated for assistance in certain areas of China, section 12 of Public Law 47, Eighty-first Congress,² is amended by striking out "February 15, 1950" and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1950".

SEC. 3. (a) The Administrator for Economic Cooperation is hereby authorized to furnish assistance to the Republic of Korea in conformity with—

(1) the provisions of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended,³ wherever such provisions are applicable and not inconsistent with the intent and purposes of this section 3; and

(2) the agreement on aid between the United States of America and the Republic of Korea signed December 10, 1948,⁴ or any supplementary or succeeding agreement which shall not substantially alter the basic obligations of either party.

(b) Notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, the Administrator shall immediately terminate aid under this section in the event of the formation in the Republic of Korea of a coalition government which includes one or more members of the Communist Party or of the party now in control of the government of northern Korea.

(c) Notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, the Administrator is authorized to make available to the Republic of Korea merchant vessels of tonnage not in excess of two thousand five hundred gross tons each, in a number not to exceed ten at any one time, with a stipulation that such vessels shall be operated only in east Asian waters and must be returned forthwith upon demand of the Administrator and in any event not later than June 30, 1951. Any agency of the United States Government owning or operating any such vessel is authorized to make such vessel available to the Administrator for the purposes of this section upon his application, notwithstanding the provisions of any other law and without reimbursement by the Administrator, and title to any such vessel so supplied shall remain in the United States Government.

(d) In order to carry out the provisions of this section 3, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President, in addition to funds already appropriated, not to exceed $60,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1950.

(e) Notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, until such time as an appropriation shall be made pursuant to subsection (d) of this section, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and directed to make advances not to exceed in the aggregate $30,000,000 to carry out the provisions of this section, in such manner, at such times, and in such amounts as the Administrator shall request, and no interest shall be charged on advances made by the Treasury to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for this purpose. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall be repaid without interest on advances made by it hereunder, from funds made available for the purposes of this section 3.

Sec. 4. The authorization for appropriations in this Act is limited to the period ending June 30, 1950, in order that any subsequent authorizations may be separately passed on, and is not to be construed as an express or implied commitment to provide further authorizations for appropriations.

EXTENSION OF THE ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE PROGRAM FOR THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA: Statement by the Secretary of State, March 7, 1950¹

I appreciate the invitation to appear before your Committee with Mr. Hoffman to explain to you briefly why I feel the continuation of the Korean economic recovery program for a second year is of great importance to the success of American foreign policy. I shall indeed be brief because I know that, although I myself was not present, this matter was fully discussed with you by Mr. Webb and Mr. Hoffman² only a few months ago. In addition, I have referred to the importance of our Korean program in discussions we have had during the present session.

I believe the main questions we have to consider are: (1) the importance of the proposed continuation of the economic recovery program to the success of our over-all policy toward Korea and (2) the part which our Korean policy plays in United States policy for the Far East.

First as to Korea: You will recall that the United States has taken the leadership among the nations to attain the realization of our fundamental declaration made at Cairo in 1943 with the United Kingdom and China (and later joined by the U. S. S. R.) "that in due course Korea should become free and independent."¹ When our own efforts to persuade the U. S. S. R. to join in holding free elections to establish a united country were unsuccessful, we referred the matter to the United Nations.² The General Assembly has used and is using its best efforts to bring about the accomplishment of this end, desired by all the Korean people.³ The success of its efforts has, thus far, been limited to assisting in the establishment of a free government, the Republic of Korea, in what was formerly the area of United States occupation.⁴

Upon the establishment of the Republic, the United States undertook to assist it to survive and develop as a democratic, representative government. To do this, the United States is providing the Republic with political support. Through our information and educational programs, we are seeking to help the Republic develop a sound educational system founded on principles of representative democracy. At the request of the Republic, we are maintaining there a Military Advisory Group to assist in training Korean security forces and to insure the efficient employment of United States military assistance by those forces. Supplementing the prior transfer of military equipment under the Surplus Property Act,⁵ the Congress has authorized under the Mutual Defense Assistance Act the extension of military aid to Korea.⁶ And the Congress has recently authorized the Economic Cooperation Administration to undertake a program intended to bring the economy of the Republic as nearly as possible to a self-supporting basis. In doing so the Congress authorized the expenditure in the fiscal year 1950 of the total sum of 120 million dollars.⁷

By means of these and related measures, the United States hopes to achieve the objective of strengthening the Republic of Korea to the point where it can (1) successfully withstand the threat of expanding Communist influence and control arising out of the existence in north Korea of an aggressive Soviet-dominated Communist regime and (2) serve as a nucleus for the eventual peaceful unification of the entire country on a democratic basis.

The testimony presented to your Committee by Mr. Hoffman, Mr. Webb, and other witnesses at the time of hearings on the bill authorizing the program for fiscal year 1950 indicated very plainly that the authority requested was to carry out the first year of a planned 3-year program intended to help Korea make substantial progress toward a self-supporting economy. The program for which authority is now requested for fiscal year 1951 is the second year of this 3-year program. Since Mr. Hoffman will go into the economics of the program with you, I will not attempt to do so beyond saying that the Department of State has participated in the preparation of the program which he will outline and supports it fully.

Second, as to the place of this proposal in our over-all Far Eastern policy, I have said that the United States is taking the leadership among the nations in helping the people of Korea attain the goal of a united independent nation, free from foreign domination. As a result of this initiative, the United States today is looked to not only by the people of Korea but by the peoples of the Far East and, in fact, by the people of democratic nations everywhere as the leader in the struggle for the survival of a Korean Republic, both for itself and as a possible nucleus for the eventual peaceful unification of that country.

Broadly speaking, the United States foreign policy in the Far East is directed toward encouraging and assisting the efforts of the peoples of that area to improve their welfare and security, to stabilize and develop their economies, to strengthen free institutions, and to advance the cause of self-government free from outside domination. Korea is one place in which the United States can continue to take well-defined positive steps to help a free democratic country to survive in the face of efforts of communism to engulf it. Hundreds of millions of people of Southern and Southeastern Asia and the islands of the Pacific are now in a period where they must choose between the roads toward democracy or totalitarianism. As the President said in his message to the Congress on Korean aid in June of last year:

Korea has become a testing ground in which the validity and practical value of the ideals and principles of democracy which the Republic is putting into practice are being matched against the practices of communism which have been imposed upon the people of north Korea. The survival and progress of the Republic toward a self-supporting, stable economy will have an immense and far-reaching influence on the people of Asia. Such progress by the young Republic will encourage the people of southern and southeastern Asia and the islands of the Pacific to resist and reject the Communist propaganda with which they are besieged. Moreover, the Korean Republic, by demonstrating the success and tenacity of democracy in resisting communism, will stand as a beacon to the people of northern Asia in resisting the control of the Communist forces which have overrun them.¹

The people of Asia, as well as the people of Korea, have been able to see the way in which economic assistance from the United States has contributed already to the ability of the Korean people to move toward economic independence. The Economic Assistance Program has increased agricultural production and the well-being of the large farming population of Korea. It has given food to the families of the industrial workers and, by increasing production, has brought about mounting employment. It has made possible a small surplus for export as a source of foreign exchange with which necessities may be imported. This progress, together with the rehabilitation of factories, mines, and fishing facilities important to the Korean economy, has helped to give them faith in their form of government, strength to resist the constant pressures of communism, and confidence in their future.

There is one further and fundamental question which must be considered: That is the probability of ultimate success of the effort of the Korean Republic to survive. In recent debates, a number of Members of the Congress have indicated their feeling that the possibility of failure makes them doubt the wisdom of the United States giving a helping hand in this effort. It is my belief that American policy should be based on determination to succeed rather than on fear of the possibility of failure. Despite the problems with which the Republic of Korea is beset, both internally and externally, and despite its necessarily limited experience in self-government and paucity of technical and administrative know-how, conditions of stability and public order have continued to improve and the threat of Communist overthrow appears at least temporarily to have been contained.

There is good reason to hope from progress made thus far that with our assistance, the Republic of Korea can survive and thrive. This cannot, of course, be guaranteed. However, it continues to be true that without our assistance there can be no such hope.

B. INITIAL PHASE OF THE KOREAN CONFLICT, JUNE-OCTOBER 1950

5. ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE NORTH KOREAN ATTACK: Telegram From the American Ambassador at Seoul¹ to the Secretary of State, June 25, 1950²

According to Korean Army reports which are partly confirmed by Korean Military Advisory Group field adviser reports, North Korean forces invaded Republic of Korea territory at several points this morning. Action was initiated about 4 a.m. Ongjin was blasted by North Korean artillery fire. About 6 a.m. North Korean infantry commenced crossing the [38th] parallel in the Ongjin area, Kaesong area, and Chunchon area, and an amphibious landing was reportedly made south of Kangnung on the east coast. Kaesong was reportedly captured at 9 a.m., with some ten North Korean tanks participating in the operation. North Korean forces, spearheaded by tanks, are reportedly closing in on Chunchon. Details of the fighting in the Kangnung area are unclear, although it seems that North Korean forces have cut the highway. I am conferring with Korean Military Advisory Group advisers and Korean officials this morning concerning the situation.

On May 2, 1951, the United Nations Command released two captured documents setting forth detailed North Korean preinvasion plans for attack on the Republic of Korea; Security Council, Official Records, Supplement for 1 April through 30 June, 1951 (S/2112), pp. 88-94.

It would appear from the nature of the attack and the manner in which it was launched that it constitutes an all-out offensive against the Republic of Korea.

6. REQUEST FOR SECURITY COUNCIL CONSIDERATION OF THE NORTH KOREAN AGGRESSION: Letter From the Deputy Representative of the United States at the United Nations¹ to the U.N. Secretary-General, June 25, 1950²

DEAR MR. SECRETARY-GENERAL: I have the honour to transmit herewith the text of the message which I read to you on the telephone at three o'clock this morning, June 25, 1950.

Will you be good enough to bring the message to the immediate attention of the President of the United Nations Security Council.

Faithfully yours,

[Enclosure]

The American Ambassador to the Republic of Korea³ has informed the Department of State that North Korean forces invaded the territory of the Republic of Korea at several points in the early morning hours of June 25 (Korean time).⁴

Pyongyang Radio under the control of the North Korean regime, it is reported, has broadcast a declaration of war against the Republic of Korea effective 9 p.m. e.d.t. June 24.

An attack of the forces of the North Korean regime under the circumstances referred to above constitutes a breach of the peace and an act of aggression.

Upon the urgent request of my Government, I ask you to call an immediate meeting of the Security Council of the United Nations.

7. CONFIRMATION OF THE NORTH KOREAN AGGRESSION: Telegram From the United Nations Commission at Seoul to the U.N. Secretary-General, June 25, 1950⁵

Government of Republic of Korea states that about 04:00 hrs. 25 June attacks were launched in strength by North Korean forces all along the 38th parallel. Major points of attack have included Ongjin Peninsula, Kaesong area and Chunchon and east coast where seaborne landings have been reported north and south of Kangnung. Another seaborne landing reported imminent under air cover in Pohang area on southeast coast. The latest attacks have occurred along the parallel directly north of Seoul along shortest avenue of approach. Pyongyang radio allegation at 13:35 hrs. of South Korean invasion across parallel during night declared entirely false by President and Foreign Minister in course of conference with Commission members and principal secretary. Allegations also stated Peoples Army instructed repulse invading forces by decisive counterattack and placed responsibility for consequences on South Korea. Briefing on situation by President included statement thirty-six tanks and armoured cars used in northern attacks at four points. Following emergency Cabinet meeting Foreign Minister issuing broadcast to people of South Korea encouraging resistance against dastardly attack. President expressed complete willingness for Commission broadcast urging cease-fire and for communication to United Nations to inform of gravity of situation. Although North Korean declaration of war rumoured at 11:00 hrs. over Pyongyang radio, no confirmation available from any source. President not treating broadcast as official notice. United States Ambassador, appearing before Commission, stated his expectation Republican Army would give good account of itself.

At 17:15 hrs. four yak-type aircraft strafed civilian and military air fields outside Seoul destroying planes, firing gas tanks and attacking jeeps. Yongdungpo railroad station on outskirts also strafed.

Commission wishes to draw attention of Secretary-General to serious situation developing which is assuming character of full-scale war and may endanger the maintenance of international peace and security. It suggests that he consider possibility of bringing matter to notice of Security Council. Commission will communicate more fully considered recommendation later.

8. CALL FOR NORTH KOREAN WITHDRAWAL: Resolution of the United Nations Security Council, June 25, 1950¹

The Security Council

Recalling the finding of the General Assembly in its resolution of 21 October 1949² that the Government of the Republic of Korea is a lawfully established government having effective control and jurisdiction over that part of Korea where the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea was able to observe and consult and in which the great majority of the people of Korea reside; and that this Government is based on elections which were a valid expression of the free will of the electorate of that part of Korea and which were observed by the Temporary Commission; and that this is the only such government in Korea;

Mindful of the concern expressed by the General Assembly in its resolutions of 12 December 1948¹ and 21 October 1949 of the consequences which might follow unless Member States refrained from acts derogatory to the results sought to be achieved by the United Nations in bringing about the complete independence and unity of Korea; and the concern expressed that the situation described by the United Nations Commission on Korea in its report² menaces the safety and well being of the Republic of Korea and of the people of Korea and might lead to open military conflict there;

Noting with grave concern the armed attack on the Republic of Korea by forces from North Korea,

Determines that this action constitutes a breach of the peace,

I. Calls for the immediate cessation of hostilities; and

Calls upon the authorities in North Korea to withdraw forthwith their armed forces to the 38th parallel;

II. Requests the United Nations Commission on Korea

(a) To communicate its fully considered recommendations on the situation with the least possible delay.

(b) To observe the withdrawal of North Korean forces to the 38th parallel, and

(c) To keep the Security Council informed on the execution of this resolution;

III. Calls upon all Members to render every assistance to the United Nations in the execution of this resolution and to refrain from giving assistance to the North Korean authorities.

9. INITIAL MEASURES TAKEN BY THE UNITED STATES IN THE KOREAN CRISIS: Statement by the President, June 27, 1950³

In Korea, the Government forces, which were armed to prevent border raids and to preserve internal security, were attacked by invading forces from North Korea. The Security Council of the United Nations called upon the invading troops to cease hostilities and to withdraw to the 38th Parallel.⁴ This they have not done but, on the contrary, have pressed the attack. The Security Council called upon all members of the United Nations to render every assistance to the United Nations in the execution of this resolution. In these circumstances, I have ordered United States air and sea forces to give the Korean Government troops cover and support.

The attack upon Korea makes it plain beyond all doubt that communism has passed beyond the use of subversion to conquer independent nations and will now use armed invasion and war. It has defied the orders of the Security Council of the United Nations issued to preserve international peace and security. In these circumstances, the occupation of Formosa by Communist forces would be a direct threat to the security of the Pacific area and to United States forces performing their lawful and necessary functions in that area.

Accordingly, I have ordered the Seventh Fleet to prevent any attack on Formosa. As a corollary of this action, I am calling upon the Chinese Government on Formosa to cease all air and sea operations against the mainland. The Seventh Fleet will see that this is done.¹ The determination of the future status of Formosa must await the restoration of security in the Pacific, a peace settlement with Japan, or consideration by the United Nations.

I have also directed that United States forces in the Philippines be strengthened and that military assistance to the Philippine Government be accelerated.

I have similarly directed acceleration in the furnishing of military assistance to the forces of France and the Associated States in Indochina and the dispatch of a military mission to provide close working relations with those forces.

I know that all members of the United Nations will consider carefully the consequences of this latest aggression in Korea in defiance of the Charter of the United Nations. A return to the rule of force in international affairs would have far-reaching effects. The United States will continue to uphold the rule of law.

I have instructed Ambassador Austin, as the representative of the United States to the Security Council, to report these steps to the Council.

10. CALL FOR UNITED NATIONS ASSISTANCE TO THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA: Resolution of the United Nations Security Council, June 27, 1950²

The Security Council

Having determined that the armed attack upon the Republic of Korea by forces from North Korea constitutes a breach of the peace;

Having called for an immediate cessation of hostilities; and

Having called upon the authorities of North Korea to withdraw forthwith their armed forces to the 38th parallel; and

Having noted from the report of the United Nations Commission for Korea³ that the authorities in North Korea have neither ceased hostilities nor withdrawn their armed forces to the 38th parallel, and that urgent military measures are required to restore international peace and security; and

Having noted the appeal from the Republic of Korea to the United Nations for immediate and effective steps to secure peace and security,¹ Recommends that the Members of the United Nations furnish such assistance to the Republic of Korea as may be necessary to repel the armed attack and to restore international peace and security in the area.

11. ADDITIONAL UNITED STATES MEASURES IN SUPPORT OF THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA: Statement Released by the White House, June 30, 1950²

At a meeting with Congressional leaders at the White House this morning, the President, together with the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of State, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff, reviewed the latest developments of the situation in Korea.

The Congressional leaders were given a full review of the intensified military activities.

In keeping with the United Nations Security Council's request for support to the Republic of Korea³ in repelling the North Korean invaders and restoring peace in Korea, the President announced that he had authorized the United States Air Force to conduct missions on specific military targets in Northern Korea, wherever militarily necessary, and had ordered a naval blockade of the entire Korean coast.

General MacArthur has been authorized to use certain supporting ground units.

12. OFFER OF GROUND FORCES BY THE REPUBLIC OF CHINA FOR SERVICE IN KOREA: Note From the Secretary of State to the Chinese Ambassador at Washington,⁴ July 1, 1950⁵

In response to the request contained in the Chinese Embassy's Aide-Mémoire of June 29, 1950,⁶ the appropriate authorities of the Government of the United States have given consideration to the expression of willingness on the part of the Government of the Republic of China to furnish ground forces for service in Korea in support of the United Nations.

The Secretary of State desires to inform His Excellency the Ambassador of the Republic of China of the deep appreciation of the United States Government for this prompt and substantial demonstration of support for the United Nations on the part of the Government of the Republic of China. In light, however, of the threat of invasion of Taiwan by Communist forces from the mainland, a threat repeated in the last day or so by spokesmen for the Chinese Communist regime in Peiping, it is the view of the Government of the United States of America that it would be desirable for representatives of General MacArthur's Headquarters to hold discussions with the Chinese military authorities on Taiwan concerning the plans for the defense of the island against invasion prior to any final decision on the wisdom of reducing the defense forces on Taiwan by transfer of troops to Korea. It is understood that General MacArthur's Headquarters will be in communication with the appropriate Chinese military authorities on Taiwan with a view to the dispatch from Tokyo of representatives of General MacArthur's Headquarters for this purpose.

13. CONSTITUTIONAL AUTHORITY FOR USE OF UNITED STATES FORCES IN KOREA: Memorandum by the Department of State, July 3, 1950 (Excerpts) ¹

This memorandum is directed to the authority of the President to order the Armed Forces of the United States to repel the aggressive attack on the Republic of Korea.

As explained by Secretary Acheson to the press on June 28, as soon as word of the attack on Korea was received in Washington, it was the view of the President and of all his advisers that the first responsibility of the Government of the United States was to report the attack to the United Nations.²

Accordingly, in the middle of the night of Saturday, June 24, 1950, Ambassador Gross, the United States deputy representative at the Security Council of the United Nations, notified Mr. Trygve Lie, the Secretary-General of the United Nations, that armed forces from North Korea had commenced an unprovoked assault against the territory of the Republic of Korea.

The President, as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces of the United States, has full control over the use thereof. He also has authority to conduct the foreign relations of the United States. Since the beginning of United States history, he has, upon numerous occasions, utilized these powers in sending armed forces abroad. The preservation of the United Nations for the maintenance of peace is a cardinal interest of the United States. Both traditional international law and article 39 of the United Nations Charter¹ and the resolution pursuant thereto² authorize the United States to repel the armed aggression against the Republic of Korea.

The President's control over the Armed Forces of the United States is based on article 2, section 2 of the Constitution which provides that he "shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States."

In United States v. Sweeney, the Supreme Court said that the object of this provision was "evidently to vest in the President the supreme command over all the military forces—such supreme and undivided command as would be necessary to the prosecution of a successful war."³

That the President's power to send the Armed Forces outside the country is not dependent on Congressional authority has been repeatedly emphasized by numerous writers.

For example, ex-President William Howard Taft wrote:

The President is made Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy by the Constitution evidently for the purpose of enabling him to defend the country against invasion, to suppress insurrection and to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. If Congress were to attempt to prevent his use of the Army for any of these purposes, the action would be void. . . . Again, in the carrying on of war as Commander in Chief, it is he who is to determine the movements of the Army and of the Navy. Congress could not take away from him that discretion and place it beyond his control in any of his subordinates, nor could they themselves, as the people of Athens attempted to carry on campaigns by votes in the market-place.⁴

Professor Willoughby writes:

As to his constitutional power to send United States forces outside the country in time of peace when this is deemed by him necessary or expedient as a means of preserving or advancing the foreign interests or relations of the United States, there would seem to be equally little doubt, although it has been contended by some that the exercise of this discretion can be limited by congressional statute. That Congress has this right to limit or to forbid the sending of United States forces outside of the country in time of peace has been asserted by so eminent an authority as ex-Secretary Root. It would seem to [the] author, however, that the President, under his powers as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and his general control of the foreign relations of the United States, has this discretionary right constitutionally vested in him, and, therefore, not subject to congressional control. Especially, since the argument of the court in Myers v. United States with reference to the general character of the executive power vested in the President, and, apparently, the authority impliedly vested in him by reason of his obligation to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, it is reasonable to predict that, should the question be presented to it, the Supreme Court will so hold. Of course, if this sending is in pursuance of express provisions of a treaty, or for the execution of treaty provisions, the sending could not reasonably be subject to constitutional objection.¹

In an address delivered before the American Bar Association in 1917 on the war powers under the Constitution, Mr. Hughes stated that "There is no limitation upon the authority of Congress to create an army and it is for the President as Commander-in-Chief to direct the campaigns of that Army wherever he may think they should be carried on." He referred to a statement by Chief Justice Taney in Fleming v. Page (9 How. 615) in which the Chief Justice said that as Commander in Chief the President "is authorized to direct the movements of the naval and military forces placed by law at his command."²

At the time the approval of the Treaty of Versailles was under consideration in the Senate, there was under discussion a reservation to article 10, presented by Senator Lodge, to the effect that "Congress . . . under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States." Senator Walsh of Montana stated in debate on November 10, 1919 that the statement was a recital of "What is asserted to be a principle of constitutional law." He said that if—

. . . any declaration of that character should ever be made by the Senate of the United States, it would be singularly unfortunate. It is not true. It is not sound. It is fraught with the most momentous consequences, and may involve disasters the extent of which it is hardly possible to conceive.

The whole course of our history has been a refutation of such a declaration, namely, that the President of the United States, the Chief Executive of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States, has no power to employ the land or naval forces without any express authorization upon the part of Congress. Since the beginning of our Government, our Navy has been sent over the seven seas and to every port in the world. Was there ever any congressional act authorizing the President to do anything of that kind?

He stated that our Navy travels the sea "in order to safeguard and protect the rights of American citizens in foreign lands. Who can doubt that the President has no [sic] authority thus to utilize the naval and land forces of the United States?"

Mr. Borah stated:

I agree fully with the legal or constitutional proposition which the Senator states, and I hope this [reservation]³ will be stricken out. It is an act of super-erogation to put it in. It does not amount to anything. It is a recital which is not true.

It can not change the Constitution, and it ought not to be there. . . . It would simply be vain and futile and, if I may say so, with due respect to those who drew it, the doing of an inconsequential thing."⁴ relations of the United States and in this field he "alone has the power to speak or listen as a representative of the Nation."¹

Obviously, there are situations in which the powers of the President as Commander in Chief and his power to conduct the foreign relations of this country complement each other.

The basic interest of the United States is international peace and security. The United States has, throughout its history, upon orders of the Commander in Chief to the Armed Forces and without congressional authorization, acted to prevent violent and unlawful acts in other states from depriving the United States and its nationals of the benefits of such peace and security. It has taken such action both unilaterally and in concert with others. A tabulation of 85 instances of the use of American Armed Forces without a declaration of war was incorporated in the Congressional Record for July 10, 1941.²

It is important to analyze the purposes for which the President as Commander in Chief has authorized the despatch of American troops abroad. In many instances, of course, the Armed Forces have been used to protect specific American lives and property. In other cases, however, United States forces have been used in the broad interests of American foreign policy, and their use could be characterized as participation in international police action.

The traditional power of the President to use the Armed Forces of the United States without consulting Congress was referred to in debates in the Senate in 1945. Senator Connally remarked: "The historical instances in which the President has directed armed forces to go to other countries have not been confined to domestic or internal instances at all." Senator Millikin pointed out that "in many cases the President has sent troops into a foreign country to protect our foreign policy . . . notably in Central and South America." "That was done," he continued, "in order to keep foreign countries out of there—was not aimed at protecting any particular American citizen. It was aimed at protecting our foreign policy." To his remark that he presumed that by the Charter of the United Nations we had laid down a foreign policy which we could protect, Senator Connally replied that that was "absolutely correct." He added:

I was trying to indicate that fact by reading the list of instances of intervention on our part in order to keep another government out of territory in this hemisphere. That was a question of carrying out our international policy, and not a question involving the protection of some American citizen or American property at the moment.³

During the Boxer Rebellion in China in 1900-1901, the President sent about 5,000 troops to join with British, Russian, German, French, and Japanese troops to relieve the siege of the foreign quarters in Peking and reestablish the treaty status. This was done without express congressional authority. In defining United States policy at the time Secretary of State Hay said:

. . . The purpose of the President is, as it has been heretofore, to act concurrently with the other powers; first, in opening up communication with Peking and rescuing the American officials, missionaries, and other Americans who are in danger; secondly, in affording all possible protection everywhere in China to American life and property; thirdly, in guarding and protecting all legitimate American interests; and, fourthly, in aiding to prevent a spread of the disorders to the other provinces of the Empire and a recurrence of such disasters. It is, of course, too early to forecast the means of attaining this last result; but the policy of the Government of the United States is to seek a solution which may bring about permanent safety and peace to China, preserve Chinese territorial and administrative entity, protect all rights guaranteed to friendly powers by treaty and international law, and safeguard for the world the principle of equal and impartial trade with all parts of the Chinese Empire.¹

After the opening up of Japan to foreigners in the 1850's through the conclusion of commercial treaties between Japan and certain Western powers, antiforeign disturbances occurred. In 1863, the American Legation was burned following previous attacks on the British Legation. The commander of the U. S. S. Wyoming was instructed to use all necessary force for the safety of the legation or of Americans residing in Japan. Secretary of State Seward said that the prime objects of the United States were:

First, to deserve and win the confidence of the Japanese Government and people, if possible, with a view to the common interest of all the treaty powers; secondly, to sustain and cooperate with the legations of these powers, in good faith, so as to render their efforts to the same end effective.²

In 1864, the Mikado, not recognizing the treaties with the Western powers, closed the straits of Shimonoseki. At the request of the Tycoon's government (opposed to the Mikado), American, British, French, and Netherlands forces, in a joint operation, opened the straits by force. The object of the Western powers was the enforcement of treaty rights, with the approval of the government that granted them.³

Again, in 1868, a detachment of Japanese troops assaulted foreign residents in the streets of Hiogo. One of the crew of the Oreida was seriously wounded. The safety of the foreign population being threatened, naval forces of the treaty powers made a joint landing and adopted measures to protect the foreign settlement.⁴

⁴ Report of the Secretary of the Navy, 1868, p. xi. [Citation in the original memorandum.]

Former Assistant Secretary of State James Grafton Rogers has characterized these uses of force as "international police action", saying:

They amounted to executive use of the Armed Forces to establish our own and the world's scheme of international order. Two American Presidents used men, ships and guns on a large and expensive scale.¹

In 1888 and 1889, civil war took place in Samoa where the United States, Great Britain, and Germany had certain respective treaty rights for the maintenance of naval depots. German forces were landed, and the German Government invited the United States to join in an effort to restore calm and quiet in the islands in the interest of all the treaty powers. The commander of the United States naval forces in the Pacific was instructed by the Secretary of the Navy that the United States was willing to cooperate in restoring order "on the basis of the full preservation of American treaty rights and Samoan authority, as recognized and agreed to by Germany, Great Britain, and the United States." He was to extend full protection and defense to American citizens and property, to protest the displacement of the native government by Germany as violating the positive agreement and understanding between the treaty powers, but to inform the British and German Governments of his readiness to cooperate in causing all treaty rights to be respected and in restoring peace and order on the basis of the recognition of the Samoan right to independence.²

On July 7, 1941, the President sent to the Congress a message announcing that as Commander in Chief he had ordered the Navy to take all necessary steps to insure the safety of communications between Iceland and the United States as well as on the seas between the United States and all other strategic outposts and that American troops had been sent to Iceland in defense of that country. The United States, he said, could not permit "the occupation by Germany of strategic outposts in the Atlantic to be used as air or naval bases for eventual attack against the Western Hemisphere." For the same reason, he said, substantial forces of the United States had been sent to the bases acquired from Great Britain in Trinidad and British Guiana in the South to forestall any pincers movement undertaken by Germany against the Western Hemisphere.³

Thus, even before the ratification of the United Nations Charter, the President had used the Armed Forces of the United States without consulting the Congress for the purpose of protecting the foreign policy of the United States. The ratification of the United Nations Charter was, of course, a landmark in the development of American foreign policy. As noted above, Senator Connally and Senator Millikin agreed that the President was entitled to use armed forces in protection of the foreign policy represented by the Charter. This view was also expressed in the Senate debates in connection with the ratification of the Charter. For example, Senator Wiley made the following pertinent statement:

It is my understanding, according to the testimony given before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, that the terms "agreement or agreements" as used in article 43 are synonymous with the word "treaty." On the other hand, I recognize that Congress might well interpret them as agreements brought about by the action of the Executive and ratified by a joint resolution of both Houses. These agreements would provide for a police force and the specific responsibility of each nation. But outside of these agreements, there is the power in our Executive to preserve the peace, to see that the "supreme laws" are faithfully executed. When we become a party to this charter, and define our responsibilities by the agreement or agreements, there can be no question of the power of the Executive to carry out our commitments in relation to international policing. His constitutional power, however, is in no manner impaired.¹

An even fuller exposition of the point was made by Senator Austin, who stated:

Mr. President, I am one of those lawyers in the United States who believe that the general powers of the President—not merely the war powers of the President but the general authority of the President—are commensurate with the obligation which is imposed upon him as President, that he take care that the laws are faithfully executed. That means that he shall take all the care that is required to see that the laws are faithfully executed.

Of course, there are other specific references in the Constitution which show that he has authority to employ armed forces when necessary to carry out specific things named in the Constitution; but the great over-all and general authority arises from his obligation that he take care that the laws are faithfully executed. That has been true throughout our history, and the Chief Executive has taken care, and has sent the armed forces of the United States, without any act of Congress preceding their sending, on a great many occasions. I have three different compilations of those occasions. One of them runs as high as 150 times; another of them 72 times, and so forth. It makes a difference whether we consider the maneuvers which were merely shows of force as combined [comprised?] in the exercise of this authority—as I do—or whether we limit the count to those cases in which the armed forces have actually entered upon the territory of a peaceful neighbor. But there is no doubt in my mind of his obligation and authority to employ all the force that is necessary to enforce the laws.

It may be asked, How does a threat to international security and peace violate the laws of the United States? Perhaps, Mr. President, it would not have violated the laws of the United States previous to the obligations set forth in this treaty. Perhaps we have never before recognized as being true the fundamental doctrine with which I opened my remarks. But we are doing so now. We recognize that a breach of the peace anywhere on earth which threatens the security and peace of the world is an attack upon us; and after this treaty is accepted by 29 nations, that will be the express law of the world. It will be the law of nations, because according to its express terms it will bind those who are nonmembers, as well as members, and it will be the law of the United States, because we shall have adopted it in a treaty. Indeed, it will be above the ordinary statutes of the United States, because it will be on a par with the Constitution, which provides that treaties made pursuant thereto shall be the supreme law of the land.

So I have no doubt of the authority of the President in the past, and his authority in the future, to enforce peace. I am bound to say that I feel that the President is the officer under our Constitution in whom there is exclusively vested the responsibility for maintenance of peace.²

Action contrary to the Charter of the United Nations is action against the interests of the United States. Preservation of peace under the Charter is a cornerstone of American foreign policy. President Truman said in his inaugural address in 1949:

In the coming years, our program for peace and freedom will emphasize four major courses of action.

First, we will continue to give unfaltering support to the United Nations and related agencies, and we will continue to search for ways to strengthen their authority and increase their effectiveness.¹

In the Korean situation, the resolution of the Security Council of June 25 determined, under article 39 of the Charter, that the action of the North Koreans constituted a breach of the peace and called upon "the authorities in North Korea (a) to cease hostilities forthwith; and (b) to withdraw their armed forces to the thirty-eighth parallel." It also called upon "all Members to render every assistance to the United Nations in the execution of this resolution." This is an application of the principles set forth in article 2, paragraph 5 of the Charter, which states: "All Members shall give the United Nations every assistance in any action it takes in accordance with the present Charter . . ." The Security Council resolution of June 27, passed after the North Korean authorities had disregarded the June 25 resolution, recommended "that Members of the United Nations furnish such assistance to the Republic of Korea as may be necessary to repel the armed attack and to restore international peace and security in the area." This recommendation was also made under the authority of article 39 of the Charter.

The President's action seeks to accomplish the objectives of both resolutions.

The continued defiance of the United Nations by the North Korean authorities would have meant that the United Nations would have ceased to exist as a serious instrumentality for the maintenance of international peace. The continued existence of the United Nations as an effective international organization is a paramount United States interest. The defiance of the United Nations is in clear violation of the Charter of the United Nations and of the resolutions adopted by the Security Council of the United Nations to bring about a settlement of the problem. It is a threat to international peace and security, a threat to the peace and security of the United States and to the security of United States forces in the Pacific.

These interests of the United States are interests which the President as Commander in Chief can protect by the employment of the Armed Forces of the United States without a declaration of war. It was they which the President's order of June 27 did protect. This order was within his authority as Commander in Chief.

14. DESIGNATION OF THE UNIFIED COMMAND: Resolution of the United Nations Security Council, July 7, 1950¹

The Security Council,
Having determined that the armed attack upon the Republic of Korea by forces from North Korea constitutes a breach of the peace,
Having recommended that Members of the United Nations furnish such assistance to the Republic of Korea as may be necessary to repel the armed attack and to restore international peace and security in the area,

1. Welcomes the prompt and vigorous support which governments and peoples of the United Nations have given to its Resolutions of 25 and 27 June 1950² to assist the Republic of Korea in defending itself against armed attack and thus to restore international peace and security in the area;

2. Notes that Members of the United Nations have transmitted to the United Nations offers of assistance for the Republic of Korea;

3. Recommends that all Members providing military forces and other assistance pursuant to the aforesaid Security Council resolutions make such forces and other assistance available to a unified command under the United States;

4. Requests the United States to designate the commander of such forces;

5. Authorizes the unified command at its discretion to use the United Nations flag in the course of operations against North Korean forces concurrently with the flags of the various nations participating;

6. Requests the United States to provide the Security Council with reports as appropriate on the course of action taken under the unified command.

15. DESIGNATION OF THE UNITED NATIONS COMMANDER: Statement by the President, July 8, 1950³

The Security Council of the United Nations, in its resolution of July 7, 1950,⁴ has recommended that all members providing military forces and other assistance pursuant to the Security Council resolutions of June 25 and 27,⁵ make such forces and other assistance available to a unified command under the United States.

The Security Council resolution also requests that the United States designate the commander of such forces, and authorizes the unified command at its discretion to use the United Nations flag in the course of operations against the North Korean forces concurrently with the flags of the various nations participating.

I am responding to the recommendation of the Security Council and have designated General Douglas MacArthur as the Commanding General of the military forces which the members of the United Nations place under the unified command of the United States pursuant to the United Nations' assistance to the Republic of Korea in repelling the unprovoked armed attack against it.

I am directing General MacArthur, pursuant to the Security Council resolution, to use the United Nations flag in the course of operations against the North Korean forces concurrently with the flags of the various nations participating.

16. UNITED STATES VIEWS ON THE ROLE OF THE UNITED NATIONS IN REPELLING THE AGGRESSION IN KOREA: Message From the Secretary of State to the Prime Minister of India, July 18, 1950¹

I am deeply appreciative of the high purpose which prompted Your Excellency in sending the message which I received on July 13, 1950, through your distinguished Ambassador in Washington² and your subsequent message of the 17th transmitting Prime Minister Stalin's reply³ to your similar letter to him of July 13. Both the President and I have given the most thoughtful consideration to these communications.

One of the most fundamental objectives of the foreign policy of the United States is to assist in maintaining world peace, and the Government of the United States is firmly of the opinion that the United Nations is the most effective instrument yet devised for maintaining and restoring international peace and security. The United States is, therefore, eager to do all that is proper and possible to preserve and strengthen the United Nations.

The purpose of the United States Government and of the American people with respect to Korea is to support by all means at our disposal the determination of the United Nations to repel the armed attack upon Korea and to restore international peace and security in the area. We desire both to prevent the spread of aggression beyond Korea and to end it there—as required by the Security Council of the United Nations.

We are deeply conscious of the fact that law-abiding governments and peoples throughout the world have a vital stake in the issues involved in this aggression and in the success of the United Nations in dealing with it. It is painful to realize that there could have long since been a restoration of peace and the saving of the lives of those fighting on behalf of the United States [Nations]¹ had not a small minority of the United Nations failed to meet their obligations under the Charter and refused to use their authority and influence to prevent or stop the hostilities. The acceptance of their obligations and the exercise of their authority and influence in accordance with those obligations would restore peace tomorrow.

² The message of July 13 contained an appeal for "breaking the present deadlock [over Chinese representation] in the Security Council so that representatives of the People's Government of China can take a seat in the Council, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics can return to it, and, whether within or through informal contacts outside the Council, the United States of America, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and China, with the help and cooperation of other peace-loving nations, can find a basis for terminating the [Korea] conflict and for a permanent solution of the Korean problem" (ibid., p. 170).

A breach of the peace or an act of aggression is the most serious matter with which the United Nations can be confronted. We do not believe that the termination of the aggression from northern Korea can be contingent in any way upon the determination of other questions which are currently before the United Nations.

There has not been at any time any obstacle to the full participation by the Soviet Union in the work of the United Nations except the decision of the Soviet Government itself. The Security Council has shown that it is both competent and willing to act vigorously for the maintenance of peace.

In our opinion, the decision between competing claimant governments for China's seat in the United Nations is one which must be reached by the United Nations on its merits. It is a question on which there is at present a wide diversity of views among the membership of the United Nations. I know you will agree that the decision should not be dictated by an unlawful aggression or by any other conduct which would subject the United Nations to coercion and duress.

I know that Your Excellency shares our earnest desire to see an early restoration of peace in Korea in accordance with the resolutions of the Security Council, and I assure you of our eagerness to work with you and your great country to establish in the United Nations a means by which the fear of aggression can be permanently lifted from the peoples of the earth.²

17. REPORT BY THE PRESIDENT TO THE CONGRESS ON THE SITUATION IN KOREA, JULY 19, 1950 (Excerpts)³

To the Congress of the United States:

I am reporting to the Congress on the situation which has been created in Korea, and on the actions which this Nation has taken, as a member of the United Nations, to meet this situation. I am also laying before the Congress my views concerning the significance of these events for this Nation and the world, and certain recommendations for legislative action which I believe should be taken at this time.

At 4 o'clock in the morning, Sunday, June 25, Korean time, armed forces from north of the thirty-eighth parallel invaded the Republic of Korea.

The Republic of Korea was established as an independent nation in August 1948, after a free election held under the auspices of the United Nations. This election, which was originally intended to cover all of Korea, was held only in the part of the Korean peninsula south of the thirty-eighth parallel, because the Soviet Government, which occupied the peninsula north of that parallel, refused to allow the election to be held in the area under its control.

The United States, and a majority of the other members of the United Nations, have recognized the Republic of Korea. The admission of Korea to the United Nations has been blocked by the Soviet veto.

In December 1948 the Soviet Government stated that it had withdrawn its occupation troops from northern Korea, and that a local regime had been established there. The authorities in northern Korea continued to refuse to permit United Nations observers to pass the thirty-eighth parallel to supervise or observe a free election, or to verify the withdrawal of Soviet troops.

Nevertheless, the United Nations continued its efforts to obtain a freely elected government for all of Korea and, at the time of the attack, a United Nations Commission, made up of representatives of seven nations—Australia, China, El Salvador, France, India, the Philippines and Turkey—was in the Republic of Korea.

Just 1 day before the attack of June 25, field observers attached to the United Nations Commission on Korea had completed a routine tour, lasting 2 weeks, of the military positions of the Republic of Korea south of the thirty-eighth parallel. The report of these international observers stated that the Army of the Republic of Korea was organized entirely for defense. The observers found the parallel guarded on the south side by small bodies of troops in scattered outposts, with roving patrols. They found no concentration of troops and no preparation to attack. The observers concluded that the absence of armor, air support, heavy artillery, and military supplies precluded any offensive action by the forces of the Republic of Korea.

On June 25, within a few hours after the invasion was launched from the north, the Commission reported to the United Nations that the attack had come without warning and without provocation.

The reports from the Commission make it unmistakably clear that the attack was naked, deliberate, unprovoked aggression, without a shadow of justification.¹

This outright breach of the peace, in violation of the United Nations Charter, created a real and present danger to the security of every nation. This attack was, in addition, a demonstration of contempt for the United Nations, since it was an attempt to settle, by military aggression, a question which the United Nations had been working to settle by peaceful means.

The attack on the Republic of Korea, therefore, was a clear challenge to the basic principles of the United Nations Charter and to the specific actions taken by the United Nations in Korea. If this challenge had not been met squarely, the effectiveness of the United Nations would have been all but ended, and the hope of mankind that the United Nations would develop into an institution of world order would have been shattered.

Prompt action was imperative. The Security Council of the United Nations met, at the request of the United States, in New York at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, Sunday, June 25, eastern daylight time. Since there is a 14-hour difference in time between Korea and New York, this meant that the Council convened just 24 hours after the attack began.

At this meeting the Security Council passed a resolution¹ which called for the immediate cessation of hostilities and for the withdrawal of the invading troops to the thirty-eighth parallel, and which requested the members of the United Nations to refrain from giving aid to the northern aggressors and to assist in the execution of this resolution. The representative of the Soviet Union to the Security Council stayed away from the meeting, and the Soviet Government has refused to support the Council's resolution.

The attack launched on June 25 moved ahead rapidly. The tactical surprise gained by the aggressors, and their superiority in planes, tanks, and artillery, forced the lightly armed defenders to retreat. The speed, the scale, and the coordination of the attack left no doubt that it had been plotted long in advance.

When the attack came, our Ambassador to Korea, John J. Muccio, began the immediate evacuation of American women and children from the danger zone. To protect this evacuation, air cover and sea cover were provided by the commander in chief of United States forces in the Far East, General of the Army Douglas MacArthur. In response to urgent appeals from the Government of Korea, General MacArthur was immediately authorized to send supplies of ammunition to the Korean defenders. These supplies were sent by air transport, with fighter protection. The United States Seventh Fleet was ordered north from the Philippines, so that it might be available in the area in case of need.

Throughout Monday, June 26, the invaders continued their attack with no heed to the resolution of the Security Council of the United Nations. Accordingly, in order to support the resolution, and on the unanimous advice of our civil and military authorities, I ordered United States air and sea forces to give the Korean Government troops cover and support.²

On Tuesday, June 27, when the United Nations Commission in Korea had reported that the northern troops had neither ceased hostilities nor withdrawn to the thirty-eighth parallel,³ the United Nations Security Council met again and passed a second resolution, recommending that members of the United Nations furnish to the Republic of Korea such aid as might be necessary to repel the attack and to restore international peace and security in the area.¹ The representative of the Soviet Union to the Security Council stayed away from this meeting also, and the Soviet Government has refused to support the Council's resolution.

The vigorous and unhesitating actions of the United Nations and the United States in the face of this aggression met with an immediate and overwhelming response throughout the free world. The first blow of aggression had brought dismay and anxiety to the hearts of men the world over. The fateful events of the 1930's when aggression unopposed bred more aggression and eventually war, were fresh in our memory.

But the free nations had learned the lesson of history. Their determined and united actions uplifted the spirit of freemen everywhere. As a result, where there had been dismay there is hope; where there had been anxiety there is firm determination.

Fifty-two of the 59 member nations have supported the United Nations action to restore peace in Korea.

A number of member nations have offered military support or other types of assistance for the United Nations action to repel the aggressors in Korea. In a third resolution, passed on July 7, the Security Council requested the United States to designate a commander for all the forces of the members of the United Nations in the Korean operation, and authorized these forces to fly the United Nations flag.² In response to this resolution, General MacArthur has been designated as commander of these forces.³ These are important steps forward in the development of a United Nations system of collective security. Already, aircraft of two nations—Australia and Great Britain—and naval vessels of five nations—Australia, Canada, Great Britain, the Netherlands, and New Zealand—have been made available for operations in the Korean area, along with forces of Korea and the United States, under General MacArthur's command. The other offers of assistance that have been, and will continue to be made, will be coordinated by the United Nations and by the unified command, in order to support the effort in Korea to maximum advantage.

All the members of the United Nations who have endorsed the action of the Security Council realize the significance of the step that has been taken. This united and resolute action to put down lawless aggression is a milestone toward the establishment of a rule of law among nations.

Only a few countries have failed to support the common action to restore the peace. The most important of these is the Soviet Union.

Since the Soviet representative had refused to participate in the meetings of the Security Council which took action regarding Korea, the United States brought the matter directly to the attention of the Soviet Government in Moscow. On June 27, we requested the Soviet Government, in view of its known close relations with the North Korean regime, to use its influence to have the invaders withdraw at once.¹

The Soviet Government, in its reply on June 29² and in subsequent statements, has taken the position that the attack launched by the North Korean forces was provoked by the Republic of Korea, and that the actions of the United Nations Security Council were illegal.

These Soviet claims are flatly disproved by the facts.

The attitude of the Soviet Government toward the aggression against the Republic of Korea is in direct contradiction to its often expressed intention to work with other nations to achieve peace in the world.

For our part, we shall continue to support the United Nations action to restore peace in the Korean area.

As the situation has developed, I have authorized a number of measures to be taken. Within the first week of the fighting, General MacArthur reported, after a visit to the front, that the forces from North Korea were continuing to drive south, and further support to the Republic of Korea was needed. Accordingly, General MacArthur was authorized to use United States Army troops in Korea, and to use United States aircraft of the Air Force and the Navy to conduct missions against specific military targets in Korea north of the thirty-eighth parallel, where necessary to carry out the United Nations resolution. General MacArthur was also directed to blockade the Korean coast.³

The attacking forces from the north have continued to move forward, although their advance has been slowed down. The troops of the Republic of Korea, though initially overwhelmed by the tanks and artillery of the surprise attack by the invaders, have been reorganized and are fighting bravely.

United States forces, as they have arrived in the area, have fought with great valor. The Army troops have been conducting a very difficult delaying operation with skill and determination, outnumbered many times over by attacking troops, spearheaded by tanks. Despite the bad weather of the rainy season, our troops have been valiantly supported by the air and naval forces of both the United States and other members of the United Nations.

In this connection, I think it is important that the nature of our military action in Korea be understood. It should be made perfectly clear that the action was undertaken as a matter of basic moral principle. The United States was going to the aid of a nation established and supported by the United Nations and unjustifiably attacked by an aggressor force. Consequently, we were not deterred by the relative immediate superiority of the attacking forces, by the fact that our base of supplies was 5,000 miles away, or by the further fact that we would have to supply our forces through port facilities that are far from satisfactory.

We are moving as rapidly as possible to bring to bear on the fighting front larger forces and heavier equipment, and to increase our naval and air superiority. But it will take time, men, and material to slow down the forces of aggression, bring those forces to a halt, and throw them back.

Nevertheless, our assistance to the Republic of Korea has prevented the invaders from crushing that nation in a few days—as they had evidently expected to do. We are determined to support the United Nations in its effort to restore peace and security to Korea, and its effort to assure the people of Korea an opportunity to choose their own form of government free from coercion, as expressed in the General Assembly resolutions of November 14, 1947,¹ and December 12, 1948.²

In addition to the direct military effort we and other members of the United Nations are making in Korea, the outbreak of aggression there requires us to consider its implications for peace throughout the world. The attack upon the Republic of Korea makes it plain beyond all doubt that the international Communist movement is prepared to use armed invasion to conquer independent nations. We must therefore recognize the possibility that armed aggression may take place in other areas.

In view of this, I have already directed that United States forces in support of the Philippines be strengthened, and that military assistance be speeded up to the Philippine Government and to the Associated States of Indochina and to the forces of France in Indochina. I have also ordered the United States Seventh Fleet to prevent any attack upon Formosa, and I have requested the Chinese Government on Formosa to cease all air and sea operations against the mainland.³ These steps were at once reported to the United Nations Security Council.

Our action in regard to Formosa was a matter of elementary security. The peace and stability of the Pacific area had been violently disturbed by the attack on Korea. Attacks elsewhere in the Pacific area would have enlarged the Korean crisis, thereby rendering much more difficult the carrying out of our obligations to the United Nations in Korea.

In order that there may be no doubt in any quarter about our intentions regarding Formosa, I wish to state that the United States has no territorial ambitions whatever concerning that island, nor do we seek for ourselves any special position or privilege on Formosa. The present military neutralization of Formosa is without prejudice to political questions affecting that island. Our desire is that Formosa not become embroiled in hostilities disturbing to the peace of the Pacific and that all questions affecting Formosa be settled by peaceful means as envisaged in the Charter of the United Nations. With peace reestablished, even the most complex political questions are susceptible of solution. In the presence of brutal and unprovoked aggression, however, some of these questions may have to be held in abeyance in the interest of the essential security of all.

The outbreak of aggression in the Far East does not, of course, lessen but, instead, increases the importance of the common strength of the free nations in other parts of the world. The attack on the Republic of Korea gives added urgency to the efforts of the free nations to increase and to unify their common strength, in order to deter a potential aggressor.

To be able to accomplish this objective, the free nations must maintain a sufficient defensive military strength in being and, even more important, a solid basis of economic strength, capable of rapid mobilization in the event of emergency.

The strong cooperative efforts that have been made by the United States and other free nations, since the end of World War II, to restore economic vitality to Europe and other parts of the world, and the cooperative efforts we have begun in order to increase the productive capacity of underdeveloped areas, are extremely important contributions to the growing economic strength of all the free nations, and will be of even greater importance in the future.

We have been increasing our common defensive strength under the Treaty of Rio de Janeiro and the North Atlantic Treaty,¹ which are collective security arrangements within the framework of the United Nations Charter. We have also taken action to bolster the military defenses of individual free nations, such as Greece, Turkey, and Iran.

The defenses of the North Atlantic Treaty area were considered a matter of great urgency by the North Atlantic Council in London this spring.² Recent events make it even more urgent than it was at that time to build and maintain these defenses.

Under all the circumstances it is apparent that the United States is required to increase its military strength and preparedness not only to deal with the aggression in Korea but also to increase our common defense, with other free nations, against further aggression.

The increased strength which is needed falls into three categories:

In the first place, to meet the situation in Korea, we shall need to send additional men, equipment, and supplies to General MacArthur's command as rapidly as possible.

In the second place, the world situation requires that we increase substantially the size and matériel support of our Armed Forces, over and above the increases which are needed in Korea.

In the third place, we must assist the free nations associated with us in common defense to augment their military strength.

Of the three categories I have just enumerated, the first two involve increases in our own military manpower, and in the matériel support that our men must have.

To meet the increased requirements for military manpower, I have authorized the Secretary of Defense to exceed the budgeted strength of military personnel for the Army, Navy, and Air Force, and to use the Selective Service System to such extent as may be required in order to obtain the increased strength which we must have. I have also authorized the Secretary of Defense to meet the need for military manpower by calling into active Federal service as many National Guard units and as many units and individuals of the Reserve forces of the Army, Navy, and Air Forces as may be required.

I have directed the Secretary of Defense and the Joint Chiefs of Staff to keep our military manpower needs under constant study, in order that further increases may be made as required. There are now statutory limits on the sizes of the armed forces and, since we may need to exceed these limits, I recommend that they be removed.

To increase the level of our military strength will also require additional supplies and equipment. Procurement of many items has already been accelerated, in some cases for use in Korea, in others to replace reserve stocks which are now being sent to Korea, and in still others to add to our general level of preparedness. Further increases in procurement, resulting in a higher rate of production of military equipment and supplies, will be necessary.

The increases in the size of the armed forces, and the additional supplies and equipment which will be needed, will require additional appropriations. Within the next few days, I will transmit to the Congress specific requests for appropriations in the amount of approximately 10 billion dollars.

These requests for appropriations will be addressed to the needs of our own military forces. Earlier, I referred to the fact that we must also assist other free nations in the strengthening of our common defenses. The action we must take to accomplish this is just as important as the measures required to strengthen our own forces.

The authorization bill for the Mutual Defense Assistance Program for 1951, now before the House of Representatives, is an important immediate step toward the strengthening of our collective security. It should be enacted without delay.¹

But it is now clear that the free nations of the world must step up their common security program. The other nations associated with us in the Mutual Defense Assistance Program, like ourselves, will need to divert additional economic resources to defense purposes. In order to enable the nations associated with us to make their maximum contribution to our common defense, further assistance on our part will be required. Additional assistance may also be needed to increase the strength of certain other free nations whose security is vital to our own.

In the case of the North Atlantic area these requirements will reflect the consultations now going on with the other nations associated with us in the North Atlantic Treaty. As soon as it is possible to determine what each nation will need to do, I shall lay before the Congress a request for such funds as are shown to be necessary to the attainment and maintenance of our common strength at an adequate level.

The free world has made it clear, through the United Nations, that lawless aggression will be met with force. This is the significance of Korea—and it is a significance whose importance cannot be overestimated.

I shall not attempt to predict the course of events. But I am sure that those who have it in their power to unleash or withhold acts of armed aggression must realize that new recourse to aggression in the world today might well strain to the breaking point the fabric of world peace.

The United States can be proud of the part it has played in the United Nations action in this crisis. We can be proud of the unhesitating support of the American people for the resolute actions taken to halt the aggression in Korea and to support the cause of world peace.

The Congress of the United States, by its strong, bipartisan support of the steps we are taking and by repeated actions in support of international cooperation, has contributed most vitally to the cause of peace. The expressions of support which have been forthcoming from the leaders of both political parties for the actions of our Government and of the United Nations in dealing with the present crisis, have buttressed the firm morale of the entire free world in the face of this challenge.

The American people, together with other free peoples, seek a new era in world affairs. We seek a world where all men may live in peace and freedom, with steadily improving living conditions, under governments of their own free choice.

For ourselves, we seek no territory or domination over others. We are determined to maintain our democratic institutions so that Americans now and in the future can enjoy personal liberty, economic opportunity, and political equality. We are concerned with advancing our prosperity and our well-being as a nation, but we know that our future is inseparably joined with the future of other free peoples.

We will follow the course we have chosen with courage and with faith, because we carry in our hearts the flame of freedom. We are fighting for liberty and for peace—and with God's blessing we shall succeed.

18. FIRST REPORT TO THE SECURITY COUNCIL BY THE UNITED NATIONS COMMAND, JULY 24, 1950¹

At 0400 Korean time on Sunday, 25 June 1950, the North Korean Army launched a completely unprovoked invasion of South Korea. North Korean infantry crossed the 38th parallel, led by Soviet-made tanks in an estimated number of 100. The main attack was down the Pochon-Uijongbu-Seoul corridor. Simultaneously, attacks were launched in the Ongjin Peninsula to the West, against Chunchon in the eastern mountains, and down the east coast road. The North Korean Air Force covered the amphibious landings, and attacked Kimpo Airfield, near Seoul. The size of the attack, the fact that it covered the principal areas along the 38th parallel, and the amount and character of material involved, and the use of amphibious landings, indicated clearly that the invasion had been carefully planned for long in advance.

The character and disposition of the Republic of Korea Army indicated that it did not expect this sudden attack. This fact is supported by a report of an observation team of the United Nations Commission on Korea, made along the 38th parallel and dated 24 June 1950.¹ This report stated that its team of observers "had, in the course of a two-week inspection, been left with the impression that the Republican Army was organized entirely for defense and (was) in no condition to carry out a large-scale attack against the forces in the North. The observers found that the Republic of Korea forces were disposed in depth all along the 38th parallel with no concentration of troops at any point, that a large number of Republic of Korea troops were actively engaged in rounding up guerrillas and were, in any case, entirely lacking in the armor, heavy artillery, and air support necessary to carry off an invasion of North Korea." These facts controverted completely the North Korea broadcast from Pyongyang, late in the morning of 25 June, that the Republic of Korea had initiated an attack across the border and that the North Korean Forces had been ordered to repel the attack.

The North Korean invaders were reported to have committed initially 6 divisions of Infantry, 3 Border Constabulary Brigades, supported by approximately 100 Soviet-made T34 and T70 tanks and ample heavy artillery. Their Air Force held complete control of the air, and was at the time estimated to be composed of 100-150 Soviet-made combat planes. The total strength of the North Korean forces was placed at between 90,000 and 100,000, organized in approximately 7 divisions and 5 brigades, well trained and equipped chiefly with excellent Soviet material.

Opposed to this mobile army, Republic of Korea troops were initially deployed along the 38th parallel with elements of 4 divisions, with the remainder in the interior, without tanks or heavy artillery and with only 16 trainers as an air force; an organization assigned primarily for preserving internal security.

With such a discrepancy in character and armament between North and South Korea, the actual date of the assault is immaterial; the potential for it was present for months.

In the light of the above facts, it is apparent that the attack upon South Korea was a carefully-planned, full-scale invasion in force.

¹ See U.N. General Assembly, Official Records, Fifth Session, Supplement No. 16 (A/1360), pp. 40-42. The quotation cited in the U.N. Command report appears to be a paraphrase.

From the attack to the fall of Seoul on 28 June, North Korean forces struck southward across the 38th parallel on 25 June, in four major drives:

A. To the west, a Border Constabulary Brigade attacked in the Ongjin Peninsula against approximately one Republic of Korea regiment and was reported on 26 June in control of the area. However, a considerable number of Republic of Korea men escaped by sea.

B. One North Korean division, plus 42-50 tanks captured Kaesong on the afternoon of 25 June, and later pushed south through Husan toward Seoul. Another North Korean force of from 8,000-10,000 men, plus more than 50 tanks, drove down the Pochon-Uijongbu Corridor toward Seoul.

C. A division of North Korean troops, supported by heavy artillery and tanks, struck south toward Chunchon.

D. Along the east coast, a Border Constabulary Brigade reinforced to approximately 10,000, attacked Kangnung and carried out two amphibious landings further south.

The North Korean attack was initially opposed by five Republic of Korea divisions located in or north of Seoul. They were armed with rifles, machine guns, and other light infantry weapons. Taken completely by surprise, and facing greatly superior equipment, they fought desperately, but were forced to withdraw gradually. Another Republic of Korea division, hastily brought up from the south, was badly mauled in the fighting of 26 June. An official report on 30 June indicated that the Republic of Korea forces had suffered a high percentage of casualties and had lost much equipment in the hurried withdrawal.

On 28 June, aircraft of the United States Air Force, operating pursuant to the resolution of the Security Council of the United Nations,¹ began air operations against the North Korean invaders in support of Republic of Korea forces and later struck at military targets north to the 38th parallel with a view to disrupting the lines of communications and supply of the invading forces.

The badly decimated Republic of Korea forces reformed south of the Nan [Han] River, and with U.S.A.F. assistance, sought to delay the North Korean advance. By sheer weight of numbers and material they were forced back step by step until, on 2 July (Korean time) the town of Suwon, 20 miles south of Seoul, was reported in North Korean hands.

Meanwhile, in pursuance of United Nations recommendations, United States ground forces were committed to the area for stabilization of the front. On 5 July, a very small United States force made contact with the invaders, south of Suwon. On 7 July, upon the recommendation of the Security Council,² the Unified Command was established and General Douglas MacArthur was designated by the President of the United States as the Commanding General of the forces of the members of the United Nations.¹

² Security Council resolution of July 7, 1950; supra, doc. 14.

The first United States troops were small in number and were committed as a holding force only. They were followed by additional supporting forces as rapidly as these could be transported to the battle line. Facing odds at times as high as 20 to one, "Our Army troops, ably supported by tactical aircraft of the United States Air Force and Navy and our Australian friends, flying under most adverse conditions of weather . . . distinguished themselves in the most difficult of military operations—a delaying action."

Under the protection of this delaying action Unified Command forces have steadily been strengthened. Under the combined impact of ground, air and naval forces, the progress of the invasion has been slowed, while the enemy has suffered severe losses on sea and land which are curtailing his supply and transportation capabilities.

At the outset of the North Korean invasion, naval forces available to oppose the aggression consisted of a small Republic of Korea Coast Guard. United States and other forces proceeded to the operational areas and by virtue of overwhelming superiority established a patrol of both coasts of Korea. These forces took the necessary action to prevent movement by sea of forces and supplies for use in operations against the Republic of Korea, including ingress and egress to and from Korean ports of merchant vessels furnishing or likely to furnish assistance to the North Korean authorities. United Nations Naval Forces covered some of the initial necessary evacuations, rendered logistic support, and by operating against North Korean waterborne forces denied the Communist invaders the logistic support of its forces by sea.

Naval units proceeded to accomplish the waterlift of troops and supplies to Korea, patrol by naval aircraft of water and coastal areas, escort duties and coastal patrol functions. Harassing fire from naval units on both coasts shelled targets susceptible to naval gunfire, reached roads, and generally interfered with enemy communications. Naval units have attacked North Korean water traffic where found, and have already destroyed approximately one-third of the vessels originally available to North Korean naval forces.

A new phase of naval operations commenced on 3 July with the first aircraft carrier air strike. They struck on the west coast of North Korea. Subsequent carrier strikes on the east coast of Korea have been made by the British and United States units. The first amphibious landing by United Nations Forces was accomplished on the east coast of Korea on 18 July 1950.

The present naval situation finds both coasts of Korea covered by naval forces of the Unified Command. Harassing fire and fire support missions are being carried out by these forces. Patrols and reconnaissances are being conducted by naval patrol planes over coastal and water areas. Logistic support of men, equipment, and supplies by transport continues with escort.

It has been inspiring to witness the rapidity with which various

Member States have contributed to the naval forces assisting in the restoration of peace in Korea. The United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, Canada and the Netherlands have dispatched vessels to support the United Nations' effort to cut off supplies for the invading hordes from north of the 38th parallel. In carrying out this work, shore bombardments have been conducted where and as necessary to interdict the supply of Communist troops which have moved into that portion of Korea governed by the Republic of Korea under the aegis of the United Nations. Valuable service has also been rendered by a British naval unit in the rescue from the water of air-men who had been compelled to abandon their airplane. The Coast Guard of the Republic of Korea has been rendering invaluable service in providing for the security of the shorelines. Naval air [sic] provided by the United Kingdom has contributed in a major way in the support of landing operations at Pohang-dong.

Upon the request by the Security Council of the United Nations for assistance to defend the Republic of Korea against the North Korean aggressors, the only forces in the area immediately available were those United States and British Commonwealth occupation forces under the command of General MacArthur in the occupation of the Japanese Islands. The size and nature of these forces were sufficient only to perform the occupation duties in Japan.

Before committing the forces, in response to the Security Council resolutions, they had to be regrouped and re-equipped from standards for peacetime occupation of Japan to standards suitable for combat in Korea. This also involved moving these troops, with their equipment and supplies, from their various occupation stations in Japan, by combinations of motor, rail, water and air transportation, to Korea. Even so, all the materials for sustained combat were not immediately available to General MacArthur and therefore had to be rushed to Korea from the United States—a distance of one-third of the way around the globe. Future assistance for the defense of the Republic of Korea, both men and materials, must be transported over corresponding distances from the Member nations of the United Nations rendering such assistance. The well-planned attack by the North Korean regime, the size of their force, their logistical support and their ability to continue to press the attack, account for the degree of initiative enjoyed by the aggressor. The defenders of the Republic of Korea have been forced to submit to the time and place selected by the aggressor, and now must depend upon assistance from nations peacefully disposed and lying not merely hundreds, but thousands of miles away.

From the continuing appearance on the battlefield of large numbers of enemy personnel and equipment, it is now apparent that the North Korean aggressors have available to them resources far in excess of their internal capabilities. This, with the initial advantage of the aggressor, combines to give the enemy a strength that cannot be overcome until the United Nations forces achieve the effect of superiority in weapons and manpower. The task is not a small one when viewed in comparison with the potential resources of the aggressor force.

Until forces of the Unified Command are increased further in strength, the rapidity with which success will be achieved cannot be predicted. However, with the combined efforts of the United Nations, the full effect of the contribution from each member nation will be felt in the ultimate defeat of the aggressors from north of the 38 degree parallel.

In conclusion, it is believed appropriate to quote the Unified Commander's latest estimate of the Korean operations.

"With the deployment in Korea of major elements of the Eighth Army now accomplished the first phase of the campaign has ended and with it the chance for victory by the North Korean Forces. The enemy's plan and great opportunity depended upon the speed with which he could overrun South Korea once he had breached the Han River line and with overwhelming numbers and superior weapons temporarily shattered South Korean resistance. This chance he has now lost through the extraordinary speed with which the Eighth Army has been deployed from Japan to stem his rush. When he crashed the Han Line the way seemed entirely open and victory was within his grasp. The desperate decision to throw in piecemeal American elements as they arrived by every available means of transport from Japan was the only hope to save the situation. The skill and valor thereafter displayed in successive holding actions by the ground forces in accordance with this concept, brilliantly supported in complete co-ordination by air and naval elements, forced the enemy into continued deployments, costly frontal attacks and confused logistics which so slowed his advance and blunted his drive that we have bought the precious time necessary to build a secure base.

"I do not repeat not believe that history records a comparable operation which excelled the speed and precision with which the Eighth Army, the Far East Air Force and the Seventh Fleet have been deployed to a distant land for immediate commitment to major operations. It merits highest commendation for the commanders, staffs and units concerned and attests to their superior training and high state of readiness to meet any eventuality. This finds added emphasis in the fact that the Far East Command, until the President's great pronouncement to support the epochal action of the United Nations, had no repeat no slightest responsibility for the defense of the Free Republic of Korea. With the President's decision it assumed a completely new and added mission.

"It is, of course, impossible to predict with any degree of accuracy future incidents of a military campaign. Over a broad front involving continuous local struggles, there are bound to be ups and downs, losses as well as successes. Our national stabilization line will unquestionably be rectified and tactical improvement will involve planned withdrawals as well as local advances. But the issue of battle is now fully joined and will proceed along lines of action in which we will not repeat not be without choice. Our hold upon the southern part of Korea represents a secure base. Our casualties despite overwhelming odds have been relatively light. Our strength will continually increase while that of the enemy will relatively decrease. His supply line is insecure. He has had his great chance but failed to exploit it. We are now in Korea in force, and with God's help we are there to stay until the constitutional authority of the Republic is fully restored. MacArthur."

9. CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE UNIFIED COMMAND: Resolution of the United Nations Security Council, July 31, 1950¹

The Security Council,
Recognizing the hardships and privations to which the people of Korea are being subjected as a result of the continued prosecution by the North Korean forces of their unlawful attack, and Appreciating the spontaneous offers of assistance to the Korean people which have been made by governments, specialized agencies, and non-governmental organizations,

Requests the Unified Command to exercise responsibility for determining the requirements for the relief and support of the civilian population of Korea, and for establishing in the field the procedures for providing such relief and support;

Requests the Secretary-General to transmit all offers of assistance for relief and support to the Unified Command;

Requests the Unified Command to provide the Security Council with reports, as appropriate, on its relief activities;

Requests the Secretary-General, the Economic and Social Council in accordance with Article 65 of the Charter, other appropriate United Nations principal and subsidiary organs, the specialized agencies in accordance with the terms of their respective agreements with the United Nations, and appropriate non-governmental organizations, to provide such assistance as the Unified Command may request for the relief and support of the civilian population of Korea, and as appropriate in connexion with the responsibilities being carried out by the Unified Command on behalf of the Security Council.

20. REPORT TO THE NATION ON THE SITUATION IN KOREA: Address by the President, September 1, 1950¹

Tonight, I want to talk to you about Korea, about why we are there, and what our objectives are.

As I talk with you, thousands of families in this land of ours have a son, or a brother, or a husband fighting in Korea. I know that your thoughts and hopes are constantly with them—and so are mine.

These men of ours are engaged once more in the age-old struggle for human liberty. Our men, and the men of other free nations, are defending with their lives the cause of freedom in the world. They are fighting for the proposition that peace shall be the law of this earth.

We must and shall support them with every ounce of our strength and with all our hearts. We shall put aside all else for this supreme duty.

No cause has ever been more just or more important.

For the first time in all history, men of many nations are fighting under a single banner to uphold the rule of law in the world. This is an inspiring fact.

If the rule of law is not upheld, we can look forward only to the horror of another world war and ultimate chaos. For our part, we do not intend to let that happen.

TWO COURSES FACED BY FREE WORLD

Two months ago, Communist imperialism turned from the familiar tactics of infiltration and subversion to a brutal attack on the small

¹ Department of State Bulletin, Sept. 11, 1950, pp. 407-410.

Republic of Korea. When that happened, the free and peace-loving nations of the world faced two possible courses.

One course would have been to limit our action to diplomatic protests, while the Communist aggressors went ahead and swallowed up their victim. That would have been the course of appeasement. If the history of the 1930's teaches us anything, it is that appeasement of dictators is the sure road to world war. If aggression were allowed to succeed in Korea, it would be an open invitation to new acts of aggression elsewhere.

The other course is the one which the free world chose. The United Nations made its historic decision to meet military aggression with armed force. The effects of that decision will be felt far beyond Korea. The firm action taken by the United Nations is our best hope of achieving world peace.

It is your liberty and mine which is involved. What is at stake is the free way of life—the right to worship as we please, the right to express our opinions, the right to raise our children in our own way, the right to choose our jobs, the right to plan our own future, and the right to live without fear. All these are bound up in the present action of the United Nations to put down aggression in Korea.

We cannot hope to maintain our own freedom if freedom elsewhere is wiped out. That is why the American people are united in support of our part in this task.

During the last 5 years, we have worked day in and day out to achieve a just and lasting peace. We have given every possible proof of our desire to live at peace with all nations. We have worked for liberty and self-government for people the world over. Most nations have joined with us in this effort, but the Soviet Union and the nations it controls have unceasingly hampered all efforts to achieve a just peace.

The Soviet Union has repeatedly violated its pledges of international cooperation. It has destroyed the independence of its neighbors. It has sought to disrupt those countries it could not dominate. It has built up tremendous armed forces far beyond the needs of its own defense.

Communist imperialism preaches peace but practices aggression.

In these circumstances, the free nations have been compelled to take measures to protect themselves against the aggressive designs of the Communists.

The United Nations was able to act as it did in Korea because the free nations in the years since World War II have created a common determination to work together for peace and freedom.

Every American can be justly proud of the role that our country has played in bringing this about.

RECORD TO CREATE UNITY AMONG FREE NATIONS

We have taken the lead in step after step to create unity and strength among the free nations. The record of these steps is impressive. Let me recall some of them to you.

In 1945, we helped to bring the United Nations into existence at San Francisco.

In 1946, the United States gave its full support to the successful action taken by the United Nations to protect Iran against Communist invasion.

In 1947, we began our military and economic aid to Greece and Turkey, which has helped those countries to keep their independence against Communist attacks and threats.

Also in 1947, by the treaty of Rio de Janeiro, we joined with the other American nations to guarantee the safety of the Western Hemisphere.

In 1948, the Marshall Plan checked the danger of Communist subversion in Europe; and, since that time, it has brought the free nations more closely together in a strong economic framework.

The Berlin airlift, in 1948 and 1949, defeated the Soviet effort to drive the free nations out of the democratic outpost of western Berlin.

The North Atlantic Treaty, in 1949, served notice that the nations of the North Atlantic community would stand together to preserve their freedom.

Today, in 1950, we are going ahead with an enlarged program for military aid to strengthen the common defense of free nations.

Step by step, these achievements in the struggle between freedom and Communist imperialism have brought the free nations closer together.

When the Communist movement turned to open, armed aggression in Korea, the response of the free nations was immediate.

Fifty-three of the fifty-nine members of the United Nations joined in meeting the challenge. Thirty have already pledged concrete aid to the United Nations to put down this aggression.

Thus far, the brunt of the fighting has fallen upon the armed forces of the Republic of Korea and the United States. In addition, naval forces from Australia, Canada, France, Great Britain, the Netherlands, and New Zealand have been and are now in action under the United Nations command. Fighting planes from Australia, Canada, and Great Britain have joined the operation.

Ground forces have been offered by Thailand, the Philippines, Turkey, Australia, France, and other countries. Some British troops have landed in Korea and more are on their way. All of these will serve under the flag of the United Nations and under the United Nations Commander, General MacArthur.

Our own men, with their gallant Korean comrades, have held the breach. In less than 8 weeks, five divisions of United States troops have moved into combat, some of them from bases more than 6,000 miles away. More men are on the way. Fighting in difficult country, under every kind of hardship, American troops have held back overwhelming numbers of the Communist invaders. Our naval and air forces have been carrying the attack to the military bases and supply lines of the aggressors.

Our men have fought with grim gallantry. All of us, especially those of us who are old soldiers, know how worthy they are of a place on that long and honored roll of those who created and preserved liberty for our country.

The soldiers of the Republic of Korea have been fighting fiercely for their own freedom.

The determination of the South Koreans to maintain their independence is shown not only by the valor of their soldiers in the battle line but also by countless supporting activities of the whole population. They are giving every possible assistance to the United Nations forces.

These United Nations troops are still outnumbered. But their hard and valiant fight is bringing results. We hold a firm base of about 3,500 square miles. For weeks, the enemy has been hammering, now at one spot, now at another, sometimes at many points at once. He has been beaten back each time with heavy loss.

The enemy is spending his strength recklessly in desperate attacks. We believe the invasion has reached its peak. The task remaining is to crush it. Our men are confident, the United Nations command is confident, that it will be crushed. The power to do this is being gathered in Korea.

Right now, the battle in Korea is the front line in the struggle between freedom and tyranny. But the fighting there is part of a larger struggle to build a world in which a just and lasting peace can be maintained.

That is why we in the United States must increase our own defensive strength over and above the forces we need in Korea. That is why we must continue to work with other free nations to increase our combined strength.

The Congress is now acting on my request to increase our program of arms aid to other free countries.¹ These nations are greatly increasing their own efforts. Our aid is not a substitute but is an addition to what they themselves do.

In Western Europe alone, there are over 200 million people. Next to ours, their industry is the world's greatest workshop. They are joining with us to develop collective forces for mutual defense—our defense as well as their own.

U.S.—KEY ELEMENT IN STRENGTH

The armed forces of the United States are a key element in the strength of the free world. In view of the threats of aggression which now face us, we shall have to increase these forces, and we shall have to maintain larger forces for a long time to come.

We have had about 1½ million men and women on active duty in our Army, Navy, and Air Force. Our present plans call for increasing this number to close to 3 million, and further increases may be required.

In addition to increasing the size of our armed forces, we must step up sharply the production of guns, tanks, planes, and other military equipment. We shall also have to increase our stockpile of essential materials, and expand our industrial capacity to produce military supplies.

We have the ability and the resources to meet the demands which confront us. Our industry and agriculture have never been stronger or more productive. We will use as much of this economic strength as is needed to defend ourselves and establish peace.

Hitler and the Japanese generals miscalculated badly, 10 years ago, when they thought we would not be able to use our economic power effectively for the defeat of aggression.

Let would-be aggressors make no such mistake today.

We now have over 62 million men and women employed—more than we have ever had before. Our farmers are producing over 20 percent more than they were in 1940. The productive capacity of our manufacturing industry is 60 percent greater than it was 10 years ago, when the Axis dictators threatened the world.

We must now divert a large share of this productive power to defense purposes. To do this will require hard work and sacrifice by all of us. I know all of us are prepared to do whatever is necessary in the cause of peace and freedom. We have never yet failed to give all that is needed in that cause, and we never will.

In order to increase our defense effort rapidly enough to meet the danger that we face, we shall have to make many changes in our way of living and working here at home. We shall have to give up many things we enjoy. We shall all have to work harder and longer. To prevent inflation and runaway prices, we shall have to impose certain restrictions upon ourselves.

The Congress has today completed action on legislation to enable us to channel the necessary effort to defense production, to increase our productive capacity, and to hold down inflation.¹

After this legislation is signed, I intend to talk to you again, to explain what your Government proposes to do, and how each citizen can play his part in this national effort.

As we move forward to arm ourselves more quickly in the days ahead and as we strive with the United Nations for victory in Korea, we must keep clearly in mind what we believe in and what we are trying to do. We also want the rest of the world to understand clearly our aims and our hopes.

STATEMENT OF U.S. AIMS AND POLICY

First: We believe in the United Nations. When we ratified its Charter, we pledged ourselves to seek peace and security through this world organization. We kept our word when we went to the support of the United Nations in Korea 2 months ago. We shall never go back on that pledge.

Second: We believe the Koreans have a right to be free, independent, and united—as they want to be. Under the direction and guidance of the United Nations, we, with others, will do our part to help them enjoy that right. The United States has no other aim in Korea.

Third: We do not want the fighting in Korea to expand into a neral war. It will not spread unless Communist imperialism draws her armies and governments into the fight of the aggressors against the United Nations.

Fourth: We hope in particular that the people of China will not be misled or forced into fighting against the United Nations and against the American people, who have always been and still are their friends. Only the Communist imperialism, which has already started to dismember China, could gain from China's involvement in war.

Fifth: We do not want Formosa or any part of Asia for ourselves. We believe that the future of Formosa, like that of any other territory in dispute, should be settled peacefully. We believe that it should be settled by international action and not by the decision of the United States or of any other state alone. The mission of the Seventh Fleet is to keep Formosa out of the conflict. Our purpose is peace, not conquest.

Sixth: We believe in freedom for all the nations of the Far East. That is one of the reasons why we are fighting under the United Nations for the freedom of Korea. We helped the Philippines become independent, and we have supported the national aspirations to independence of other Asian countries. Russia has never voluntarily given up any territory it has acquired in the Far East; it has never given independence to any people who have fallen under its control. We not only want freedom for the peoples of Asia but we also want to help them secure for themselves better health, more food, better clothes and homes, and the chance to live their own lives in peace. The things we want for the people of Asia are the same things we want for the people of the rest of the world.

Seventh: We do not believe in aggressive or preventive war. Such war is the weapon of dictators, not of free democratic countries like the United States. We are arming only for defense against aggression. Even though Communist imperialism does not believe in peace, it can be discouraged from new aggression if we and other peoples are strong, determined, and united.

Eighth: We want peace and we shall achieve it. Our men are fighting for peace today in Korea. We are working for peace constantly in the United Nations and in all the capitals of the world. Our workers, our farmers, our businessmen, all our vast resources, are helping now to create the strength which will make peace secure. We want peace not only for its own sake but because we want all the peoples of the world, including ourselves, to be free to devote their full energies to making their lives richer and happier. We will give what help we can to make this universal human wish come true.

We invite all the nations of the world, without exception, to join with us in this great work.

The events in Korea have shown us again all the misery and horrors of war. The North Koreans have learned that the penalties of armed conflict fall as heavily on those who act as tools for the Communist dictatorship as they do on its victims. There will be no profit for any people who follow the Communist dictatorship down its dark and bloody path.

Against the futile and tragic course of dictatorship, we uphold, for all people, the way of freedom—the way of mutual cooperation and international peace. We assert that mankind can find progress and advancement along the path of peace. At this critical hour in the history of the world, our country has been called upon to give of its leadership, its efforts, and its resources, to maintain peace and justice among nations. We have responded to that call. We will not fail.

The task which has fallen upon our beloved country is a great one. In carrying it out, we ask God to purge us of all selfishness and meanness and to give us strength and courage for the days ahead.

21. RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE AGGRESSION IN KOREA: Report of the United Nations Commission in Korea, September 4, 1950 (Excerpt)¹

Part Four

ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSIONS

A. RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE AGGRESSION

202. The invasion of the territory of the Republic of Korea by the armed forces of the North Korean authorities, which began on 25 June 1950, was an act of aggression initiated without warning and without provocation, in execution of a carefully prepared plan.

203. This plan of aggression, it is now clear, was an essential part of the policy of the North Korean authorities, the object of which was to secure control over the whole of Korea. If control could not be gained by peaceful means, it would be achieved by overthrowing the Republic of Korea, either by undermining it from within or, should that prove ineffective, by resorting to direct aggression. As the methods used for undermining the Republic from within proved unsuccessful, the North Korean authorities launched an invasion of the territory of the Republic of Korea.

B. ORIGIN AND NATURE OF THE CONFLICT

204. The origin of the conflict is to be found in the artificial division of Korea and in the failure, in 1945, of the occupying Powers to reach agreement on the method to be used for giving independence to Korea.²

This failure was not due to anything inherent in the attitude of the people of Korea themselves, but was a reflection of those wider and more fundamental differences of outlook and policy which have become so marked a feature of the international scene.

205. This artificial division was consolidated by the exclusion from North Korea of the United Nations Temporary Commission, which had been charged by the General Assembly to observe the holding of elections on a democratic basis in the whole of Korea.¹ In the circumstances, it was decided to hold such elections in South Korea alone.

206. Had internationally-supervised elections been allowed to take place in the whole of Korea, and had a unified and independent Korea thereby come into existence, the present conflict could never have arisen.

C. PROSPECTS OF UNIFICATION

207. The Korean people, one in race, language and culture, fervently desire to live in a unified and independent Korea. Unification can be the only aim regarding Korea. It did, however, appear to the Commission, before the aggression took place, that unification through negotiation was unlikely to be achieved if such negotiation involved the holding of internationally-supervised elections on a democratic basis in the whole of Korea. Experience suggested that the North Korean authorities would never agree to such elections.

208. It was hoped that, at some stage, it might be possible to break down the economic and social barriers between the two political entities as a step toward unification. That too proved illusory, as the North Korean authorities persisted in their policy of aiming at the overthrow of the Republic of Korea.

209. After the consolidation of the division of Korea, propaganda and hostile activities on the part of the North Korean authorities accentuated tension which, in turn, stiffened the attitude of the Government and people of the Republic of Korea, and even further prejudiced such possibility of unification by negotiation as might have remained. Notwithstanding the continued efforts of the Commission, it appeared on the eve of the aggression that the Korean peninsula would remain divided indefinitely, or at least until international tension had slackened.

D. DEVELOPMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT IN THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA

210. The necessity to safeguard the stability and security of the Republic of Korea from the threat from the North gradually became a controlling factor in all the major activities of the administration of the Republic, and absorbed energies and resources which were needed to develop the new form of representative government and to carry out the economic and social reconstruction programme.

¹ See U.N. General Assembly Resolutions 112 (II) of Nov. 14, 1947 (A Decade of American Foreign Policy, pp. 677-678); 195 (III) of Dec. 12, 1948 (U.N. General Assembly, Official Records, Third Session, Part I, Resolutions (A/810), pp. 25-27); and 293 (IV) of Oct. 21, 1949 (A Decade of American Foreign Policy, pp. 682-684).

211. The first two years of the new National Assembly reflected clearly the difficulties which it would be normal to expect in a body dealing with a new and unfamiliar political structure. It had become clear, long before the act of aggression occurred, that the Legislature was making good progress in its efforts to exert parliamentary control over all departments of government, and would not rest content until its relations with the Executive had been satisfactorily adjusted. The growing civic responsibility shown by the Legislature augured well for the future of representative government in Korea.

212. At the elections of 30 May 1950, the people showed very considerable enthusiasm, and the electoral machinery functioned well. Among the cases of interference with candidates which occurred, some were explainable in the light of the stringent precautions which the Government found it necessary to take in order to safeguard the stability and security of the State against the threat from the North. Although there appeared to be little justification for interference in some other cases, the results of the elections, in which many candidates critical of the Administration were returned, showed that the voters were in fact able to exercise their democratic freedom of choice among candidates, and had cast their votes accordingly. The results also showed popular support of the Republic, and a determination to improve the Administration by constitutional means.

213. The division of Korea added to the economic difficulties that had arisen at the end of the Japanese domination, and made it most difficult for the Republic of Korea to become self-supporting. Funds which might have been expended for the execution of the social and economic programme of the Republic were consumed by heavy defence expenditures. Nevertheless, when the aggression occurred, substantial progress was being made with that programme.

E. KOREAN NEEDS AND ASPIRATIONS

214. Serious problems of reconstruction and rehabilitation, particularly the grave refugee problem, already confront the country. To these problems will be added problems of yet greater magnitude when the military conflict comes to an end. It will be quite beyond the capacity of the country to provide from its own resources means for rehabilitation. A healthy and viable democracy in Korea cannot come into being unless very considerable aid and assistance are provided from outside Korea.

215. Finally, as the division of the country and the resulting antagonisms were artificial, the Commission believes that, when the conditions under which they arose disappear, it will be possible for the Korean people of both North and South to come again together, to live in peace and to build the strong foundations of a free, democratic Korea.

22. CALL FOR THE SURRENDER OF THE NORTH KOREAN FORCES: Message From the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, to the Commander-in-Chief, North Korean Forces, October 1, 1950¹

The early and total defeat and complete destruction of your armed forces and war making potential is now inevitable. In order that the decisions of the United Nations may be carried out with a minimum of further loss of life and destruction of property, I, as the United Nations Commander in Chief, call upon you and the forces under your command, in whatever part of Korea situated, forthwith to lay down your arms and cease hostilities under such military supervision as I may direct, and I call upon you at once to liberate all United Nations prisoners of war and civilian internees under your control and to make adequate provision for their protection, care, maintenance and immediate transportation to such places as I indicate. North Korean forces, including prisoners of war in the hands of the United Nations Command, will continue to be given the care dictated by civilized custom and practice and permitted to return to their homes as soon as practicable. I shall anticipate your early decision upon this opportunity to avoid the further useless shedding of blood and destruction of property.

23. ESTABLISHMENT OF THE UNITED NATIONS COMMISSION FOR THE UNIFICATION AND REHABILITATION OF KOREA (UNCURK): Resolution 376 (V) of the United Nations General Assembly, October 7, 1950¹

The General Assembly,

Having regard to its resolutions of 14 November 1947 (112 (II)),² of 12 December 1948 (195 (III))³ and of 21 October 1949 (293 (IV)),⁴

Having received and considered the report⁵ of the United Nations Commission on Korea,

Mindful of the fact that the objectives set forth in the resolutions referred to above have not been fully accomplished and, in particular, that the unification of Korea has not yet been achieved, and that an attempt has been made by an armed attack from North Korea to extinguish by force the Government of the Republic of Korea,

Recalling the General Assembly declaration of 12 December 1948 that there has been established a lawful government (the Government of the Republic of Korea) having effective control and jurisdiction over that part of Korea where the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea was able to observe and consult and in which the great majority of the people of Korea reside; that this government is based on elections which were a valid expression of the free will of the electorate of that part of Korea and which were observed by the Temporary Commission; and that this is the only such government in Korea,

Having in mind that United Nations armed forces are at present operating in Korea in accordance with the recommendations of the Security Council of 27 June 1950,⁶ subsequent to its resolution of 25 June 1950,⁷ that Members of the United Nations furnish such assistance to the Republic of Korea as may be necessary to repel the armed attack and to restore international peace and security in the area,

Recalling that the essential objective of the resolutions of the General Assembly referred to above was the establishment of a unified, independent and democratic Government of Korea,

1. Recommends that

(a) All appropriate steps be taken to ensure conditions of stability throughout Korea;

(b) All constituent acts be taken, including the holding of elections, under the auspices of the United Nations, for the establishment of a unified, independent and democratic government in the sovereign State of Korea;

(c) All sections and representative bodies of the population of Korea, South and North, be invited to co-operate with the organs of the United Nations in the restoration of peace, in the holding of elections and in the establishment of a unified government;

(d) United Nations forces should not remain in any part of Korea other than so far as necessary for achieving the objectives specified in sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) above;

(e) All necessary measures be taken to accomplish the economic rehabilitation of Korea;

2. Resolves that

(a) A Commission consisting of Australia, Chile, Netherlands, Pakistan, Philippines, Thailand and Turkey, to be known as the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea, be established to (i) assume the functions hitherto exercised by the present United Nations Commission on Korea; (ii) represent the United Nations in bringing about the establishment of a unified, independent and democratic government of all Korea; (iii) exercise such responsibilities in connexion with relief and rehabilitation in Korea as may be determined by the General Assembly after receiving the recommendations of the Economic and Social Council. The United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea should proceed to Korea and begin to carry out its functions as soon as possible;

(b) Pending the arrival in Korea of the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea, the governments of the States represented on the Commission should form an Interim Committee composed of representatives meeting at the seat of the United Nations to consult with and advise the United Nations Unified Command in the light of the above recommendations; the Interim Committee should begin to function immediately upon the approval of the present resolution by the General Assembly;

(c) The Commission shall render a report to the next regular session of the General Assembly and to any prior special session which might be called to consider the subject-matter of the present resolution, and shall render such interim reports as it may deem appropriate to the Secretary-General for transmission to Members;¹

¹ Concerning the activities of UNCURK, see Reports of the U.N. Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea for the periods (1) Oct. 7, 1950, to Sept. 1951 [U.N. The General Assembly furthermore,

Mindful of the fact that at the end of the present hostilities the task of rehabilitating the Korean economy will be of great magnitude,

3. Requests the Economic and Social Council, in consultation with the specialized agencies, to develop plans for relief and rehabilitation on the termination of hostilities and to report to the General Assembly within three weeks of the adoption of the present resolution by the General Assembly;

4. Also recommends the Economic and Social Council to expedite the study of long-term measures to promote the economic development and social progress of Korea, and meanwhile to draw the attention of the authorities which decide requests for technical assistance to the urgent and special necessity of affording such assistance to Korea;

5. Expresses its appreciation of the services rendered by the members of the United Nations Commission on Korea in the performance of their important and difficult task;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to provide the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea with adequate staff and facilities, including technical advisers as required; and authorizes the Secretary-General to pay the expenses and per diem of a representative and alternate from each of the States members of the Commission.

24. SECOND CALL FOR THE SURRENDER OF THE NORTH KOREAN FORCES: Message From the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, to the Commander-in-Chief, North Korean Forces, and to All North Koreans, October 9, 1950¹

In order that the decisions of the United Nations may be carried out with a minimum of further loss of life and destruction of property, I, as the United Nations Commander-in-Chief, for the last time call upon you and the forces under your command in whatever part of Korea situated, to lay down your arms and cease hostilities. And I call upon all north Koreans to cooperate fully with the United Nations in establishing a unified, independent and democratic government of Korea, assured that they will be treated justly and that the United Nations will act to relieve and rehabilitate all parts of a unified Korea. Unless immediate response is made by you in the name of the north Korean government, I shall at once proceed to take such military actions as may be necessary to enforce the decrees of the United Nations.

COORDINATION OF POLICY AND STRATEGY FOLLOWING THE INCHON LANDING: Statement by the President on Wake Island, October 15, 1950¹

I have met with General of the Army Douglas MacArthur for the purpose of getting first-hand information and ideas from him. I did not wish to take him away from the scene of action in Korea any longer than necessary, and, therefore, I came to meet him at Wake. Our conference has been highly satisfactory.

The very complete unanimity of view which prevailed enabled us to finish our discussions rapidly in order to meet General MacArthur's desire to return at the earliest possible moment. It was apparent at the excellent coordination which has existed between Washington and the field, to which General MacArthur paid tribute, greatly facilitated the discussion.

After I had talked with General MacArthur privately, we met together with our advisers. These joint talks were then followed by technical consultations in which the following participated:

General MacArthur and Ambassador John Muccio; Mr. Averell Harriman, Special Assistant to the President; Secretary of the Army Frank Pace; General of the Army Omar N. Bradley, Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff; Admiral Arthur W. Radford, Commander in Chief of the Pacific Fleet; Assistant Secretary of State Dean Rusk; and Ambassador-at-large Philip C. Jessup.

Primarily, we talked about the problems in Korea which are General MacArthur's most pressing responsibilities. I asked him for information on the military aspects.

I got from him a clear picture of the heroism and high capacity of the United Nations forces under his command. We also discussed the steps necessary to bring peace and security to the area as rapidly as possible in accordance with the intent of the resolution of the United Nations General Assembly² and in order to get our armed forces out of Korea as soon as their United Nations mission is completed.

We devoted a good deal of time to the major problem of peaceful reconstruction of Korea which the United Nations is facing and to the contribution of which we intend to make the best contribution of which the United States is capable.

This is a challenging task which must be done properly if we are to achieve the peaceful goals for which the United Nations has been fighting.

The success which has attended the combined military effort must be supplemented by both spiritual and material rehabilitation. It is essentially a task of helping the Koreans to do a job which they can do themselves better than anyone else can do it for them.

Department of State Bulletin, Oct. 23, 1950, pp. 643-644.
Res. 376 (V) of Oct. 7, 1950; supra, doc. 23.

The United Nations can, however, render essential help with supplies and technical advice as well as with the vital problem of rebuilding their educational system.

Meanwhile, I can say I was greatly impressed with what General MacArthur and Ambassador Muccio told me about what has already been done and is now being done to bring order out of chaos and to restore to the Korean people the chance for a good life in peace.

For example, the main rail line from Inchon to Suwon was opened to rail traffic in less than 10 days after the Inchon landing. The rail line from Pusan to the west bank of the Han River opposite Seoul was open to one-way rail traffic about October 8. Bridge and highway reconstruction is progressing rapidly. Power and the water supply in Seoul were reestablished within a week after the reentry into the capital.

General MacArthur paid a particularly fine tribute to the service being rendered in Korea by Ambassador Muccio.

I asked General MacArthur also to explain at first hand his views on the future of Japan with which I was already generally familiar through his written reports. As already announced, we are moving forward with preliminary negotiations for a peace treaty to which Japan is entitled.

General MacArthur and I look forward with confidence to a new Japan which will be both peaceful and prosperous.

I also asked General MacArthur to tell me his ideas on the ways in which the United States can most effectively promote its policies of assisting the United Nations to promote and maintain international peace and security throughout the Pacific area.

On all these matters, I have found our talks most helpful and I am very glad to have had this chance to talk them over with one of America's great soldier-statesmen, who is also now serving in the unique position of the first Commander in Chief of United Nations peace forces.

We are fully aware of the dangers which lie ahead, but we are confident that we can surmount these dangers with three assets which we have:

- first, unqualified devotion to peace;
- second, unity with our fellow peace-loving members of the United Nations;
- third, our determination and growing strength.

C. CHINESE COMMUNIST INTERVENTION AND ITS CONSEQUENCES, NOVEMBER 1950-JUNE 1951

26. PRESENCE OF CHINESE COMMUNIST FORCES IN NORTH KOREA: Special Report of the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, November 5, 1950¹

I herewith submit a special report of the United Nations Command operations in Korea which I believe should be brought to the attention of the United Nations.

Introduction:

The United Nations Forces in Korea are continuing their drive to the north and their efforts to destroy further the effectiveness of the enemy as a fighting force are proving successful. However, presently in certain areas of Korea, the United Nations Forces are meeting a new foe. It is apparent to our fighting forces, and our intelligence agencies have confirmed the fact, that the United Nations are presently in hostile contact with Chinese Communist military units deployed for action against the forces of the United Command.

The fact of intervention:

Hereafter, in summary form, are confirmed intelligence reports substantiating the fact that forces other than Korean are resisting our efforts to carry out the resolutions of the United Nations:

A. 22 August: Approximately 50 bursts heavy anti-aircraft fire from Manchurian side of Yalu River against RB-29 flying at 7000 feet over Korea in the vicinity of the Sui-Ho reservoir; damage, none; time 1600 K; weather, 10 miles visibility, high broken clouds.

B. 24 August: Approximately 40 bursts heavy anti-aircraft fire from Manchurian side of Yalu River against RB-29 flying at 10,000 feet over Korea in the vicinity of Sinuiju; damage, none, time 1500K; weather, 20 miles visibility.

C. 15 October: Anti-aircraft fire from the Manchurian side of Yalu River against a flight of 4 F-51's flying near the Sinuiju airfield on the Korean side of the river; damage, 1 aircraft total loss; time, 1445I; weather, overcast at 8000 feet; 8 to 10 miles visibility.

D. 16 October: The 370th Regiment of the 124th Division of the Chinese Communist 42nd Army, consisting of approximately 2,500 troops, crossed the Yalu River (Korean border) at Wan Po Jin, and proceeded to the area of Chosen and Fusen Dams in North Korea where they came in contact with UN forces approximately 40 miles north of Hamhung.

E. 17 October: Approximately 15 bursts heavy anti-aircraft fire from Manchurian side of Yalu River against RB-29 flying at 10,000 feet over Korea in the vicinity of Sinuiju; damage, none; time 1200I; weather, 8 miles visibility, low clouds 2,300 feet.

F. 20 October: A Chinese Communist Task Force known as the "56th" unit consisting of approximately 5,000 troops crossed the Yalu River (Korean border) at Antung and deployed to positions in Korea south of the Sui-Ho Dam. A captured Chinese Communist soldier of this Task Force states that his group was organized out of the regular Chinese Communist 40th Army stationed at Antung, Manchuria.

G. 1 November: A flight of F-51's was attacked early in the afternoon by 6 to 9 Jet aircraft which flew across the Yalu River into Manchuria. No damage was done to US aircraft. A red star was observed on the top of the right wing on one of the Jet aircraft.

H. 1 November: Anti-aircraft fire from the Manchurian side of the Yalu River directed against a flight of 13 F-80 aircraft was observed in the vicinity of Sinuiju at 1345 hours. This resulted in the total loss of 1 UN aircraft.

I. 30 October: Interrogation of 19 Chinese prisoners of war identified two additional regiments of 124 CCF¹ Division, the 371 and the 372 in the vicinity of Changjin.

J. 2 November: Interrogation of prisoners of war indicates the 54 CCF unit in Korea. This unit is reported to have same organization as 55 and 56 units, but to be drawn from the 112, 113 and 114 Divisions of the 38 CCF Army.

K. 3 November: Further interrogation of Chinese prisoners of war indicates 56 CCF unit organized from elements of 118, 119 and 120 CCF Divisions of the 40 CCF Army.

L. 4 November: As of this date, a total of 35 CCF prisoners had been taken in Korea.

The continued employment of Chinese Communist forces in Korea and the hostile attitude assumed by such forces, either inside or outside Korea, are matters which it is incumbent upon me to bring at once to the attention of the UN.

27. CHINESE COMMUNIST INTERVENTION IN KOREA: Communiqué by the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, November 6, 1950²

The military position of the United Nations forces in the western sector of North Korea is now sufficiently stabilized and information on enemy unit identifications adequately evaluated to permit me to put the situation growing out of the last few days' operations in proper perspective.

The Korean war was brought to a practical end with the closing of the trap on enemy elements north of Pyongyang and seizure of the east coastal area, resulting in raising the number of enemy prisoners of war in our hands to well over 135,000, which, with other losses amounting to over 200,000, brought casualties to 335,000, representing a fair estimate of North Korean total military strength.

The defeat of the North Koreans and destruction of their armies was thereby decisive. In the face of this victory of United Nations arms, the Communists committed one of the most offensive acts of international lawlessness of historic record by moving without any notice of belligerency elements of alien Communist forces across the Yalu River into North Korea and massing a great concentration of possible reinforcing divisions with adequate supply behind the privileged sanctuary of the adjacent Manchurian border.

A possible trap was thereby surreptitiously laid, calculated to encompass the destruction of the United Nations forces engaged in restoring order and the processes of civil government in the North Korean border area.

This potential danger was avoided with minimum losses only by the timely detection and skillful maneuvering of the United Nations commander responsible for that sector who, with great perspicacity and skill, completely revised the movement of his forces in order to achieve the greater integration of tactical power necessitated by the new situation, and avert any possibility of a great military reverse.

The present situation, therefore, is this:

While the North Korean forces with which we were initially engaged have been destroyed or rendered impotent for military action, a new and fresh army now faces us, backed up by a possibility of large alien reserves, and adequate supply within easy reach to the enemy but beyond the limits of our present sphere of military action.

Whether and to what extent these reserves will be moved forward to reinforce units now committed remains to be seen and is a matter of the gravest international significance.

Our present mission is limited to the destruction of those forces now arrayed against us in North Korea, with a view to achieving the United Nations' objective to bring unity and peace to the Korean nation and people.

28. RETENTION OF THE KOREAN-CHINESE FRONTIER:

Draft Resolution of the United Nations Security Council, November 10, 1950¹

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution of 25 June 1950,² determining that the North Korean forces had committed a breach of the peace and calling upon all Members of the United Nations to refrain from giving assistance to the North Korean authorities,

Recalling the resolution adopted by the General Assembly on 7 October 1950,³ which sets forth the policies of the United Nations in respect to Korea,

³ Res. 376 (V); supra, doc. 23.

Having noted from the special report of the United Nations Command in Korea dated 5 November 1950 ¹ that Chinese communist military units are deployed for action against the forces of the United Nations in Korea,

Affirming that United Nations forces should not remain in any part of Korea otherwise than so far as necessary for achieving the objectives of stability throughout Korea and the establishment of a unified independent and democratic government in the sovereign State of Korea, as set forth in the resolution of the General Assembly dated 7 October 1950,

Insistent that no action be taken which might lead to the spread of the Korean conflict to other areas and thereby further endanger international peace and security,

Calls upon all States and authorities, and in particular those responsible for the action noted above, to refrain from assisting or encouraging the North Korean authorities, to prevent their nationals or individuals or units of their armed forces from giving assistance to North Korean forces and to cause the immediate withdrawal of any such nationals, individuals, or units which may presently be in Korea;

Affirms that it is the policy of the United Nations to hold the Chinese frontier with Korea inviolate and fully to protect legitimate Chinese and Korean interests in the frontier zone;

Calls attention to the grave danger which continued intervention by Chinese forces in Korea would entail for the maintenance of such a policy;

Requests the Interim Committee on Korea and the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea to consider urgently and to assist in the settlement of any problems relating to conditions on the Korean frontier in which States or authorities on the other side of the frontier have an interest, and suggests that the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea proceed to the area as soon as possible, and, pending its arrival that it utilize the assistance of such States members of the Commission as now have representatives in the area for this purpose.

29. EXTENT OF THE CHINESE COMMUNIST INTERVENTION IN KOREA: Special Communiqué by the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, November 28, 1950 ²

Enemy reactions developed in the course of our assault operations of the past four days disclose that a major segment of the Chinese continental armed forces in army, corps and divisional organization of an aggregate strength of over 200,000 men is now arrayed against the United Nations forces in North Korea.

² Military Situation in the Far East: Hearings Before the Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, 82d Congress, 1st Session, p. 3495. Reprinted from the New York Times, Nov. 29, 1950.

There exists the obvious intent and preparation for support of these forces by heavy reinforcements now concentrated within the privileged sanctuary north of the international boundary and constantly moving forward.

Consequently, we face an entirely new war. This has shattered the high hopes we entertained that the intervention of the Chinese was only of a token nature on a volunteer and individual basis as publicly announced, and that therefore the war in Korea could be brought to a rapid close by our movement to the international boundary and the prompt withdrawal thereafter of United Nations forces, leaving Korean problems for settlement by the Koreans themselves.

It now appears to have been the enemy's intent, in breaking off contact with our forces some two weeks ago, to secure the time necessary surreptitiously to build up for a later surprise assault upon our lines in overwhelming force, taking advantage of the freezing of all rivers and roadbeds which would have materially reduced the effectiveness of our air interdiction and permitted a greatly accelerated forward movement of enemy reinforcements and supplies. This plan has been disrupted by our own offensive action, which forced upon the enemy a premature engagement.

General MacArthur later issued this additional paragraph to the communiqué:

This situation, repugnant as it may be, poses issues beyond the authority of the United Nations military council—issues which must find their solution within the councils of the United Nations and chancelleries of the world.

30. ESTABLISHMENT OF THE UNITED NATIONS KOREAN RECONSTRUCTION AGENCY (UNKRA): Resolution 410 (V) of the United Nations General Assembly, December 1, 1950¹

A

The General Assembly,

Having regard to its resolution of 7 October 1950 on the problem of the independence of Korea,²

Having received and considered a report of the Economic and Social Council submitted in accordance with that resolution,³

Mindful that the aggression by North Korean forces and their warfare against the United Nations seeking to restore peace in the area has resulted in great devastation and destruction which the Korean people cannot themselves repair,

Recognizing that as a result of such aggression the people of Korea are desperately in need of relief supplies and materials and help in reconstructing their economy,

Deeply moved by the sufferings of the Korean people and determined to assist in their alleviation,

Convinced that the creation of a United Nations programme of relief and rehabilitation for Korea is necessary both to the maintenance of lasting peace in the area and to the establishment of the economic foundations for the building of a unified and independent nation,

Considering that, under the said resolution of 7 October 1950, the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea is the principal representative of the United Nations in Korea and hence must share in the responsibility for the work undertaken by the United Nations in furtherance of the objects and purposes mentioned in the said resolution,

Considering that it is nevertheless desirable to set up a special authority with broad powers to plan and supervise rehabilitation and relief and to assume such functions and responsibilities related to planning and supervision, to technical and administrative matters, and to questions affecting organization and implementation as are to be exercised under the plans for relief and rehabilitation approved by the General Assembly, such authority to carry out its responsibilities in close cooperation with the Commission,

A. ESTABLISHMENT OF THE UNITED NATIONS KOREAN RECONSTRUCTION AGENCY FOR THE RELIEF AND REHABILITATION OF KOREA

1. Establishes the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency (UNKRA) under the direction of a United Nations Agent General, who shall be assisted by one or more deputies. The Agent General shall be responsible to the General Assembly for the conduct (in accordance with the policies established by the General Assembly and having regard to such general policy recommendations as the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea may make) of the programme of relief and rehabilitation in Korea, as that programme may be determined from time to time by the General Assembly;

2. Authorizes the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea:

(a) To recommend to the Agent General such policies concerning the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency's programme and activities as the Commission may consider necessary for the effective discharge of the Commission's responsibilities in relation to the establishment of a unified, independent and democratic government in Korea;

(b) To determine, after consultation with the Agent General, the geographical areas within which the Agency shall operate at any time;

(c) To designate authorities in Korea with which the Agent General may establish relationships; and to advise the Agent General on the nature of such relationships;

(d) To take such steps as may be needed to support the Agent

General in fulfilling his task in accordance with the policies established by the General Assembly for relief and rehabilitation;

(e) To consider the reports of the Agent General to the General Assembly and to transmit any comments thereon to the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly;

(f) To call for information on those aspects of the work of the Agent General which the Commission may consider necessary for the proper performance of its work;

3. Authorizes the Commission to consult from time to time with the Agent General in regard to the provisional programme adopted by the General Assembly on the recommendation of the Economic and Social Council and especially with regard to the adequacy of that programme to meet the needs of Korea as defined in the statement of general policy, and to make recommendations thereon to the Economic and Social Council;

4. Directs the Agent General:

(a) To co-ordinate his programme with measures taken by the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea to carry out the recommendations of the General Assembly relating to the establishment of a unified, independent and democratic government in Korea, and to support the Commission in fulfilling this task;

(b) To commence the operation of the programme in Korea at such time as may be agreed upon by the United Nations Unified Command, the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea and the Agent General;

(c) To consult with and generally be guided by the advice of the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea on the matters set forth under paragraph 2 (a) and be governed by its advice on the matters covered in paragraphs 2 (b) and 2 (c);

5. Further directs the Agent General, in the carrying out of his functions:

(a) To ascertain, after consultation with the designated authorities in Korea, the requirements for supplies and services for relief and rehabilitation made necessary by the consequences of armed conflict in Korea;

(b) To provide for the procurement and shipment of supplies and services and for their effective distribution and utilization within Korea;

(c) To consult with and assist the appropriate authorities in Korea with respect to measures necessary for the rehabilitation of the Korean economy and the effective distribution and utilization within Korea of supplies and services furnished;

(d) To submit reports to the General Assembly through the Secretary-General, transmitting copies simultaneously to the United and to the Economic and Social Council;¹

(e) To be guided in matters of administration, to the extent consistent with the special requirements of the programme, by the rules and regulations established for the operation of the Secretariat of the United Nations;

Specifically he shall:

- (1) Select and appoint his staff in accordance with general arrangements made in agreement with the Secretary-General, including such of the staff rules and regulations of the United Nations as the Agent General and the Secretary-General shall agree are applicable;
- (2) Utilize, wherever appropriate, and within budgetary limitations, the existing facilities of the United Nations;
- (3) Establish, in consultation with the Secretary-General and the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions and in agreement with the Advisory Committee established under paragraph 6 below, financial regulations for the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency;
- (4) Arrange, in consultation with the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, for the rendering and audit of the accounts of the Agency under procedures similar to those applicable to the rendering and audit of the accounts of the United Nations;

6. Establishes an Advisory Committee consisting of representatives of five Member States to advise the Agent General with regard to major financial, procurement, distribution and other economic problems pertaining to his planning and operations.² The Committee shall meet on the call of the Agent General but not less than four times a year. The meetings of the Committee shall be held at the Headquarters of the United Nations except in special circumstances, when the Committee, after consultation with the Agent General, may meet elsewhere if it deems that this would be essential to the proper performance of its work. The Committee shall determine its own methods of work and rules of procedure;

7. Requests the Secretary-General, after consulting the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea and the Advisory Committee, to appoint the United Nations Agent General for Korean Reconstruction, and authorizes the Agent General to appoint one or more Deputy Agents General in consultation with the Secretary-General;

8. Authorizes the Secretary-General to establish a special account to which should be credited all contributions in cash, kind or services, the resources credited to the account to be used exclusively for the programme of relief and rehabilitation and administrative expenses connected therewith; and directs the Secretary-General to make cash withdrawals from the account upon request of the Agent General. The Agent General is authorized to use contributions in kind or services at his discretion;

9. Recommends that the Agent General in carrying out his functions:

(a) Make use at his discretion of facilities, services and personnel that may be available to him through existing national and international agencies and organizations both governmental and non-governmental;

(b) Consult with the Secretary-General and the heads of the specialized agencies before appointing his principal subordinate personnel in their respective fields of competence;

(c) Make use of the advice and technical assistance of the United Nations and the specialized agencies and, where appropriate, request them to undertake specific projects and special tasks either at their own expense or with funds made available by the Agent General;

(d) Maintain close contact with the Secretary-General for the purpose of ensuring fullest co-ordination of efforts of the organs of the United Nations and the specialized agencies in support of the programme;

10. Authorizes the Agent General to enter into agreements with such authorities in Korea as the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea may designate, containing terms and conditions governing measures affecting the distribution and utilization in Korea of the supplies and services furnished, in accordance with the statement of general policy on Korean relief and rehabilitation contained in section B of the present resolution;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to make available to the maximum extent possible, and subject to appropriate financial arrangements, such facilities, advice and services as the Agent General may request;

12. Requests the specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations to make available to the maximum extent possible, and subject to appropriate financial arrangements, such facilities, advice and services as the Agent General may request;

13. Requests the Economic and Social Council to review the reports of the Agent General and any comments which the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea may submit thereon, and such other data as may be available on the progress of relief and rehabilitation in Korea and to make appropriate reports and recommendations thereon to the General Assembly;

14. Calls upon all governments, specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations, pending the beginning of operations by the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency, to continue to furnish through the Secretary-General such assistance for the Korean people as may be requested by the Unified Command;

15. Invites countries not Members of the United Nations to participate in financing the programme of relief and rehabilitation in Korea;

B. STATEMENT OF GENERAL POLICY ON RELIEF AND REHABILITATION IN KOREA

16. Approves the following statement of general policy:

1. The United Nations programme of relief and rehabilitation in Korea is necessary to the restoration of peace and the establishment of a unified, independent and democratic government in Korea.

2. To this end, it is the objective of the United Nations to provide, subject to the limit of the resources placed at its disposal for this purpose, relief and rehabilitation supplies, transport and services, to assist the Korean people to relieve the sufferings and to repair the devastation caused by aggression, and to lay the necessary economic foundations for the political unification and independence of the country.

3. The United Nations programme of relief and rehabilitation for Korea shall be carried out in practice in such a way as to contribute to the rapid restoration of the country's economy in conformity with the national interests of the Korean people, having in view the strengthening of the economic and political independence of Korea and having in view that, in accordance with the general principles of the United Nations, such assistance must not serve as a means for foreign economic and political interference in the internal affairs of Korea and must not be accompanied by any conditions of a political nature.

4. The United Nations programme is to be a supplement to the general recovery effort that will be undertaken by the Korean people on their own initiative and responsibility, through the most effective utilization of their own resources as well as of the aid which is rendered under the programme.

5. Whilst the programme should be consistent with the pattern of long-term economic development in Korea, it is itself necessarily limited to relief and rehabilitation, and contributions and supplies furnished under this programme shall be used exclusively for that purpose.

6. First priority shall be given to the provision of the basic necessities of food, clothing and shelter for the population of Korea and measures to prevent epidemics. Second highest priority shall be given to projects which will yield early results in the indigenous production of basic necessities; this will include the reconstruction of transport and power facilities. As the programme develops, emphasis should be shifted to the provision of other materials, supplies and equipment for the reconstruction or replacement of war-damaged facilities necessary to the economic life of the country.

7. The necessary measures shall be taken to ensure that distribution shall be so conducted that all classes of the population shall receive their equitable shares of essential commodities without discrimination as to race, creed or political belief.

8. Subject to adequate control, the distribution of supplies shall be carried out, as appropriate, through public and co-operative organizations, through nonprofit-making voluntary organizations such as the Red Cross, and through normal channels of private trade. At the same time, measures shall be taken to ensure that the cost of distribution and the profit from the sale of supplies are kept to the minimum. Measures shall be taken to ensure that the special needs of refugees and other distressed groups of the population are met through appropriate public welfare programmes, and accordingly the sale of relief supplies will take place only in justifiable cases and under conditions agreed upon with the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea.

9. The local currency proceeds derived from the sale of relief and rehabilitation supplies or, at the discretion of the Agent General, an amount commensurate with the value of goods and services supplied, shall be paid into an account under the control of the Agent General. The Agent General, after consultation with the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea, and in agreement with the Advisory Committee referred to in paragraph 6 of section A of the present resolution, shall use these funds for appropriate additional relief and rehabilitation activities within Korea, for the local currency expenses of the relief and rehabilitation operations of the United Nations, or for measures to combat inflation. The proceeds shall not be used for any other purpose.

10. The necessary economic and financial measures shall be taken by the authorities in Korea to ensure that the resources provided under the United Nations programme, as well as Korean resources, are effectively employed to aid in laying the economic foundations of the country. Among these, special attention should be given to measures to combat inflation, to sound fiscal and monetary policies, to the requisite pricing, rationing and allocation controls (including the pricing of goods imported under the programme), to the prudent use of Korean foreign exchange resources together with promotion of exports, and to the efficient management of government enterprise.

11. Import taxes shall not be imposed on relief and rehabilitation supplies received under the United Nations programme.

12. The authorities in Korea should maintain such records and make such reports on the receipt, distribution and use of relief and rehabilitation supplies as may be determined by the Agent General after consultation with them.

13. All authorities in Korea shall freely permit the personnel of the United Nations to supervise the distribution of relief and rehabilitation supplies, including the examination of all storage and distribution facilities as well as records.

14. The personnel of the United Nations shall be accorded within Korea the privileges, immunities and facilities necessary for the fulfilment of their function.

15. All authorities in Korea and the Secretary-General shall use their best efforts to inform the people of Korea of the sources and purposes of the contributions of funds, supplies and services.

16. In determining Korea's needs for relief and rehabilitation, in drawing up programmes and plans, and in implementing such programmes and plans, the Agency created to administer the relief and rehabilitation programme should consult with and utilize, to the greatest extent feasible, the services of Korean authorities.

B

The General Assembly

1. Requests the President to appoint a Negotiating Committee composed of seven or more members for the purpose of consulting, as soon as possible during the current session of the General Assembly, with Member and non-member States as to the amounts which governments may be willing to contribute towards the financing of the programme for the relief and rehabilitation of Korea;¹

2. Authorizes the Negotiating Committee to adopt procedures best suited to the accomplishment of its task, bearing in mind:

(a) The need for securing the maximum contribution in cash;

(b) The desirability of ensuring that any contribution in kind is of a nature which meets the requirements of the contemplated programmes; and

(c) The degree of assistance which can be rendered by specialized agencies, non-member States and other contributors;

3. Requests that, as soon as the Negotiating Committee has ascertained the extent to which Member States are willing to make contributions, all delegations be notified accordingly by the Secretary-General in order that they may consult with their governments;

¹ In accordance with the terms of the above resolution, the President of the General Assembly, at the 318th plenary meeting on 4 December 1950, announced that he had appointed a Negotiating Committee, composed of the following States Members: Canada, Egypt, France, India, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the United States of America, and Uruguay.

4. Decides that, as soon as the Negotiating Committee has completed its work, the Secretary-General shall, at the Committee's request, arrange, during the current session of the General Assembly, an appropriate meeting of Member and non-member States at which Members may commit themselves to their national contributions and the contributions of non-members may be made known.

31. LABELING AS AGGRESSION THE CHINESE COMMUNIST INTERVENTION IN KOREA: Statement by the United States Representative at the United Nations¹ Before the United Nations General Assembly, December 6, 1950²

The General Committee has recommended that the General Assembly might include on its agenda an item entitled: Intervention of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China in Korea.³ I speak in support of the recommendation of the General Committee.

My Government has joined with the Governments of Cuba, Ecuador, France, Norway, and the United Kingdom in requesting that the General Assembly consider this item as an important and urgent question. No delegate here can have any doubt as to just how important and how urgent this question is.

The United Nations forces who are carrying out in Korea the task assigned to them by the Security Council are under attack by the armed forces of the Peiping regime. Little more than a month ago, it seemed that the United Nations forces would soon complete their assigned task. Then came the intervention of the Chinese Communist forces.

The Security Council immediately took up this new threat to the peace. On November 10 the same Governments which are now asking the Assembly to consider this item introduced into the Security Council a resolution designed to hasten the end of the conflict, to keep it localized in Korea, and to assure states and authorities on the other side of Korea's northern frontier that their legitimate interests would be protected.⁴

The Security Council also invited a representative of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China to attend its meetings on this question. The Council deferred its vote on the joint draft resolution until this representative arrived. Members of the Council then saw for themselves that the representative declined to answer questions relating to his government's actions in Korea. He said that the Chinese soldiers fighting there were volunteers. He also said that the Chinese People's Republic considered there were no grounds for hindering the dispatch to Korea of volunteers.¹

The Security Council voted on the joint draft resolution on November 30. The resolution was not adopted, because of the negative vote of one of the permanent members, the Soviet Union.

It seems clear to the six sponsors of the joint draft resolution that no fruitful action can be expected, at this time, from the Security Council in view of this attitude of one of the permanent members.

Under these circumstances, the Governments which sponsored that resolution believe that the question of Communist intervention in Korea should be considered by the General Assembly as an important and urgent matter.

The proposed agenda item puts before this Assembly one of the greatest questions faced by the United Nations. It may involve the whole future of the United Nations. It may involve the peace of the world. All the processes of the United Nations should be invoked in an effort to put an end to the threat to world peace.

My Government believes that world opinion should be brought to bear on this question and that the full weight of that opinion should be made clear to the authorities of Peiping. Full and frank discussions by the General Assembly can best bring light upon the real nature of Chinese Communist intervention in Korea, its portent for the future of peace, the gravity with which it is viewed by the nations of the world, and how the processes of the United Nations can bring about a solution.

Asking the General Assembly to consider this question, at this time, is the symbol of our belief in the United Nations and in its ability to maintain international peace.

My Government, therefore, urges the General Assembly to include this item on its agenda, to proceed quickly and soberly to consider the situation, and to make the necessary recommendations.

32. ESTABLISHMENT OF A GROUP FOR A CEASE-FIRE IN KOREA: Resolution 384 (V) of the United Nations General Assembly, December 14, 1950²

The General Assembly,

Viewing with grave concern the situation in the Far East,

Anxious that immediate steps should be taken to prevent the conflict in Korea spreading to other areas and to put an end to the fighting in Korea itself, and that further steps should then be taken for a peaceful settlement of existing issues in accordance with the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations,

² U. N. General Assembly Official Records, Fifth Session, Supplement No. 20 (A/1775), p. 15.

Requests the President of the General Assembly to constitute a group of three persons, including himself, to determine the basis on which a satisfactory cease-fire in Korea can be arranged and to make recommendations to the General Assembly as soon as possible.¹

33. CONTROL OF ECONOMIC RELATIONS BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND COMMUNIST CHINA AND NORTH KOREA: Statement by the Department of State, December 16, 1950²

The United States Government is taking measures today to place under control all Chinese Communist assets within United States jurisdiction and is issuing regulations to prohibit ships of United States registry from calling at Chinese Communist ports until further notice as steps necessary to accomplish the effective control of the economic relationships between the United States and Communist China envisaged by the institution, on December 3, 1950, of the requirement that no exports would be permitted to Communist China from the United States without validated export licenses.³

This action has been forced upon us by the intervention of Chinese Communist military forces in Korea. In view of the commitment of Chinese resources in this unprovoked aggressive activity, this Government cannot permit the Chinese Communists to have access to United States supplies or assets in the United States, the use of which under present circumstances clearly runs counter to the interests and objectives of the United Nations in the Far Eastern crisis.

It is not our desire that this be a permanent restriction. As long as a willful group of Chinese Communist leaders are willing to subvert their national interests and the welfare of the Chinese people to the designs of international Communist imperialism, it is impossible for this Government to act otherwise. If the Chinese Communists choose to withdraw their forces of aggression and act in conformity with United Nations principles, this Government will be prepared promptly to consider removing restrictions and restoring normal trade relations.

The same controls also are being applied to North Korean assets at this time. This is purely an administrative measure since North Korean assets are negligible.

The Departments of Commerce and Treasury are issuing the necessary regulations. Copies of these will be available from them.

34. DESIGNATION OF KOREA AS A COMBAT ZONE AS OF JUNE 27, 1950: Executive Order 10195, December 20, 1950¹

Pursuant to the authority vested in me by section 22 (b) (13) of the Internal Revenue Code,² as amended by section 202 (a) of the Revenue Act of 1950, approved September 23, 1950 (Public Law 814, 81st Congress),³ there is hereby designated, for the purposes of paragraph (13) of section 22 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code, as an area in which armed forces of the United States have engaged in combat:

Korea, including the waters adjacent thereto within the following-described limits: From a point at Lat. 39°30' N, Long. 122°45' E southward to Lat. 33° N, Long. 122°45' E; thence eastward to Lat. 33° N, Long. 127°55' E; thence northeastward to Lat. 37°05' N, Long. 133° E; thence northward to Lat. 40°40' N, Long. 133° E; thence northwestward to a point on the east coast of Korea at the juncture of Korea with the U.S.S.R.

The date of the commencing of combatant activities in such area is hereby designated as June 27, 1950.

35. REPORT OF THE UNITED NATIONS GROUP ON A CEASE-FIRE IN KOREA TO THE FIRST COMMITTEE OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY, JANUARY 2, 1951⁴

1. On 14 December 1950 the General Assembly adopted the following resolution [384 (V)] which had been sponsored by thirteen Asian Powers:

"The General Assembly,

"Viewing with grave concern the situation in the Far East,

"Anxious that immediate steps should be taken to prevent the conflict in Korea spreading to other areas and to put an end to the fighting in Korea itself, and that further steps should then be taken for a peaceful settlement of existing issues in accordance with the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations,

*"Requests the President of the General Assembly to constitute a group of three persons, including himself, to determine the basis on which a satisfactory cease-fire in Korea can be arranged and to make recommendations to the General Assembly as soon as possible."*⁵

2. In pursuance of the resolution, the President forthwith constituted a group consisting of Mr. L. B. Pearson of Canada, Sir Benegal N. Rau of India and himself, and announced this fact to the General Assembly. The Group met almost immediately afterwards and decided to associate the Secretary-General of the United Nations with its work.

3. A copy of the resolution was sent on 15 December to General Wu, the representative of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China, who was then in New York.

4. On 15 December, as a first step in carrying out its task, the Group consulted the representatives of the Unified Command as to what they considered to be a satisfactory basis for a cease-fire. The suggestions which emerged from this consultation, and which in the circumstances the Group felt constituted a reasonable basis for discussion, are summarized below:

(a) All governments and authorities concerned, including the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China and the North Korean authorities, shall order and enforce a cessation of all acts of armed force in Korea. This cease-fire shall apply to all of Korea.

(b) There shall be established a demilitarized area across Korea of approximately twenty miles in depth with the southern limit following generally the line of the 38th parallel.

(c) All ground forces shall remain in position or be withdrawn to the rear; forces, including guerrillas, within or in advance of the demilitarized area, must be moved to the rear of the demilitarized area; opposing air forces shall respect the demilitarized zone and the areas beyond the zone; opposing naval forces shall respect the waters contiguous to the land areas occupied by the opposing armed forces to the limit of three miles from shore.

(d) Supervision of the cease-fire shall be by a United Nations commission whose members and designated observers shall ensure full compliance with the terms of the cease-fire. They shall have free and unlimited access to the whole of Korea. All governments and authorities shall co-operate with the cease-fire commission and its designated observers in the performance of their duties.

(e) All governments and authorities shall cease promptly the introduction into Korea of any reinforcing or replacement units or personnel, including volunteers, and the introduction of additional war equipment and material. Such equipment and material will not include supplies required for the maintenance of health and welfare and such other supplies as may be authorized by the cease-fire commission.

(f) Prisoners of war shall be exchanged on a one-for-one basis, pending final settlement of the Korean question.

(g) Appropriate provision shall be made in the cease-fire arrangements in regard to steps to ensure (i) the security of the forces; (ii) the movement of refugees, and (iii) the handling of other specific problems arising out of the cease-fire, including civil government and police power in the demilitarized zone.

(h) The General Assembly should be asked to confirm the cease-fire arrangements, which should continue in effect until superseded by further steps approved by the United Nations.

5. The Group then attempted to consult the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China and, for this purpose, sent a message by hand to General Wu and repeated it by cable to the Minister for Foreign Affairs in Peking. The text of this message is reproduced below:

"16 December 1950

"As you have already been informed by resolution 384 (V) a copy of which was sent to you yesterday, a Committee was set up by the General Assembly of the United Nations on the previous day, 14 December, consisting of myself and my two colleagues, Sir Benegal Rau of India and Mr. L. B. Pearson of Canada, charged with the duty of determining whether it is possible to arrange appropriate and satisfactory conditions for a cease-fire in Korea. The purpose of this cease-fire in Korea will be to prevent the conflict from spreading to other areas, to put an end to the fighting in Korea, and to provide an opportunity for considering what further steps should be taken for a peaceful settlement of existing issues, in accordance with the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

"The above Committee has now met representatives of the Unified Command in Korea, and has discussed with them, in an exploratory manner, possible conditions upon which a cease-fire might be established. Since the Government of the Communist People's Republic of China has expressed strong views on the future of Korea and about the present state of warfare in that country, and since Chinese are participating in that warfare, the Committee wishes also to discuss with your Government or its representatives, and with the military authorities in command of the forces operating in North Korea, possible conditions upon which a cease-fire might be established. For this purpose, we desire to see you at your earliest convenience, and we should be grateful to know when a meeting can be arranged.

"We realize that your Government which sent you here with other objects in mind, may prefer other arrangements by which a cease-fire can be discussed with them. We wish your Government to know that, in the interest of stopping the fighting in Korea and of facilitating a just settlement of the issues there in accordance with the principles of the United Nations Charter, we are prepared to discuss cease-fire arrangements with your Government or its representatives either here or elsewhere, as would be mutually convenient. We urge only that arrangements for these discussions should be made with the least possible delay. With this in mind, we are sending the text of this communication directly to your Government by telegram.

"Nasrollah ENTEZAM"

6. On 18 December, Mr. Pearson, on behalf of the Group, submitted a brief preliminary account of its activities to the First Committee, hoping that a fuller report would be made in the near future.

7. On 16 December, the President, acting on behalf of the Group, had availed himself of the good offices of the Swedish delegation to transmit, through the Swedish Embassy in Peking, a request to the Central People's Government that General Wu should be instructed to stay on in New York and discuss with the Group the possibility of arranging a cease-fire. The reply to the request, communicated to the President on 21 December through the same channel, was as follows:

"The Central People's Government acknowledges receipt of a message dated 18 December 1950 from Mr. Entezam, President of the General Assembly, transmitted via the Swedish Government and asks the Swedish Government to transmit the following reply to Mr. Entezam, President of the General Assembly:

"The representative of the People's Republic of China neither participated in nor agreed to the adoption of the resolution concerning the so-called three-man Committee for Cease-Fire in Korea by United Nations General Assembly. The Central People's Government has repeatedly declared that the Central People's Government would regard as illegal and null and void all major resolutions, especially those concerning Asia, which might be adopted by the United Nations without the participation and approval of the duly appointed representatives of the People's Republic of China. Therefore, the Central People's Government cannot instruct its representative General Wu to continue to remain in Lake Success for negotiations with the above-mentioned three-man illegal Committee. After the Security Council unreasonably voted against the complaint against the United States armed aggression against Taiwan raised by the People's Republic of China,¹ General Wu was instructed by the Central People's Government to continue to stay at Lake Success for participation in the discussion of the complaint of United States aggression against China submitted by the U. S. S. R. representative;² although he has waited for a long time and until the United Nations General Assembly was declared adjourned, he was still not given the opportunity to speak. Under such circumstances, the Central People's Government deems that there is no more necessity for General Wu and his staff to remain at Lake Success and has therefore instructed him to start their homeward journey on 19 December.

"As to the question of how the United Nations may get in touch with the Korean Democratic People's Republic, the Central People's Government is of the opinion that the United Nations should address direct inquiry to the Government of the Korean Democratic People's Republic."

8. On 19 December, acting on a recommendation from the sponsors of the twelve-Power draft resolution (A/C.1/642) introduced in the First Committee on 12 December, the Group sent another message to the Foreign Minister of the Central People's Government. This was intended to remove any possible misunderstandings which may have arisen out of the separation of the twelve-Power resolution from the thirteen-Power resolution [384 (V)] adopted by the General Assembly on 14 December. The text of the message is given below:

"Mr. Chou En-lai,
"Minister for Foreign Affairs,
"Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China
"Peking, China

"In the consideration which you are giving to our earlier message, we are anxious that there should be no misunderstanding as to the relationship between the United Nations resolution establishing a cease-fire group and the resolution proposed by twelve Asian governments recommending appointment of a committee to meet as soon as possible and make recommendations for a peaceful settlement of existing issues in Far East. It is our clear understanding and also that of the twelve Asian sponsors, that once a cease-fire arrangement had been achieved, the negotiations visualized in the second resolution should be proceeded with at once. Indeed, the preamble to the cease-fire resolution states specifically that steps should be taken for a peaceful settlement when fighting in Korea is ended. It is also our view, as well as that of the twelve Asian governments sponsoring the second resolution, that the Government of the People's Republic of China should be included in the negotiating committee referred to in that resolution. We feel that this committee could become an effective channel for seeking peaceful solution of existing issues in the Far East between the United States, the United Kingdom, the Soviet Union and China. For that purpose, in our opinion, it should be set up with a minimum of delay, but to make that possible a "cease-fire" arrangement must be put into effect. This point of view has been communicated to your delegation which left New York today, and we express the hope that you will give full weight to it.

"Nasrollah ENTEZAM
"President of the General Assembly
"Sir Benegal RAU
"Lester B. PEARSON"

9. On 23 December, the President of the General Assembly, in his capacity as such, received from the Foreign Minister of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China the text of a statement issued by the latter in Peking on 22 December explaining the attitude of the Central People's Government on the resolution constituting the Group on Cease-Fire in Korea and on the peaceful settlement of the Korean question. This document is reproduced as an Annex.¹ It appears to be in the nature of an answer to the Group's message of 16 December.

10. In these circumstances, and in spite of its best efforts, the Group regrets that it has been unable to pursue discussion of a satisfactory cease-fire arrangement. It therefore feels that no recommendation in regard to a cease-fire can usefully be made by it at this time.

36. PRINCIPLES ADOPTED BY THE UNITED NATIONS GROUP ON A CEASE-FIRE IN KOREA, JANUARY 11, 1951²

The objective shall be the achievement, by stages, of the programme outlined below for a cease-fire in Korea, for the establishment of a free and united Korea, and for a peaceful settlement of Far Eastern problems.

1. In order to prevent needless destruction of life and property, and while other steps are being taken to restore peace, a cease-fire should be immediately arranged. Such an arrangement should contain adequate safeguards for ensuring that it will not be used as a screen for mounting a new offensive.

2. If and when a cease-fire occurs in Korea, either as a result of a formal arrangement or, indeed, as a result of a lull in hostilities pending some such arrangement, advantage should be taken of it to pursue consideration of further steps to be taken for the restoration of peace.

3. To permit the carrying out of General Assembly resolution [376 (V)]³ that Korea should be a unified, independent, democratic, sovereign State with a constitution and a government based on free popular elections, all non-Korean armed forces will be withdrawn, by appropriate stages, from Korea, and appropriate arrangements, in accordance with United Nations principles, will be made for the Korean people to express their own free will in respect of their future government.

4. Pending the completion of the steps referred to in the preceding paragraph, appropriate interim arrangements, in accordance with United Nations principles, will be made for the administration of Korea and the maintenance of peace and security there.

5. As soon as agreement has been reached on a cease-fire, the General Assembly shall set up an appropriate body which shall include representatives of the Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States of America, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the People's Republic of China, with a view to the achievement of a settlement, in conformity with existing international obligations and the provisions of the United Nations Charter, of Far Eastern problems, including, among others, those of Formosa (Taiwan) and of the representation of China in the United Nations.

37. TRANSMITTAL OF THE PRINCIPLES ADOPTED BY THE UNITED NATIONS GROUP ON A CEASE-FIRE IN KOREA TO THE CHINESE COMMUNIST REGIME: Resolution of the First Committee of the United Nations General Assembly, January 13, 1951¹

The First Committee

Invites the Chairman of the First Committee, through the Secretary-General, to transmit the principles approved by it on 13 January 1951² to the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China and invite that Government to inform him as soon as possible whether it accepts those principles as a basis for the peaceful settlement of the Korean problem and other Far Eastern problems.³ Upon the receipt of the reply from the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China, the Chairman of the First Committee will convene the Committee to consider that reply.

38. LABELING THE CHINESE COMMUNISTS AS AGGRESSORS IN KOREA: Resolution of the House of Representatives, January 19, 1951⁴

Resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives that the United Nations should immediately act and declare the Chinese Communist authorities an aggressor in Korea.

39. LABELING THE CHINESE COMMUNISTS AS AGGRESSORS IN KOREA: Resolution of the United States Senate, January 23, 1951⁵

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the United Nations should immediately declare Communist China an aggressor in Korea.

40. CONDEMNATION OF CHINESE COMMUNIST AGGRESSION IN KOREA: Statement by the United States Representative at the United Nations¹ Before Committee I of the U.N. General Assembly, January 24, 1951²

Mr. Chairman: The present stage of debate in this Committee reveals a situation which is confused and uncertain. We must not let our minds be taken away from essential facts and basic principles. The facts are not in dispute. The principles are the principles of the Charter. This Committee should stop a moment and consider calmly and objectively the essential elements of the situation which confronts us. What are these elements?

First, an organized armed aggression was committed by the forces of North Korea against the Republic of Korea across the 38th parallel on June 25, 1950. The facts of this aggression are unchallengeable. They were established by the United Nations Commission in Korea.³ Let us at the very beginning be absolutely clear about these events. There would have been no fighting in Korea except for that aggression. Further, that aggression was committed with the encouragement, participation, and support of the authorities in both Peiping and Moscow who furnished manpower and supplies to enable the aggression to occur. Interrogation of prisoners of war taken by the United Nations forces reveals that long before June 25, Communist China provided to North Korean authorities large numbers of military personnel of Korean ancestry, estimated at 50,000 troops, drawn from the forces of Communist China.

Most of the military supplies came from the Soviet Union. At the very beginning of this aggression, the Security Council passed two resolutions on June 25 and June 27.⁴ I should like to urge that delegates reread these resolutions. They still apply to the present situation. Those resolutions and the action taken by the United Nations thereafter illustrated a principle of the Charter in operation; the United Nations was in fact and in deed fulfilling its purpose to maintain international peace and security and to that end taking collective measures for the suppression of an act of aggression.

Another essential element is that the Peiping regime has put its own organized armed forces into Korea to assist the North Koreans. It has committed a special offense in waging war against the United Nations. It has affronted the United Nations by the pretense that these forces are volunteers. Does anyone in this room really believe that the intervention in Korea of the Chinese Communists' troops is a spontaneous act by the Chinese people and not an official decision of the Peiping regime? Does anyone believe that this intervention does not in fact and in law constitute aggression as that word is used in the Charter?

These are the facts from which we must start. What is the United Nations called upon to do in this present situation? We must oppose and not reward the aggression. The first article of the Charter states that it is the purpose of the United Nations to maintain international peace and to that end to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace and for the suppression of acts of aggression and to bring about by peaceful means and in conformity with the principles of justice and international law adjustment or settlement of situations. What does this mean? It means the withdrawal of Chinese Communist forces from Korea where they have no right to be. Fundamental to the present situation is the fact that the United Nations forces are in Korea to repel aggression and to restore peace. United Nations forces should leave Korea when these missions are accomplished. United Nations forces should not leave Korea under such conditions as would invite an early resumption of North Korean or Chinese Communist aggression.

A second step is to settle the Korean problem. On what basis? The United Nations gave long consideration to this last October before the General Assembly adopted its resolution of October 7, 1950.¹ That resolution is as valid today as it was then because it is in accordance with the principles of the Charter. We might all pause and reread that resolution and refresh our recollection of what are the United Nations objectives in Korea and how they should be achieved. The resolution adopted by the General Assembly also sets forth conditions for the withdrawal of United Nations forces.

A third step to bring about a general easing of the tension in the Far East is to turn to the peaceful settlement of other Far Eastern questions. As far as the United States is concerned, we are ready at all times to take part in appropriate processes of peaceful settlement for these and other questions. The United States Government takes seriously its solemn obligations under article 33 of the Charter. If discussions are held, the United States will enter them in good faith. We will not commit ourselves in advance nor will we insist in advance, as the Chinese Communists do, that the discussions must lead to a predetermined result in our favor.

Where are we now in terms of carrying out the purposes of this great organization? What has been happening since the Chinese Communist intervention began and this Committee started dealing with the problem?

It has been 7 weeks since the General Assembly put this item on its agenda as an important and urgent matter. In the weeks which intervened, the Committee and its members have made unceasing efforts to bring about in Korea peace with justice, in accordance with principles of international law and the Charter. All these efforts were rebuffed by Peiping.

The final effort was made on January 13 with the transmission to Peiping of the five principles representing the minimum basis on which an honorable settlement could be achieved.² On January 17, the

Peiping regime flatly rejected the five principles. Its response, including its so-called counterproposal,¹ was utterly unacceptable. This final effort at peaceful settlement having been rebuffed, the United States introduced its resolution setting forth the undisputed facts and providing for further steps which, we believe, the United Nations is called upon to take under the Charter.²

This is where things stood when Sir Benegal Rau reported a further communication from Peiping to the Indian Ambassador.³ The United States has great respect for India and for Sir Benegal's sincerity. We admire his efforts, but, as the Philippine delegate said, we cannot agree that this new communication changes very much.

In the first place, what is the status and character of this communication and to whom is it addressed? Does it purport to supersede the response from Chou En-lai dated January 17, or is it merely an amplification of the earlier response? If it is in answer to some questions put to the Peiping government, what were those questions? Has the Peiping government reconsidered its earlier reply, and does it wish now to make a further communication to the United Nations? If that is so, there are simple ways for making such official and responsible communications and the Chinese Communists know how to do it. The United States does not wish ever in any case to close the door to the possibility of negotiation and settlement by peaceful means in an honorable way. Nor do we wish to be lacking in decent respect for the opinion of others. But this latest communication from Peiping appears to have all the aspects of a dusty answer. It appears to be designed to confuse the United Nations, to divide its members, and to obelucid the issues that are before us.

If we read the proposal as a new offer to the United Nations and give it the benefit of every doubt as to its purport and its purposes, one thing remains clear: it is not an acceptance of the United Nations' proposal of January 13. Nowhere does it recognize the United Nations or the resolutions of this Assembly.

The latest communication talks of a cease-fire for a limited time. Does that mean that the negotiations might be interrupted at any moment by a new attack from the Chinese Communists because the talks were not going in exactly the way they wish? Are they seriously asking the United Nations to enter discussions in such circumstances? The five principles contemplated the immediate arrangement of a cease-fire to continue in effect until superseded by further steps approved by the United Nations.

The Chinese Communist response does not accept the principle that all non-Korean troops shall be withdrawn by appropriate stages from Korea. Instead, it says only that the Central People's Government will "advise" Chinese volunteers to return to China if the principle that all foreign troops should be withdrawn from Korea has been accepted and is being put into practice. In other words, the United Nations forces are to be treated as having less right in Korea than the forces of the aggressor, and only after the withdrawal of United Nations forces has begun will the Central People's Government "advise" its troops to go home.

Further, the cease-fire is not to be arranged in advance, but it is to be negotiated by a 7-nation group while hostilities are still in progress. Later negotiations, after the limited cease-fire, are agreed to by the Central People's Government only in terms which prejudice the outcome according to that Government's desires. Is this negotiation or discussion in the accepted meaning of the word? Is this what this committee had in mind when it transmitted the basis for a cease-fire to Peiping?

Finally, the response demands, and I am now quoting the language read to us by Sir Benegal on Monday, "The definite affirmation of the legitimate status of the People's Republic of China in the United Nations must be insured." This presumably means that the United Nations is given an ultimatum that it must agree to accept a government currently an aggressor as the representative of China. The decision as to which government should represent China in the United Nations is a decision to be made by the United Nations. We have every confidence that it will be made soberly and justly, taking into account all the relevant circumstances. Surely, one of these relevant circumstances is the behavior of the Peiping regime and the fact that its armies are now on foreign soil as an invader, presently in battle with the forces of the United Nations and shedding the blood of soldiers of many of the Governments sitting at this table. It is a matter of common sense as well as of principle that no government can gain entry to the United Nations by force of bayonets and bullets. You can't shoot your way into the United Nations.

The question of Formosa, the Chinese representation, and of other Far Eastern problems have been or can be put on the agenda of the United Nations and dealt with by orderly United Nations processes. Various members of the United Nations may take differing views on the question of Chinese representation and perhaps also on the future of Formosa. But they cannot possibly disagree with my Government's view that these problems must be solved in the United Nations in accordance with the Charter and the procedures provided for therein and not by blackmail.

When we compare the five principles and the latest Peiping communication, what do we find? The five principles meant in effect that if the Chinese Communists ceased their attacks on United Nations forces, there could be an end to hostilities in Korea, and then there could be bona fide discussions with a view to achieving United Nations objectives in Korea by peaceful means and to settling other outstanding questions in the Far East. The Peiping communication does not in fact agree to a cessation of hostilities; it does not in fact agree to discussions in good faith.

It is clear to us, as I am sure it is to most other members of the United Nations, that the Peiping reply is another rejection. It is easy enough to say yes if you mean yes. Peiping has said no, but this time it has said it less forthrightly.

The present reply gives no inkling that there has been a change of heart and that its intentions are honorable. The United Nations should not be fooled.

Let us ask ourselves with honesty and candor whether the United Nations should put itself in the position of a suppliant to a transgressor and make further appeals to Peiping. Would a further appeal contribute to the authority of the United Nations and the system of collective security? Would it not rather inflate the appetites and ambitions of Peiping, confusing the world as to what the issues really are and complicating a situation which is in fact a very simple one?

If particular members wish to address further appeals to Peiping, they are at entire liberty to do so. My Government would raise no objections. If these members receive any replies which reflect the possibility of a reasonable settlement or the adoption by Peiping of an acceptable course of conduct, of course my Government will be ready to consider them. But I would point out to my colleagues that this is not merely a problem of finding a formula acceptable to Peiping. The result must also be acceptable to the United Nations and in conformity with the Charter. The United Nations has called on its members for great sacrifices on behalf of collective security. It has gone to great lengths to leave the way open for a peaceful settlement of a situation brought about by flagrant aggression. In the conduct of military operations, its forces have used the greatest restraint under extreme provocation in order to localize the conflict in Korea. But the United Nations must not be taken for granted.

I ask my colleagues to give some thought to the issue of collective security. Collective security is not merely a phrase. The views of the people of the United States on this matter were developed through a generation of vigorous debate and are linked with the sacrifices of the peoples of the world in World War II which had to be made because the world had not been able to establish a system of collective security to meet Nazi aggression. We do recognize that there are honest differences on the question before us on the points of view of the Governments represented around this table. Some are remote from the scene of conflict and hope somehow to avoid involvement. Some are concerned lest the strength of the United Nations be so committed in Korea as not to be available for their own defense. Others take differing views about the nature of developments in the Far East and what these mean to the rest of the world. But on one point we are all agreed. If any one of us is attacked, each of us would in that situation desperately ask the United Nations to provide the unified support of every other Government in the world to meet the attack. How can we bring that about for our own countries? Only by a determination to take united action, to support each other faithfully and vigorously when an act of aggression occurs.

41. CONDEMNATION OF CHINESE COMMUNIST AGGRESSION IN KOREA: Statement by the President, January 25, 1951¹

Ambassador Austin has fully and forcefully presented the views of this Government on our attitude toward aggression by the Chinese Communists.² These views have the solid support of the Executive, the Congress, and the people of the United States.

Each member of the United Nations must make its own decision on this issue. For my part, I believe in calling an aggressor an aggressor. The question of what can and should be done about the aggression in Korea of course must be discussed with all other friendly nations.

Obviously, this is no time for rash or unwise action. This is a time for clear thinking and firmness.

Let me stress again that the American resolution contains—as all our proposals have contained—a method for bringing about a cease-fire and opening the way for peaceful settlement of outstanding issues.

42. CONDEMNATION OF CHINESE COMMUNIST AGGRESSION IN KOREA: Resolution 498 (V) of the United Nations General Assembly, February 1, 1951³

The General Assembly,

Noting that the Security Council, because of lack of unanimity of the permanent members, has failed to exercise its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security in regard to Chinese Communist intervention in Korea,

Noting that the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China has not accepted United Nations proposals⁴ to bring about a cessation of hostilities in Korea with a view to peaceful settlement, and that its armed forces continue their invasion of Korea and their large-scale attacks upon United Nations forces there,

1. Finds that the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China, by giving direct aid and assistance to those who were already committing aggression in Korea and by engaging in hostilities against United Nations forces there, has itself engaged in aggression in Korea;

2. Calls upon the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China to cause its forces and nationals in Korea to cease hostilities against the United Nations forces and to withdraw from Korea;

3. Affirms the determination of the United Nations to continue its action in Korea to meet the aggression;
4. Calls upon all States and authorities to continue to lend every assistance to the United Nations action in Korea;
5. Calls upon all States and authorities to refrain from giving any assistance to the aggressors in Korea;
6. Requests a Committee composed of the members of the Collective Measures Committee¹ as a matter of urgency to consider additional measures to be employed to meet this aggression and to report thereon to the General Assembly, it being understood that the Committee is authorized to defer its report if the Good Offices Committee referred to in the following paragraph reports satisfactory progress in its efforts;
7. Affirms that it continues to be the policy of the United Nations to bring about a cessation of hostilities in Korea and the achievement of United Nations objectives in Korea by peaceful means, and requests the President of the General Assembly to designate forthwith two persons who would meet with him at any suitable opportunity to use their good offices to this end.²

43. UNITED STATES POLICY IN THE KOREAN CONFLICT: Address by the President, April 11, 1951³

I want to talk plainly to you tonight about what we are doing in Korea and about our policy in the Far East.

In the simplest terms, what we are doing in Korea is this: We are trying to prevent a third world war.

I think most people in this country recognized that fact last June. And they warmly supported the decision of the Government to help the Republic of Korea against the Communist aggressors. Now, many persons, even some who applauded our decision to defend Korea, have forgotten the basic reason for our action.

It is right for us to be in Korea. It was right last June. It is right today.

I want to remind you why this is true.

THE COMMUNIST THREAT TO FREEDOM

The Communists in the Kremlin are engaged in a monstrous conspiracy to stamp out freedom all over the world. If they were to succeed, the United States would be numbered among their principal victims. It must be clear to everyone that the United States cannot—and will not—sit idly by and await foreign conquest. The only question is: When is the best time to meet the threat and how?

² The President of the General Assembly, on 19 February 1951, informed the members of the General Assembly (A/1779) that Dr. Luis Padilla Nervo (Mexico) and Mr. Sven Grafstrom (Sweden) had accepted his invitation to form with him the Good Offices Committee, as provided in the above resolution.

³ Department of State Bulletin, Apr. 16, 1951, pp. 603-605 (also available as Department of State publication 4195; 1951).

The best time to meet the threat is in the beginning. It is easier to put out a fire in the beginning when it is small than after it has become a roaring blaze.

And the best way to meet the threat of aggression is for the peace-loving nations to act together. If they don't act together, they are likely to be picked off, one by one.

If they had followed the right policies in the 1930's—if the free countries had acted together, to crush the aggression of the dictators, and if they had acted in the beginning, when the aggression was small—there probably would have been no World War II.

If history has taught us anything, it is that aggression anywhere in the world is a threat to peace everywhere in the world. When that aggression is supported by the cruel and selfish rulers of a powerful nation who are bent on conquest, it becomes a clear and present danger to the security and independence of every free nation.

This is a lesson that most people in this country have learned thoroughly. This is the basic reason why we joined in creating the United Nations. And since the end of World War II we have been putting that lesson into practice—we have been working with other free nations to check the aggressive designs of the Soviet Union before they can result in a third world war.

That is what we did in Greece, when that nation was threatened by the aggression of international communism.

The attack against Greece could have led to general war. But this country came to the aid of Greece. The United Nations supported Greek resistance. With our help, the determination and efforts of the Greek people defeated the attack on the spot.

Another big Communist threat to peace was the Berlin blockade. That too could have led to war. But again it was settled because free men would not back down in an emergency.

THE COMMUNIST PLAN FOR CONQUEST

The aggression against Korea is the boldest and most dangerous move the Communists have yet made.

The attack on Korea was part of a greater plan for conquering all of Asia.

I would like to read to you from a secret intelligence report which came to us after the attack. It is a report of a speech a Communist army officer in North Korea gave to a group of spies and saboteurs last May, one month before South Korea was invaded. The report shows in great detail how this invasion was part of a carefully prepared plot. Here is part of what the Communist officer, who had been trained in Moscow, told his men: "Our forces," he said, "are scheduled to attack South Korean forces about the middle of June. . . . The coming attack on South Korea marks the first step toward the liberation of Asia."

Notice that he used the word "liberation." That is Communist double-talk meaning "conquest."

I have another secret intelligence report here. This one tells what another Communist officer in the Far East told his men several months before the invasion of Korea. Here is what he said: "In order to successfully undertake the long awaited world revolution, we must first unify Asia. . . . Java, Indochina, Malaya, India, Tibet, Thailand, Philippines, and Japan are our ultimate targets. . . . The United States is the only obstacle on our road for the liberation of all countries in southeast Asia. In other words, we must unify the people of Asia and crush the United States."

That is what the Communist leaders are telling their people, and that is what they have been trying to do.

They want to control all Asia from the Kremlin.

This plan of conquest is in flat contradiction to what we believe. We believe that Korea belongs to the Koreans, that India belongs to the Indians—that all the nations of Asia should be free to work out their affairs in their own way. This is the basis of peace in the Far East and everywhere else.

The whole Communist imperialism is back of the attack on peace in the Far East. It was the Soviet Union that trained and equipped the North Koreans for aggression. The Chinese Communists massed 44 well-trained and well-equipped divisions on the Korean frontier. These were the troops they threw into battle when the North Korean Communists were beaten.

STOPPING SHORT OF GENERAL WAR

The question we have had to face is whether the Communist plan of conquest can be stopped without general war. Our Government and other countries associated with us in the United Nations believe that the best chance of stopping it without general war is to meet the attack in Korea and defeat it there.

That is what we have been doing. It is a difficult and bitter task. But so far it has been successful.

So far, we have prevented World War III.

So far, by fighting a limited war in Korea, we have prevented aggression from succeeding and bringing on a general war. And the ability of the whole free world to resist Communist aggression has been greatly improved.

We have taught the enemy a lesson. He has found out that aggression is not cheap or easy. Moreover, men all over the world who want to remain free have been given new courage and new hope. They know now that the champions of freedom can stand up and fight and that they will stand up and fight.

Our resolute stand in Korea is helping the forces of freedom now fighting in Indochina and other countries in that part of the world. It has already slowed down the timetable of conquest.

In Korea itself, there are signs that the enemy is building up his ground forces for a new mass offensive. We also know that there have been large increases in the enemy's available air forces.

If a new attack comes, I feel confident it will be turned back. The United Nations fighting forces are tough and able and well equipped. They are fighting for a just cause. They are proving to all the world that the principle of collective security will work. We are proud of all these forces for the magnificent job they have done against heavy odds. We pray that their efforts may succeed, for upon their success may hinge the peace of the world.

The Communist side must now choose its course of action. The Communist rulers may press the attack against us. They may take further action which will spread the conflict. They have that choice, and with it the awful responsibility for what may follow. The Communists also have the choice of a peaceful settlement which could lead to a general relaxation of tensions in the Far East. The decision is theirs, because the forces of the United Nations will strive to limit the conflict if possible.

We do not want to see the conflict in Korea extended. We are trying to prevent a world war—not to start one. The best way to do that is to make it plain that we and the other free countries will continue to resist the attack.

THE BEST COURSE TO FOLLOW

But you may ask: Why can't we take other steps to punish the aggressor? Why don't we bomb Manchuria and China itself? Why don't we assist Chinese Nationalist troops to land on the mainland of China?

If we were to do these things we would be running a very grave risk of starting a general war. If that were to happen, we would have brought about the exact situation we are trying to prevent.

If we were to do these things, we would become entangled in a vast conflict on the continent of Asia and our task would become immeasurably more difficult all over the world.

What would suit the ambitions of the Kremlin better than for our military forces to be committed to a full-scale war with Red China?

It may well be that, in spite of our best efforts, the Communists may spread the war. But it would be wrong—tragically wrong—for us to take the initiative in extending the war.

The dangers are great. Make no mistake about it. Behind the North Koreans and Chinese Communists in the front lines stand additional millions of Chinese soldiers. And behind the Chinese stand the tanks, the planes, the submarines, the soldiers, and the scheming rulers of the Soviet Union.

Our aim is to avoid the spread of the conflict.

The course we have been following is the one best calculated to avoid an all-out war. It is the course consistent with our obligation to do all we can to maintain international peace and security. Our experience in Greece and Berlin shows that it is the most effective course of action we can follow.

First of all, it is clear that our efforts in Korea can blunt the will of the Chinese Communists to continue the struggle. The United Nations forces have put up a tremendous fight in Korea and have inflicted very heavy casualties on the enemy. Our forces are stronger now than they have been before. These are plain facts which may discourage the Chinese Communists from continuing their attack.

Second, the free world as a whole is growing in military strength every day. In the United States, in Western Europe, and throughout the world, free men are alert to the Soviet threat and are building their defenses. This may discourage the Communist rulers from continuing the war in Korea—and from undertaking new acts of aggression elsewhere.

If the Communist authorities realize that they cannot defeat us in Korea, if they realize it would be foolhardy to widen the hostilities beyond Korea, then they may recognize the folly of continuing their aggression. A peaceful settlement may then be possible. The door is always open.

Then we may achieve a settlement in Korea which will not compromise the principles and purposes of the United Nations.

I have thought long and hard about this question of extending the war in Asia. I have discussed it many times with the ablest military advisers in the country. I believe with all my heart that the course we are following is the best course.

I believe that we must try to limit the war to Korea for these vital reasons: to make sure that the precious lives of our fighting men are not wasted; to see that the security of our country and the free world is not needlessly jeopardized; and to prevent a third world war.

AVOIDING CONFUSION OVER U.S. POLICY

A number of events have made it evident that General MacArthur did not agree with that policy. I have therefore considered it essential to relieve General MacArthur so that there would be no doubt or confusion as to the real purpose and aim of our policy.

It was with the deepest personal regret that I found myself compelled to take this action. General MacArthur is one of our greatest military commanders. But the cause of world peace is more important than any individual.

The change in commands in the Far East means no change whatever in the policy of the United States. We will carry on the fight in Korea with vigor and determination in an effort to bring the war to a speedy and successful conclusion.

The new commander, Lt. Gen. Matthew Ridgway, has already demonstrated that he has the great qualities of military leadership needed for this task.

We are ready, at any time, to negotiate for a restoration of peace in the area. But we will not engage in appeasement. We are only interested in real peace.

Real peace can be achieved through a settlement based on the following factors:

One: the fighting must stop.

Two: concrete steps must be taken to insure that the fighting will not break out again.

Three: there must be an end to the aggression.

A settlement founded upon these elements would open the way for the unification of Korea and the withdrawal of all foreign forces.

In the meantime, I want to be clear about our military objective. We are fighting to resist an outrageous aggression in Korea. We are trying to keep the Korean conflict from spreading to other areas. But at the same time we must conduct our military activities so as to insure the security of our forces. This is essential if they are to continue the fight until the enemy abandons its ruthless attempt to destroy the Republic of Korea.

That is our military objective—to repel attack and to restore peace.

In the hard fighting in Korea, we are proving that collective action among nations is not only a high principle but a workable means of resisting aggression. Defeat of aggression in Korea may be the turning point in the world's search for a practical way of achieving peace and security.

The struggle of the United Nations in Korea is a struggle for peace.

The free nations have united their strength in an effort to prevent a third world war.

That war can come if the Communist rulers want it to come. But this Nation and its allies will not be responsible for its coming.

We do not want to widen the conflict. We will use every effort to prevent that disaster. And in so doing we know that we are following the great principles of peace, freedom, and justice.

44. UNITED NATIONS STRATEGIC EMBARGO AGAINST COMMUNIST CHINA AND NORTH KOREA: Resolution 500 (V) of the United Nations General Assembly, May 18, 1951¹

The General Assembly,

Noting the report of the Additional Measures Committee dated 14 May 1951,²

Recalling its resolution 498 (V) of 1 February 1951,³

Nothing [Noting] that:

(a) The Additional Measures Committee established by that resolution has considered additional measures to be employed to meet the aggression in Korea,

(b) The Additional Measures Committee has reported that a number of States have already taken measures designed to deny contributions to the military strength of the forces opposing the United Nations in Korea,

(c) The Additional Measures Committee has also reported that certain economic measures designed further to deny such contribu-

3. Reaffirms that it continues to be the policy of the United Nations to bring about a cessation of hostilities in Korea, and the achievement of United Nations objectives in Korea by peaceful means, and requests the Good Offices Committee to continue its good offices.

45. REVIEW OF UNITED STATES POLICY IN THE KOREAN CONFLICT: Statement by the Secretary of State, June 1, 1951²

The real issues in the discussion before us are peace or war, and the survival of human freedom.

It is not just a difference as to method which is now under examination. What is challenged is the bedrock purpose of our foreign policy, and of what we have been trying to do. That is the place I would like to start, in this brief statement.

² Made before the Senate Armed Services and the Foreign Relations Committees; Department of State Bulletin, June 11, 1951, pp. 923-926.

The foreign policy of the United States has a central and dominant objective—to protect the nation and to safeguard the future of its people. We stand ready to defend our future by force of arms if that necessity is forced upon us. But we seek to deter war if we can.

Another world war would be destructive beyond experience; it would not solve problems, but multiply them. Therefore, it is part of our fundamental purpose to prevent, by all honorable means, the outbreak of another general war.

Even before the last world war was over, while our young men were storming the beaches at Normandy and Saipan and dozens of other places now engraved in our memories, the resolution was forming among our people that future wars must be prevented.

Their conviction grew that the best way to protect the security of our nation and of our people was to prevent war, and that the way to go about it was through an international system of collective security.

The Four Freedoms, the Atlantic Charter, the United Nations—these were not cynical slogans. They represented the idea which our people felt in their hearts was worth fighting for.

It has been the purpose of our foreign policy to keep faith with that idea.

The attempt to build a collective security system on the basis of the cooperation of all the great powers broke down because of the policies of the Soviet Union. But Soviet ambitions have not been able to obstruct our determined efforts.

Within the framework of the Charter of the United Nations, we have been building a collective security system based on the cooperation of those nations who are dedicated to peace.

The united and determined effort of our people to build effective instruments for keeping the peace is recorded in a series of vigorous and far-sighted actions: the United Nations Charter itself, the Rio Treaty, the Greek-Turkish Aid Program, the Marshall Plan, the North Atlantic Treaty, and the Mutual Defense Assistance Program.

We have been building our strength, together with our allies. We must be strong enough to keep the peace.

Side by side with these programs there is another basic element in our foreign policy: to assist the hundreds of millions of people who were acquiring their independence after the war, so that they might be free to develop in their own way, and to join in an international system for preserving the peace.

Our hopes for peace required us to understand the changes which were in motion among vast populations of the Middle East and Asia, and to help peoples who had just gained their independence from losing it again to the new imperialism of the Soviet Union.

Those are the big, central ideas that express what we have been trying to do in the world.

THE CHALLENGE OF KOREA

The attack on Korea was a blow at the foundation of this whole program. It was a challenge to the whole system of collective security, not only in the Far East, but everywhere in the world. It was a threat to all nations newly arrived at independence. This dagger thrust pinned a warning notice to the wall which said: "Give up or be conquered."

This was a test which would decide whether our collective security system would survive or would crumble. It would determine whether other nations would be intimidated by this show of force.

The decision to meet force with force in Korea was essential. It was the unanimous view of the political and military advisers of the President that this was the right thing to do. This decision had the full support of the American people because it accorded with the principles by which Americans live.

As a people we condemn aggression of any kind. We reject appeasement of any kind. If we stood with our arms folded while Korea was swallowed up, it would have meant abandoning our principles, and it would have meant the defeat of the collective security system on which our own safety ultimately depends.

What I want to stress here is that it was not only a crucial decision whether or not to meet this aggression; it was no less important how this aggression was to be dealt with.

In the first place, the attack on Korea has been met by collective action. The United States brought the aggression in Korea before the United Nations, not only because the Charter requires it, but also because the authority and even the survival of that organization was directly involved.

The response of some members of the United Nations, in terms of their capacities and their other security responsibilities, has been generous and wholehearted.

The total action is admittedly an imperfect one, as might be expected of beginning steps in a collective security system. But the development of this system requires us to take into consideration the dangers and interests of those associated with us, just as we want them to take into consideration our dangers and interests.

In the second place, our response to the aggression against Korea required a careful estimate of the risks involved in the light of the total world situation.

There was the risk that the conflict might spread into a general war in Asia, a risk that the Chinese Communists might intervene, a risk that the Soviet Union might declare itself in.

We take it for granted that risk of some sort is implicit in any positive policy, and that there is also a risk in doing nothing.

The elements of risk and the means of reducing that risk to us and to the rest of the free world quite properly influenced our policy in Korea.

It has been our purpose to turn back this Communist thrust, and to do it in such a way as to prevent a third World War if we can. This is in accord with one of the most fundamental tenets of our policy—to prevent, in so far as we can do so, another world war.

It is against this basic purpose that the operation in Korea, and the plans for carrying it to a conclusion, need to be considered.

WHAT THE DEFENSE OF KOREA HAS ACCOMPLISHED

The operation in Korea has been a success. Both the North Koreans and the Chinese Communists declared it to be their purpose to drive the United Nations forces out of Korea and impose Communist rule throughout the entire peninsula. They have been prevented from accomplishing their objective.

It has been charged that the American and allied forces fighting in Korea are engaged in a pointless and inconclusive struggle.

Nothing could be farther from the fact. They have been magnificent. Their gallant, determined and successful fight has checked the Communist advance and turned it into a retreat. They have administered terrible defeats to the Communist forces. In so doing, they have scored a powerful victory.

Their victory has dealt Communist imperialist aims in Asia a severe setback.

The alluring prospect for the Communist conspiracy in June, 1950—the prospect of a quick and easy success which would not only win Korea for the Kremlin but shake the free nations of Asia and paralyze the defense of Europe—all this has evaporated.

Instead of weakening the rest of the world, they have solidified it. They have given a powerful impetus to the military preparations of this country and its associates in and out of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

We have doubled the number of our men under arms, and the production of matériel has been boosted to a point where it can begin to have a profound effect on the maintenance of the peace.

The idea of collective security has been put to the test, and has been sustained. The nations who believe in collective security have shown that they can stick together and fight together.

New urgency has been given to the negotiation of a peace treaty with Japan, and of initial security arrangements to build strength in the Pacific area.

These are some of the results of the attack on Korea, unexpected by—and I am sure most unwelcome to—the Kremlin.

HOW THE FIGHTING CAN BE BROUGHT TO AN END

The objective of our military operation in Korea is to end the aggression, to safeguard against its renewal, and to restore peace. There is wide agreement on this objective in the domestic discussions of this issue.

Both the Administration and its critics have said that the object of the courses they propose is to end the aggression and restore peace. Both are willing—indeed desire—to end the fighting by an honorable settlement which will end the aggression, provide against its renewal and restore peace.

Neither will purchase a settlement by allowing the aggressors to profit by their wrong. Neither believes that the destruction or unconditional surrender of the aggressor is necessary to attain the goal.

General Marshall, General Bradley and the Joint Chiefs of Staff have given you, in detail, the reasons why they believe that the Chinese Communists will be defeated in Korea and must abandon their purpose.¹

They report that our forces are in excellent shape, that their morale is high and that they are in a good supply position.

They report not only that the mass attacks launched by the enemy have failed to break through the firepower of United Nations forces, but that the offensives of the enemy have been broken and thrown back with enormous enemy casualties.

These defeats in Korea, together with other consequences of this campaign, present grave problems for the Communist authorities in China.

While the manpower resources of China are vast, its supply of trained men is limited. They cannot cover up their casualties. They cannot gloss over the draft of more and more men for military service.

The Chinese Red leaders have betrayed their long-standing pledge of demobilization and the military demand for manpower has, instead, been increased.

Peiping has also broken its promises of social and economic improvement. In the great cities, dependent on imported materials, unemployment increases. The régime has not lightened the burdens of the people. It has made them heavier.

All of this is reflected in a sharp increase in repressive measures, and in propaganda to whip up the flagging zeal of their own people. In the light of all these factors, I believe that the aggression can best be brought to an end with a minimum risk and a minimum loss, by continuing the punishing defeat of the Chinese in Korea. This is being done.

No one can predict when the fighting will stop and when the aggression will end. It is also true that no one could have foretold exactly what would happen when we undertook action to end the Berlin blockade, but we did what we thought was right and the blockade was ended.

No one could have foretold how the aggression in Greece would be terminated, but again we took those measures which our best judgment and sense indicated were the right ones and the aggression ceased.

While the outcome of every course of action in the foreign policy field cannot be predicted with certainty in advance, it is our responsibility in taking action to apply our best judgment on the basis of the best information at hand.

I think it is fair to say that all of the President's advisers believe the course we are now following gives us the best chance of stopping hostilities and ending the aggression in Korea.

¹ See Military Situation in the Far East: Hearings Before the Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, 82d Congress, 1st Session, etc., pp. 322-1662.

THE PROPOSAL TO ENLARGE THE WAR

I should like briefly to address myself to the alternative course which was placed before this Committee.¹ This course would seek to bring the conflict in Korea to an end by enlarging the sphere of hostilities.

I will not try to review the military considerations involved in this proposed course, since these have been thoroughly discussed by the previous witnesses before your Committees.

It is enough to say that it is the judgment of the President's military advisers that the proposed enlargement of our military action would not exercise a prompt and decisive effect in bringing the hostilities to an end. To this judgment there must be added a recognition of the grave risks and other disadvantages of this alternative course.

Against the dubious advantages of spreading the war in an initially limited manner to the mainland of China, there must be measured the risk of a general war with China, the risk of Soviet intervention, and of World War III, as well as the probable effects upon the solidarity of the free world coalition.

The advocates of this program make two assumptions which require careful examination. They assume that the Soviet Union will not necessarily respond to any action on our part. They also assume that in the build-up of strength relative to the Soviet Union and the Communist sphere, time is not necessarily on our side.

As to Soviet reactions, no one can be sure he is forecasting accurately what they would be, but there are certain facts at hand that bear on this question.

We know of Soviet influence in North Korea, of Soviet assistance to the North Koreans and to Communist China, and we know that understandings must have accompanied this assistance. We also know that there is a treaty between the Soviets and the Chinese Communists.²

But, even if the treaty did not exist, China is the Soviet Union's largest and most important satellite. Russian self-interest in the Far East and the necessity of maintaining prestige in the Communist sphere make it difficult to see how the Soviet Union could ignore a direct attack upon the Chinese mainland.

I cannot accept the assumption that the Soviet Union will go its way regardless of what we do. I do not think that Russian policy is formed that way any more than our own policy is formed that way. This view is certainly not well enough grounded to justify a gamble with the essential security of our nation.

In response to the proposed course of action, there are a number of courses of counteraction open to the Soviets.

They could turn over to the Chinese large numbers of planes with "volunteer" crews for retaliatory action in Korea and outside. They might participate with the Soviet air force and the submarine fleet.

The Kremlin could elect to parallel the action taken by Peiping and intervene with a half million or more ground force "volunteers"; or it could go the whole way and launch an all-out war.

Singly, or in combination, these reactions contain explosive possibilities, not only for the Far East, but for the rest of the world as well.

We should also analyze the effect on our allies of our taking steps to initiate the spread of war beyond Korea. It would severely weaken their ties with us and in some instances it might sever them.

They are understandably reluctant to be drawn into a general war in the Far East—one which holds the possibilities of becoming a world war—particularly if it developed out of an American impatience with the progress of the effort to repel aggression, an effort which in their belief offers an honorable and far less catastrophic solution.

If we followed the course proposed, we would be increasing our risks and commitments at the same time that we diminished our strength by reducing the strength and determination of our coalition.

We cannot expect that our collective security system will long survive if we take steps which unnecessarily and dangerously expose the people who are in the system with us. They would understandably hesitate to be tied to a partner who leads them to a highly dangerous short cut across a difficult crevasse.

In relation to the total world threat, our safety requires that we strengthen, not weaken, the bonds of our collective security system.

The power of our coalition to deter an attack depends in part upon the will and the mutual confidence of our partners. If we, by the measures proposed, were to weaken that effect, particularly in the North Atlantic area, we would be jeopardizing the security of an area which is vital to our own national security.

What this adds up to, it seems to me, is that we are being asked to undertake a large risk of general war with China, risk of war with the Soviet Union, and a demonstrable weakening of our collective security system—all this in return for what?

In return for measures whose effectiveness in bringing the conflict to an early conclusion are judged doubtful by our responsible military authorities.

Before concluding, I should like to deal briefly with the related proposition that we may need to take extreme risks now because time may not be on our side. I believe this is wrong.

The basic premise of our foreign policy is that time is on our side if we make good use of it. This does not necessarily mean that time must bring us to a point where we can match the Soviet Union man-for-man and tank-for-tank.

What it does mean is that we need to use the time we have to build an effective deterrent force. This requires us to create sufficient force-in-being, both in the United States and among our allies, to shield our great potential against the possibility of a quick and easy onslaught, and to ensure that our allies will not suffer occupation and destruction. And back of this shield we need to have the potential that would enable us to win a war.

This is the measure of the force we need; as we approach it, we approach our objective of preventing war.

Can we do this? I believe we can. We and our allies have the capacity to out-produce the Soviet bloc by a staggering margin. There is no doubt about that. Our capacity to produce has been set in motion and is rapidly getting to the point where its output will be vast and its effect significant.

There is also the critical factor of our will. The future belongs to freedom if free men have the will to make time work on their side. I believe the American people and their allies do have the will, the will to work together when their freedom is threatened.

This is the ultimate source of our faith and our confidence. A free society can call upon profound resources among its people in behalf of a righteous cause.

46. UNITED STATES EMBARGO ACTION AGAINST COMMUNIST CHINA AND NORTH KOREA: Report Submitted by the Deputy United States Representative at the United Nations to the Additional Measures Committee of the United Nations General Assembly, June 15, 1951 (Excerpt)¹

PART I

The controls applied by the United States on shipments to the Chinese Communists and the North Korean authorities are more comprehensive than those called for by Resolution 500(V)² and were placed in effect before that Resolution was passed. Exports from the United States of arms, ammunition and implements of war (Annex I)³ and atomic energy materials (Annex II)⁴ to North Korea and to Communist China have not been authorized at any time, and exports of a number of other strategic articles were severely restricted and in some instances embargoed for some time prior to June 1950. Since the end of June 1950, the United States Government has permitted no shipments to North Korea and applied an embargo on shipments to Communist China not only of arms and munitions but also of atomic energy materials, petroleum products, and other items of strategic value included in the United States Positive List. (Annex III.)⁵

The scope of the economic measures applied against the Chinese Communists by the United States was greatly extended when it became unmistakably clear that they were engaged in large-scale

Gross, Deputy U.S. Representative to the General Assembly, see ibid., July 9, 1951, p. 54. The Mutual Defense Assistance Control Act of 1951 (Act of Oct. 26, 1951; infra, pp. 3101-3105) also included embargo provisions which became effective Jan. 24, 1952.

itary operations against United Nations forces in Korea. Since September 1950, the United States has not exported any materials whatever to Communist China. Vessels and aircraft documented and registered under United States laws have not been permitted to land at any Chinese Communist port or area or to carry any cargo destined directly or indirectly for Communist China. Strict control has been exercised over commodities in transit through the United States destined for Communist China. All Communist China and North Korea assets within the United States have been blocked and subjected to stringent controls.

The United States believes that the United States Positive List contains items which would meet the intent of the General Assembly Resolution of May 18. Not all these items are included within the scope of paragraph 1 (A) of the Resolution. Nevertheless, the United States believes that the control of such items furthers the basic purpose of the Resolution.

The scope and detail of the United States Munitions List, the list of atomic energy materials, and the United States Positive List may assist cooperating States in effecting the embargo by providing a basis for that efficient customs administration, control of transit, and control over transport of prohibited cargoes which it is the purpose of the Resolution to accomplish. It may also contribute to the working out of such further measures in the field of economic controls as may become appropriate or necessary.

The United States will prevent by all means within its jurisdiction the circumvention of controls on shipments applied by other States under the Resolution and cooperate fully with other States and the Additional Measures Committee in carrying out the purposes of this embargo.

PART II

The following is a summary of the measures taken by the United States to control its trade with the aggressors.

The export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war as defined in Presidential Proclamation 2776, of April 13, 1948, is controlled by the Secretary of State (Annex I). The export of atomic energy materials as defined in the Atomic Energy Act of 1946¹ is controlled by the United States Atomic Energy Commission (Annex II). Shipments of such materials to Communist China and North Korea have not been authorized at any time. In November 1949, this policy was extended to include Hong Kong and Macao, as possible transshipment points, and only very limited materials for the use of these governments have been licensed since that time.

The export from the United States to foreign destinations of commodities in short supply and of strategic materials is controlled through the Positive List administered by the Department of Commerce under the authority of the Export Control Act of 1949² (Annex III). Commodities which appear on the Positive List are placed there after determination by the United States Government that they possess sufficient strategic value or are in such critical supply as to justify careful screening of destination and end-use. Such commodities cannot be exported to foreign destinations without validated export licenses.

From June 1950, shortly after the North Korean aggression against the Republic of Korea, until December 1950, the United States Government was applying an embargo over shipments to Communist China of arms and munitions, petroleum products, atomic energy materials, and all other items on the United States Positive List.

Since June 1950, no shipments of any kind have been permitted to go to North Korea, and the subsequent measures outlined below have been applied to North Korea as well as Communist China.

As a precaution, in the light of the Chinese Communist intervention in the Korean struggle, the Department of Commerce issued an order, effective December 3, 1950, subjecting all proposed exports from the United States to the mainland of China or to Hong Kong and Macao (as possible transshipment points) to a screening procedure in order to prevent Communist China from obtaining materials, the receipt of which by Communist China would be contrary to the objectives of the United Nations in Korea. The order revoked all General Licenses for the exportation of any commodity, whether or not included on the Positive List, to Communist China and to Hong Kong and Macao.

On December 7, 1950, an additional Department of Commerce order was issued providing authorization for United States officials to stop shipments loaded under General Licenses if the ships came into United States ports en route. Since that date, accordingly, validated export licenses are required for all commodities intended for the destinations noted above if a vessel, whatever its registry, has not obtained clearance from the final port of departure in the United States for a foreign port or if, after receiving final clearance, the vessel transits the Panama Canal Zone. The order directed that shipments which were not licensed were required to be off-loaded prior to final clearance or proceeding through the Canal Zone. Under Department of Commerce orders effective December 4, and 6, 1950, shipments of all commodities, whether or not on the Positive List, originating in any foreign country moving in transit through the United States or using the facilities of a foreign trade zone or manifested to the United States may not be exported to China, Manchuria, Hong Kong or Macao without a validated export license. The foregoing actions were taken under the authority of the Export Control Act of 1949 (See Annex IV).¹

On December 8, 1950, the Department of Commerce, Under Secretary for Transportation, under the authority granted by Section 101 of the Defense Production Act of 1950, issued Transportation Order T-1. This order directed that no person should transport in any ship documented under the laws of the United States or in any aircraft registered under the laws of the United States any commodities at the time on the Positive List, or any article on the Munitions List, or any article controlled for export under the Atomic Energy Act of 1946, to China, Manchuria, Hong Kong or Macao; and no person should discharge from any such ship or aircraft any such commodity at these ports or areas, or at any other ports in transit to such destinations, without a validated export license, or unless authorization had been obtained from the Under Secretary of Commerce for Transportation. The prohibition applied to the ship or aircraft owner, master or any other officer or employee of the owner (Annex V).¹

On December 16, 1950, the Department of State announced that the United States was taking measures to place under control all Chinese Communist assets within United States jurisdiction and was issuing regulations to prohibit ships of United States registry from calling at Chinese Communist ports until further notice.² These actions were necessary to accomplish the effective control of the economic relationships between the United States and Communist China-North Korea envisaged by the December 3 requirement that no exports would be permitted to these destinations from the United States without validated export licenses (Annex VI).

The Department of the Treasury accomplished this financial control by action under the Foreign Assets Regulations (pursuant to the first War Powers Act of 1941 and the Trading With the Enemy Act of October 6, 1917, as amended) blocking the United States assets of residents of China and North Korea. The blocking regulations forbade all transactions involving bank accounts and United States assets of the Communist Chinese and the North Korean regimes and their nationals unless Treasury approval was obtained. A series of blanket authorizations were included in the regulations, protecting individual Chinese and Koreans in the United States and abroad, where these persons were not acting on behalf of the North Korean or Chinese Communist regimes (Annex VII).³

The Department of Commerce accomplished its shipping controls by the issuance of Transportation Order T-2, under the authority of Section 101 of the Defense Production Act of 1950. This order provided, in substance, that no person should take any ship or aircraft documented or registered under the laws of the United States to any Chinese Communist port or area; that no person should transport, on any ship or aircraft documented or registered under the laws of the United States, cargo of any kind to Communist ports or to any other places under the control of the Chinese Communists; that no person should take on board any such ship or aircraft any cargo if he knows or has reason to believe that it is destined, directly or indirectly, for Communist China; and that no person should discharge from any such ship or aircraft any such cargo so destined at any place other than the port where the cargo was loaded, or within territory under United

47. APPEAL FOR ADDITIONAL GROUND FORCES IN KOREA:
Communication From the Unified Command to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, June 21, 1951²

The acting representative of the United States to the United Nations presents his compliments to the Secretary-General of the United Nations and has the honor to address a communication on behalf of the United States, acting in its capacity as the Unified Command, concerning the need for additional ground troops from Member Governments of the United Nations for the collective effort in Korea.

The Unified Command has conducted and is now conducting extensive bilateral conversations in connection with this problem with various Member States and, in particular, is conducting conversations with States which have already contributed armed forces.

In order to further efforts of the Unified Command in this respect, the Secretary-General is requested to send communications on behalf of the Unified Command to Member Governments which previously gave a favorable reply either to the Security Council's resolution of June 25, 1950,³ or to its resolution of June 27, 1950,⁴ but which have not yet contributed armed forces for the collective effort in Korea, advising the aforementioned Members of the need for further ground assistance in Korea. There is a real need for additional forces from Member States in the light of massive Chinese Communist concentrations in the area and of their continuing aggression. The Unified Command therefore requests the Secretary-General in his communication to appeal to Member Governments which have given their support to the Security Council resolutions but have not made contributions of armed forces that they give immediate consideration to making an initial contribution of ground forces of substantial character, consonant with their respective capabilities and other responsibilities.

Further, it is requested that Member Governments be asked to notify the Secretary-General of offers in general terms, detailed arrangements to be made by the respective Member Governments and the Unified Command.

D. NEGOTIATIONS FOR AN ARMISTICE AGREEMENT, JUNE 1951-JULY 1953

48. SUMMARY OF THE ARMISTICE NEGOTIATIONS, JUNE 1951-JULY 1953: Special Report of the United Nations Command to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, August 7, 1953¹

A. In general

The history of the continuing efforts of the Unified Command and of the United Nations at all times to bring an end to the fighting in Korea on an honourable basis is set forth in various documents of the United Nations. The Unified Command took numerous steps to this end on its own initiative and co-operated fully with proposals of others for bringing about peace on a basis consistent with United Nations objectives in Korea.

In July [June] 1951, it appeared from statements made by Communist spokesmen² that the aggressor forces were willing to cease hostilities. However, the hopes of the Unified Command for quickly concluding an agreement that would stop the fighting soon proved illusory. Time after time the Communists stalled, injected extraneous issues, endeavoured to use the negotiations for propaganda purposes, and otherwise indicated a lack of good faith. Despite these obstacles the United Nations negotiators consistently evinced a willingness to reach agreement.

The United Nations Command was determined that the Armistice Agreement must contribute to the achievement of the basic purposes of the United Nations military action in Korea—to repel the aggression against the Republic of Korea and to restore peace and security in the area. The United Nations Command therefore insisted on the following requirements:

- (1) A line of demarcation based upon military realities and affording defensible positions for the opposing forces, consistent with the United Nations objective of repelling aggression;
- (2) Other provisions offering maximum reasonable assurance against a renewal of the aggression;
- (3) Appropriate arrangements for an exchange of prisoners of war on a basis that would ensure the return of United Nations Command prisoners of war and the disposition of prisoners safeguarding the right of asylum, consistent with international law, the Geneva Convention³ and humanitarian principles.

So long as the Communists refused to agree to an armistice on this basis, the United Nations Command was compelled to insist on the continuation of the fighting in accordance with the resolutions of the Security Council and the General Assembly, so as to compel the enemy to accept an honourable end to the fighting.

B. Early obstacles to agreement

(1) The agenda and the conference site

At the very beginning of negotiations the Communists raised issues calculated to delay them. They sought adoption of an agenda that would prejudice in their favour the substance of the items to be discussed. The Communists sought, for example, to obtain agreement on language in the agenda recognizing the 38th parallel as the line of demarcation for the cease-fire. The Communists also proposed an agenda item on the withdrawal of foreign forces from Korea. The United Nations Command insisted on an objective agenda, and one was finally adopted.¹ The question of the withdrawal of foreign troops was rejected as beyond the scope of military negotiations.²

Delay was also occasioned by Communist violations of the neutrality of the conference area and failure to provide equal treatment to both delegations as originally promised. Fabricated charges by the Communists that the United Nations Command had violated the neutrality of the conference area led to suspension of the talks for two months from August to October 1951.³

(2) Arrangements for implementing the armistice

The armistice, of course, had to contain provisions for putting an end to the fighting. The United Nations Command delegation also sought arrangements which would make renewal of the hostilities less likely. The negotiations on these matters were extended and painstaking. The United Nations Command delegation wanted the broadest possible access to all parts of Korea for a supervisory body to ensure against violations of the armistice. It was quite willing to have such inspection behind its own lines. The Communists, however, for some time resisted all proposals for inspection and finally agreed to it only on a limited scale. At one point, the United Nations Command proposed inspection of the implementation of the armistice by joint teams to operate throughout Korea. Following Communist rejection of this proposal, agreement was reached on arrangements for inspection by observers drawn from countries not participating in the Korean action and acceptable to both sides. But the Communists further delayed the negotiations by nominating the Soviet Union as a "neutral"; this was of course unacceptable to the United Nations Command.⁴

The United Nations Command proposed a ban, applicable to both sides, on the construction of new military airfields and a ceiling on the number of civilian airfields that could be rehabilitated. Such a prohibition would have made resumption of the aggression more difficult and less likely. The Communists adamantly refused to agree to such a limitation.

(3) Prisoners of war

The issue that, in appearance at least, contributed most to the delay in achieving an armistice involved the repatriation of prisoners of war. From the outset the United Nations Command made it clear that, while it was prepared to repatriate all the prisoners of war in its custody, it would not agree to use force against prisoners resisting return to the Communists.¹ The Communists stubbornly insisted, however, that all prisoners of war must be returned, by force if necessary.

In an extraordinary effort to break the long continuing deadlock on this issue the United Nations Command, on 28 April 1952, offered a "package proposal"² providing that (a) there shall not be forced repatriation of prisoners of war; (b) that the United Nations Command will not insist on prohibiting reconstruction and rehabilitation of airfields; and (c) the United Nations Command agrees to accept Poland and Czechoslovakia as members of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission if the Communists agree to accept Sweden and Switzerland (thus withdrawing their demand for the inclusion of the Soviet Union).³

The United Nations Command made it clear that this proposal must be accepted as a unit. The Communists, however, purported to accept the second and third points only, remaining adamant on prisoners of war. As a result of their rejection, the armistice was delayed and the fighting continued for fifteen additional months. They persisted in this inhumane attitude for many months, contrary to international law and in the face of preponderant world opinion, even after the principle of non-forcible repatriation was approved by fifty-four Members of the United Nations who supported the General Assembly resolution of 3 December 1952.⁴ Communist intransigence, and Communist failure to bargain in good faith on this issue, compelled the United Nations Command to recess the plenary negotiations on 8 October 1952. They were not resumed until 26 April 1953,⁵ when the Communists finally indicated that they were prepared to consider a solution for the prisoner of war question consistent with humanitarian principles and the principles of the General Assembly resolution.

C. The agreements finally reached

All the agreements between the United Nations Command Delegation and the Communist Delegation are set forth in the attached Armistice Agreement¹ and the Prisoner of War Agreement with the Supplementary Agreement of 27 July attached to it.² In some cases, as the record of the negotiations indicates, the United Nations Command recorded its understanding as to the meaning of phrases in the Armistice Agreement that might otherwise be ambiguous.

(1) The Military Demarcation Line

The Communists delayed negotiations for some time by insisting that the demarcation line between both sides should be the 38th parallel. Finally, however, they recognized the merit of the United Nations Command position that the line should be determined strictly on military grounds and should correspond to the actual line of contact between the opposing forces.³ The objective of the United Nations Command in insisting on such a line was to provide maximum defensive safeguards against a possible renewal of the aggression.

The line of demarcation was first marked out on 27 November 1951, on the basis of the line of contact as of that time.⁴ It was then agreed that this should be the final demarcation line, provided an armistice was achieved within thirty days; otherwise the line should be redrawn on the basis of the line of contact at the time of the armistice. In fact, tentative agreement was reached on a new line in June 1953, when it seemed that an armistice could be signed within a very few days, but the Communists insisted that it be redrawn again to take account of the results of the offensive they launched on 13-14 July 1953. The Demarcation Line was finally agreed on the basis indicated in the map attached to the Armistice Agreement.⁵ The Demilitarized Zone was established in accordance with the agreement, each side withdrawing its forces two kilometres north and south of the Demarcation Line respectively.

(2) Arrangements for implementing the armistice

With the exception of the continuing disagreement on the rehabilitation of airfields, the arrangements for implementing the armistice were virtually completed by March 1952. The United Nations Command finally gave up its insistence on the limitation of airfields when it signed the armistice. The agreements on this subject may be summarized as follows:

1. There will be a cease-fire within twelve hours of the signing of an armistice.
2. Both sides will withdraw their forces from the Demilitarized Zone within seventy-two hours after the signing of an armistice.
3. All military forces will be withdrawn from rear areas and the coastal islands and waters of Korea within five days after the signing of an armistice.

4. Both sides shall cease the introduction into Korea of reinforcing military personnel. However, the rotation of 35,000 military personnel a month shall be permitted. Rotated personnel shall enter Korea only through designated ports of entry, under the supervision and inspection of the teams of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission.
5. Both sides shall cease the introduction into Korea of reinforcing combat aircraft, armoured vehicles, weapons and ammunition. However, the replacement of destroyed, damaged, worn-out or used up equipment on the basis of piece-for-piece of the same effectiveness and the same type is permitted. Such replacement shall take place only through designated ports of entry, under the supervision and inspection of teams of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission.
6. A Military Armistice Commission, with headquarters at Panmunjom composed of military officers of the United Nations Command and the Communist forces and aided by Joint Observer Teams will:
 - (a) Supervise the implementation of the Armistice Agreement;
 - (b) Deal with alleged armistice violations and settle through negotiations any such violations;
 - (c) Report all violations of the Armistice Agreement to the Commanders of the opposing sides.
7. A Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission, with headquarters in proximity to those of the Military Armistice Commission, composed of four senior officers, two of whom shall be appointed by neutral nations nominated by the United Nations Command and two of whom shall be appointed by neutral nations nominated jointly by the Supreme Commander of the Korean People's Army and the Commander of the Chinese People's Volunteers¹ will supervise, observe, inspect, and investigate adherence to the terms of the armistice agreement relative to the introduction into Korea of reinforcing military personnel and equipment. At the request of the Military Armistice Commission or senior member of either side, it can conduct special observation and inspection at places outside the demilitarized zone where violations have been reported. Twenty inspection teams, ten of which will be located at the designated ports of entry, five in North Korea and five in South Korea, with ten mobile teams in reserve, will assist the Commission.

(3) The political conference following an armistice

In order to counter the constant efforts of the Communists to inject political questions into the Korean armistice negotiations, and to prevent such extraneous issues from delaying armistice negotiations, the United Nations Command agreed to dispose of political questions favour, with only the Soviet bloc in opposition, the General Assembly adopted resolution 610 (VII).¹ This resolution specified that force should not be used against prisoners to prevent or effect their return, and it set forth a detailed series of proposals which the Assembly believed would form a just and reasonable basis for an agreement on the prisoner issue. The Communists rejected this plan, and hopes for an armistice in the foreseeable future appeared dim.

Nevertheless, the Unified Command continued to examine every possibility for solving the prisoner question. Seizing the opportunity offered by a resolution adopted by the Executive Committee of the League of Red Cross Societies on 13 December 1952, which appealed to the parties, as a gesture of good will, to implement the humanitarian principles of the Geneva Convention by repatriating sick and wounded prisoners of war, the Commander-in-Chief of the United Nations Command, on 22 February 1953, addressed a letter to the Communist commanders stating that the United Nations Command still remained ready to implement, immediately, the repatriation of the sick and wounded, and asking if the Communists were prepared to proceed with the repatriation of sick and wounded prisoners in their custody.² The United Nations Command had made this same proposal to the Communists on a number of previous occasions during the armistice negotiations, but they had failed to respond. It was hoped that the Communists would at last agree to such an exchange, that it would bring about the return of at least some of the United Nations Command prisoners of war, and that this first step might pave the way for the solution of the prisoner issue as a whole. The hopes of the United Nations Command in this regard proved not unwarranted. On 28 March the Communists agreed to the principle of the exchange of sick and wounded, which they stated "should be made to lead to the smooth settlement of the entire question of prisoners of war", and arrangements for the exchange were initiated through the respective liaison officers on 6 April.³

The Communist acceptance was followed on 30 March by a statement by Chou En-lai, Foreign Minister of the Communist People's Government of the People's Republic of China, subsequently endorsed by the Prime Minister of the North Korean regime,⁴ indicating a desire to resume negotiations on the entire prisoner question and a readiness to take a more constructive and humane attitude on the question of forcible repatriation.

Sick and wounded prisoners of war were in fact exchanged between 20 April and 3 May 1953 pursuant to an agreement reached on 11 April 1953.⁵

by recommending their consideration at a political conference following an armistice. The United Nations Command Delegation accepted a revised Communist proposal now contained in article 60 of the Armistice Agreement, which provides:

"In order to insure the peaceful settlement of the Korean question, the military Commanders of both sides hereby recommend to the governments of the countries concerned on both sides that, within three (3) months after the Armistice Agreement is signed and becomes effective, a political conference of a higher level of both sides be held by representatives appointed respectively to settle through negotiation the questions of the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Korea, the peaceful settlement of the Korean question, etc."

(4) Prisoners of war

The background of this question, and the position of the United Nations Command was outlined in the Special Unified Command report of 18 October 1952 (A/2228).¹ As indicated at that time, the only issue preventing agreement was Communist insistence that all prisoners of war must be repatriated, even if the use of force should be necessary to effect their return, and United Nations Command refusal to use force against such unwilling prisoners. When the Communists insisted that there were in fact no prisoners who refused to be repatriated, but that the United Nations Command was detaining them against their will, the United Nations Command made numerous proposals for impartial determination of the true attitudes of the prisoners of war. The Communists refused to submit this question to the test and thus further delayed achievement of an armistice.

On 8 October 1952, the United Nations Command Delegation recessed the negotiations.² In doing so, it made clear that the numerous proposals which it had made for an honourable solution of the prisoner question remained open. Whenever the Communists were prepared to negotiate in good faith, to accept any one of the United Nations Command proposals, or to make a constructive proposal of their own on the prisoner issue, the United Nations Command Delegation would be prepared to meet again.

At this juncture the Korean question came before the General Assembly, and the United States Government, as the Unified Command, reported on the state of the negotiations. It urged the Assembly to approve the principle of nonforcible repatriation and to call upon the Communists to accept an armistice on this basis. A definite plan for the solution of the prisoner-of-war question was proposed by India and discussed in the hope of gaining Communist approval, and on 3 December 1952, by a majority of 54 votes in Negotiations by the plenary armistice delegations on the prisoner-of-war question as a whole resumed on 26 April. At the outset, the Communists submitted a proposal¹ for sending all prisoners not directly repatriated to an agreed neutral State where for six months after their arrival representatives of the States to which they belonged would "explain" to them matters related to their return; if after this period any non-repatriates remained, their disposition would be referred to the political conference. Discussion subsequently centered upon the questions of what neutral State should be nominated, of whether non-repatriates should be removed from Korea, and how long the non-repatriates would remain in neutral custody.

On 7 May, the Communists put forward a new proposal² providing for establishment of a Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission to be composed of the four States already nominated for membership on the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission, namely, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Sweden and Switzerland, and India as agreed upon by both sides. This Commission was to take custody of the prisoners in Korea. The United Nations Command on 13 May³ presented a counter-proposal shortening the period of time in which the non-repatriates would remain in neutral custody, providing for release of Korean non-repatriates immediately after the armistice, and proposing that only Indian forces take actual custody of the non-repatriates. The Communists rejected this proposal.

On 25 May, the United Nations Command, in another effort to obtain Communist agreement on an equitable solution of the prisoner issue, submitted a new proposal⁴ providing for the transfer of both Korean and Chinese non-repatriates to neutral custody and for consideration of the disposition of any remaining non-repatriates by the political conference for a limited period, after which they might either be released to civilian status or the question of their disposition referred to the General Assembly. On 4 June, the Communists offered a counter-proposal in effect based upon the mechanics of General Assembly resolution 610 (VII), also closely paralleling the United Nations Command 25 May proposal, but vague on the basic principle of non-forcible repatriation. The United Nations Command succeeded in reaching agreement with the Communists on elaboration of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission's terms of reference to insure that there could be no abuse and that the principle approved by the General Assembly that force should not be used to compel or to prevent repatriation of any prisoner of war would be fully observed.

On 8 June, the Senior Delegates for the United Nations Command and for the Communists signed the Prisoner-of-War Agreement which is attached to and incorporated by reference in the Armistice Agreement.¹ The delegations then proceeded to the final arrangements looking toward an early signature of the armistice.

As a result of discussions with the Republic of Korea, described in the succeeding section, a Supplementary Agreement on Prisoners of War was signed on 27 July 1953,² which permits the United Nations Command (and the Communists if applicable), to transport the non-repatriates to the Demilitarized Zone where the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission will take custody of them.

D. The attitude of the Republic of Korea

On 18 June an incident occurred which further delayed the achievement of an armistice at a time when the conclusion of hostilities seemed imminent. On that date, officials of the Republic of Korea brought about a break-out from prisoner-of-war camps of some 27,000 Korean prisoners of war who had previously indicated they would resist repatriation to North Korea.³ This action by the Republic of Korea was inconsistent with the 8 June Agreement on Prisoners of War which the United Nations Command had entered into on behalf of all the forces under its command. The United Nations Command at once protested the action of the Republic of Korea Government.⁴ It immediately informed the Communists of the event and told them that, while efforts would be made to recover as many of the escapees as possible, there was not much hope that many of these could be recaptured since they had melted into the South Korean population.⁵

This incident led to immediate discussions with the Republic of Korea by representatives of the Unified Command.⁶ After prolonged conversations, the Republic of Korea gave assurances that it would not obstruct the implementation of the terms of the Armistice Agreement.

The incident, however, gave the Communists an excuse for delaying still further the conclusion of the armistice. They demanded assurances that the United Nations Command would live up to the Armistice Agreement, that the Republic of Korea and its forces would also abide by it, and that the released prisoners would be recaptured.⁷ The United Nations Command reply to the Communists stressed that the armistice was a military agreement between military commanders and that it was being entered into by the United Nations Command, as Commander of all the forces under its command, including those of the Republic of Korea. The United Nations Command Delegation also told the Communists that so far as recovering the released prisoners of war, as they had already been informed, this would be impossible; they were assured, however, that the remaining non-repatriate prisoners would be turned over to the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission, as provided by the agreement on prisoners of war. The Communists were assured that the United Nations Command forces (including those of the Republic of Korea) would observe the armistice. The United Nations Command informed the Communists, however, that it would not undertake to use force against the Republic of Korea forces to ensure compliance with the armistice by the Republic of Korea.¹

Despite these comprehensive assurances by the United Nations Command, the Communists continued to delay negotiations and in the meanwhile launched the biggest offensive in more than two years, an offensive which obviously took much planning and preparation and caused heavy casualties. Finally, however, on 19 July, the Communists stated their readiness to proceed with the final work on the Armistice Agreement leading to its signature.

The armistice was finally signed on 27 July 1953, at 10 a. m. Korean time.

49. INITIAL EXCHANGES BETWEEN SOVIET AND UNITED STATES REPRESENTATIVES AT THE UNITED NATIONS CONCERNING NEGOTIATION OF AN ARMISTICE: Statement by the Department of State, June 28, 1951²

The United States has sought in New York and in Moscow a clarification on certain aspects of the statement made by Jacob A. Malik, the Soviet representative at the United Nations, on June 23.³

Deputy Foreign Minister Gromyko received the United States Ambassador in Moscow on June 27. In discussing Mr. Malik's statement, Mr. Gromyko indicated that it would be for the military representatives of the Unified Command and of the Korean Republic Command, on the one hand, and the military representatives of the North Korean Command and of the "Chinese volunteer units," on the other, to negotiate the armistice envisaged in Mr. Malik's statement. The armistice, Mr. Gromyko pointed out, would include a cease-fire and would be limited to strictly military questions without involving any political or territorial matters; the military representatives would discuss questions of assurances against the resumption of hostilities.

Beyond the conclusion of an armistice, the Soviet Government had no specific steps in mind looking toward the peaceful settlement to which Mr. Malik referred. Mr. Gromyko indicated, however, that it would be up to the parties in Korea to decide what subsequent special arrangements would have to be made for a political and territorial settlement. He said that the Soviet Government was not aware of the views of the Chinese Communist regime on Mr. Malik's statement.

The implications of Mr. Gromyko's observations are being studied. The Department of State is consulting with the representatives of other countries having armed forces in Korea under the Unified Command.

50. PROPOSED INITIAL MEETING TO DISCUSS AN ARMISTICE: Message From the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command,¹ to the Commanders-in-Chief of the Chinese Communist and North Korean Forces,² June 30, 1951³

As Commander in Chief of the United Nations Command I have been instructed to communicate to you the following:

I am informed that you may wish a meeting to discuss an armistice providing for the cessation of hostilities and all acts of armed force in Korea, with adequate guarantees for the maintenance of such armistice.

Upon the receipt of word from you that such a meeting is desired I shall be prepared to name my representative. I would also at that time suggest a date at which he could meet with your representative. I propose that such a meeting could take place aboard a Danish hospital ship [Jyllandia] in Wonsan harbor.

51. AGREED AGENDA FOR ARMISTICE NEGOTIATIONS: Announcement by the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, July 26, 1951⁴

This afternoon the delegations representing the belligerent forces in Korea in the conference at Kaesong agreed upon an agenda for the regulation of the military armistice conference.

This agenda is as follows:

1. Adoption of agenda.
2. Fixing a military demarcation line between both sides so as to establish a demilitarized zone as a basic condition for a cessation of hostilities in Korea.
3. Concrete arrangements for the realization of a cease-fire and an armistice in Korea, including the composition, authority and functions of a supervising organization for carrying out the terms of a cease-fire and armistice.
4. Arrangements relating to prisoners of war.

5. Recommendations to the governments of the countries concerned on both sides.

Having agreed upon an agenda, the way now is clear for the delegations to enter the area of really substantive discussion of the terms of a military armistice. Major problems remain to be solved in these discussions. It is much too early to predict either the success or the rate of progress to be obtained. Preliminary discussion began immediately after the agreement on the agenda in order that the potential for halting bloodshed in Korea may be realized as soon as possible.

It must be fully realized that mutual acceptance of an agenda is merely the initial step for the final goal of a military armistice and resultant cease-fire, which must be achieved under conditions giving every reasonable assurance against the resumption of hostilities.

There are numerous basic points within the framework of the agenda on which agreement must be reached and on which there is presently wide diversion of views.

52. REQUEST FOR COOPERATION OF THE SOVIET UNION IN NEGOTIATING A KOREAN ARMISTICE: Statement Read by the American Ambassador at Moscow¹ to the Soviet Minister for Foreign Affairs,² October 5, 1951³

I have been instructed before leaving Moscow for an extended period to take advantage of the opportunity to discuss certain matters now causing international tension and standing in the way of improved relations between our two countries.

At the present time the most explosive outstanding issue is Korea, and the armistice talks are the most immediate aspect of that problem. The cessation of fighting in Korea on a mutually acceptable basis would serve to reduce tensions and contribute to an atmosphere in which further constructive steps might be taken toward the solution of other pressing international problems.

The developments between the United Nations Command and the North Korean and Chinese Communist negotiators are incomprehensible to the United States Government. The North Korean and Chinese Communist proposals in regard to an armistice line are inconsistent with the current military situation and with statements which Acting Foreign Minister Gromyko made to me upon the occasion of my call on him on June 27 of this year to clarify the earlier public statement by Mr. Malik in New York on June 25.⁴ In that interview Mr. Gromyko explained that the Soviet Government envisaged a meeting of the opposing commands to conclude a military armistice which would include a cease fire and which would be limited strictly to military questions and would not involve any political or territorial matters.

The United Nations Command was surprised and disappointed to discover that the opposing negotiators kept insisting upon an armistice line not strictly military in character which introduced complicated political and territorial issues contrary to the understanding on which the United Nations Command had entered the negotiations and which does not conform to the military requirements for a satisfactory armistice line. To take important political steps in military conversations between the United Nations Commander on the one side and commanders on the other, who profess to represent Chinese "volunteers" and a North Korean regime which enjoys no international status, cannot be accepted. The United Nations Commander was authorized to participate in such military talks with the thought that this would provide the Soviet Government with an opportunity to assist in bringing about an armistice. This does not mean that the United States Government is prepared to dispose of important political matters in talks with such irregular Communist military personnel. Political issues of a Korean settlement must be dealt with subsequent to an armistice by the United Nations and by the governments concerned on a responsible basis.

In the opinion of the United States Government the attitude of the Communist bloc toward the restoration of peace will be tested by whether the North Korean and Chinese Communist negotiators are prepared to reach an armistice settlement based on purely military factors; upon a reasonable line affording safety to the armed forces of both sides; and upon adequate arrangements for the inspection of compliance with the armistice terms; and for the satisfactory disposition of prisoners of war. The Soviet Government must surely recognize that, as a simple statement of fact, the breakdown of armistice talks in Korea would add greatly to the explosive character of the situation and might stimulate a course of events which would be undesirable from the point of view of both our governments. The United States Government for its part has clearly shown by its declarations and by its actions that it desires an end to the conflict in Korea and to prevent its spreading to other areas, purposes which the Soviet Government has publicly stated it shares.

With regard to the current status of the armistice talks, I wish to affirm that the United Nations Command is sincerely desirous of concluding an armistice. However, past experience with the Kaesong site fully illustrates the fact that this place does not afford adequate protection guaranteeing the security of the negotiations. The insistence of the United Nations Command upon another site which will not be under the control of either side and to which both sides will have free access should eliminate the possibility of incidents and insure that the talks can be resumed with good prospect of success. In proposing to discuss the change of site from Kaesong, the sole purpose of the United Nations Command has been to obtain a resumption of the talks in a truly neutral area with equality of rights and access and to obviate the possibility of charges and countercharges concerning incidents which have plagued the talks to this date. In the eyes of the United Nations Command there is no reason why agreement on another site truly neutral cannot be quickly agreed upon by both sides and the talks resumed.

Of all the problems and causes of tensions in the postwar world the Korean problem presents the clearest immediate issue. The invasion of South Korea on June 25, 1950 was an act of naked aggression—a fact understood throughout the world. The very fact that the North Korean Army almost succeeded in reaching Pusan in the early stages of the war demonstrates clearly upon whose responsibility the aggression lay. However, I have no desire now to enter into a fruitless discussion concerning what has been done; what I do wish to impress upon you is the seriousness of the present impasse in the Korean armistice talks. It is hoped that the Soviet Government will act to the end that the North Korean and Chinese Communist negotiators will conclude a realistic armistice agreement which would afford safety for both sides and which does not become involved with political and territorial issues with which the governments of the United Nations must deal.

I assume that the Soviet Government is receiving full and objective reports concerning developments outside the Soviet Union and the attitude of the United States and other states confronted by Soviet policies which have proved uncompromising and not contributory to the solution of mutual problems. The Soviet Government does not need to be told that other nations are determined to defend their own way of life and independence. The measures now being taken by the United States and other governments to increase their security are for defense and defense alone. On specific instructions of my government I wish to assure the Soviet Government that the United States has no aggressive designs on the U.S.S.R. or on anyone and it is our hope that there may soon be restored to the nations of the world a sense of confidence and security which should be conducive to the settlement of outstanding issues embittering international relations. Nothing could contribute more to this as an immediate first step than the successful outcome of the Korean armistice talks.

Without the achievement of an armistice in Korea, there is little if any prospect for any real solution of other problems besetting us throughout the world. An armistice in Korea might open up perspectives for the useful discussion of other measures which may be taken to alleviate existing tensions. In conclusion I should like to express the hope of the United States Government that an armistice can be achieved and that the Soviet Government will act to that end.¹

53. BASIS FOR ESTABLISHING A MILITARY DEMARCATION LINE: Agreement Reached Between Representatives of the United Nations Command and the Chinese Communist and North Korean Commands, November 23, 1951¹

1. The principle is accepted that the actual line of contact between both sides (as determined under either paragraph two or three, as appropriate) will be made the military demarcation line and that at the time specified in the signed armistice agreement both sides will withdraw two kilometers from this line so as to establish the demilitarized zone for the duration of the military armistice.

2. In accordance with the above-stated principle, the subdelegations will determine immediately the present line of contact so as to fix it as the military demarcation line and as the median line of the demilitarized zone. If the military armistice agreement is signed within 30 days after the two delegations approve in the plenary session this agreement and the specific location of the above military demarcation line and demilitarized zone, the military demarcation line and demilitarized zone shall not be changed, regardless of whatever changes may occur in the actual line of contact between both sides.

3. In view of the fact that hostilities will continue until the signing of the armistice agreement, if the military armistice agreement is not signed within 30 days after the two delegations approve in the plenary session this line and the demilitarized zone as determined in paragraph two above, the subdelegations shall revise, immediately prior to the signing of the military armistice agreement, the above-mentioned demarcation line and the demilitarized zone in accordance with the changes which have occurred in the actual line of contact between both sides so that the revised military demarcation line will coincide exactly with the line of contact between both sides immediately prior to the signing of the military armistice agreement and will constitute the military demarcation line for the duration of the military armistice

54. PRINCIPLES FOR CARRYING OUT AN ARMISTICE: Proposal by the United Nations Command, November 27, 1951²

On November 27 the joint subcommittee accepted the staff officers' decision on the location of the battle line. Later the same day the Military Armistice Conference began its first plenary session since October 25 by ratifying the joint subcommittee's recommendation as to the establishment of a line of demarcation.

The full conference then proceeded to a discussion of procedures to be followed after the signing of an armistice agreement. The U.N. delegation presented the following principles:

1. There shall be a cease-fire, effective within 24 hours of the signing of the armistice agreement, and adhered to by all forces of any type under the control of either side.
2. There shall be established a supervisory organization, equally and jointly manned by both sides, for carrying out the terms of the armistice agreement.
3. There shall be no increase of military forces, supplies, equipment, and facilities by either side after the signing of the armistice.
4. The Military Armistice Commission, in carrying out its supervisory functions, shall have free access to all parts of Korea, for itself and for the joint observation teams responsible to the Armistice Commission.
5. There shall be general withdrawal of forces of each side, Air, Ground, and Naval, Regular and Irregular, from the territory controlled by the other side.
6. There shall be no armed forces in the Demilitarized Zone except as specifically and mutually agreed by both sides.
7. The Military Commanders shall administer their portion of the Demilitarized Zone in accord with the terms of the military armistice agreement.

55. EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS OF WAR: Proposal by the United Nations Command, January 2, 1952¹

The UNC [United Nations Command] proposal is as follows:

1. POWs [Prisoners of War] who elect repatriation shall be exchanged on a one-for-one basis until one side has exchanged all such POWs held by it.
2. The side which thereafter holds POWs shall repatriate all those POWs who elect to be repatriated in a one-for-one exchange for foreign civilians interned by the other side, and for civilians and other persons of the one side who are at the time of the signing of the armistice in the territory under control of the other side, and who elect to be repatriated. POWs thus exchanged shall be paroled to the opposing force, such parole to carry with it the condition that the individual shall not again bear arms against the side releasing him.
3. All POWs not electing repatriation shall be released from POW status and shall be paroled, such parole to carry with it the condition that the individual will not again bear arms in the Korean conflict.
4. All remaining civilians of either side who are, at the time of the signing of the armistice, in territory under control of the other side, shall be repatriated if they so elect.

¹ Department of State Bulletin, Jan. 21, 1952, pp. 105-106. For the text of a Soviet counter-proposal introduced in Committee I of the U.N. General Assembly on Jan. 3, 1952, and comments thereon by the Secretary of State, see ibid., Jan. 14, 1952, pp. 46-47.

5. In order to insure that the choice regarding repatriation is made without duress, delegates of the ICRC¹ shall be permitted to interview all POWs at the points of exchange, and all civilians of either side who are at the time of the signing of the armistice in territory under the control of the other side.

6. For the purposes of paragraphs 2, 4 and 5, civilians and other persons of either side are defined as those who on 25 June 1950 were bona-fide residents of either ROK² or the DPRK.³

In summary, the UNC proposal provides for the release of all POWs, including soldiers of the other side who may have been incorporated into the army of the detaining power. Thus, it is consistent with the first principle advanced by your side that all POWs be released. As regards repatriation, it permits freedom of choice on the part of the individual, thus insuring that there will be no forced repatriation against the will of an individual. It provides repatriation not for POWs alone but for those other victims of war, the displaced civilians. All those who desire it are permitted to return to their former homes. Finally the proposal provides for a supervisory organ to interview the persons involved to insure that, whatever their choice, such choice will be made freely and without duress.

In advocating your proposal of an all-for-all exchange of prisoners of war your side has many times asked the question, "What could be fairer than the release and repatriation of all prisoners of war following the armistice?" Today, in the proposal, the UNC gives you the answer to that question. The release of all persons who are or should be classified as prisoners of war, and the repatriation of those who desire to be repatriated, is fairer than the release and forced repatriation of all prisoners of war. Moreover, it is fairer to permit displaced civilians who so desire to return to their former homes, under the Armistice Agreement, than to neglect their interests in that agreement.

We ask your earnest consideration and early acceptance of this proposal.

56. CONVENING OF A SPECIAL SESSION OF THE UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY UPON CONCLUSION OF AN ARMISTICE AGREEMENT: Resolution 507 (VI) of the United Nations General Assembly, February 5, 1952⁴

The General Assembly,

Desiring to facilitate to the greatest possible extent the negotiations in Panmunjom and the conclusion of an armistice in Korea, and

Wishing to avoid premature consideration of items 17 and 27 of the agenda of the present session,⁵

² Republic of Korea.

³ Democratic People's Republic of Korea (North Korea).

⁴ U.N. General Assembly, Official Records, Sixth Session, Supplement No. 20 (A/2119), p. 7.

⁵ Item 17 concerned the problem of the independence of Korea; item 27, the relief and rehabilitation of Korea.

I

Decides that:

(a) Upon notification by the Unified Command to the Security Council of the conclusion of an armistice in Korea, the Secretary-General shall convene a special session of the General Assembly at the Headquarters of the United Nations to consider the above-mentioned items; or

(b) When other developments in Korea make desirable consideration of the above-mentioned items, the Secretary-General, acting in accordance with Article 20 of the Charter and with the rules of procedure of the General Assembly,¹ shall convene a special session or an emergency special session of the General Assembly at the Headquarters of the United Nations;

Requests the Negotiating Committee for Extra-Budgetary Funds established by General Assembly resolution 571 B (VI) of 7 December 1951² to undertake negotiations regarding voluntary contributions to the programme of the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency for the relief and rehabilitation of Korea.

57. THREE-POINT PROPOSAL FOR AN ARMISTICE SUBMITTED BY THE UNITED NATIONS COMMAND: Statement by the President, May 7, 1952³

The United States fully approves and supports without qualification the proposal for reaching an armistice which General Ridgway has offered to the Communist aggressors in Korea.⁴

Last July the United Nations forces had repulsed Communist aggression in Korea, had proved to the Communists that aggression cannot pay, and had brought new hope for peace to free men around the world. The Soviet Union then indicated that Korean hostilities could be terminated by a military armistice. The United Nations Command in good faith and in a sincere desire to find a basis for a peaceful settlement began armistice talks with the Communists in Korea.

After many trying months of negotiation, in which each issue has been dealt with individually, tentative agreement has been reached

³ Department of State Bulletin, May 19, 1952, pp. 787-788.

⁴ The proposal was made to the Communists at Panmunjom by the U.N. Command Delegation on Apr. 28, 1952, in an executive session. Following the Communist rejection of the proposal, the executive sessions were terminated, and General Ridgway released the substance of the proposal to the press (see ibid., pp. 786-787).

on all but three issues. It is now apparent that the three remaining issues cannot be resolved separately. The United Nations Command proposal offers a just and a real opportunity to resolve these three issues together and simultaneously. The three-point proposal is:

1. That there shall not be a forced repatriation of prisoners of war—as the Communists have insisted. To agree to forced repatriation would be unthinkable. It would be repugnant to the fundamental moral and humanitarian principles which underlie our action in Korea. To return these prisoners of war in our hands by force would result in misery and bloodshed to the eternal dishonor of the United States and of the United Nations.

We will not buy an armistice by turning over human beings for slaughter or slavery.

The United Nations Command has observed the most extreme care in separating those prisoners who have said they would forcibly oppose return to Communist control. We have offered to submit to an impartial re-screening—after an armistice—of those persons we would hold in our custody.

Nothing could be fairer. For the Communists to insist upon the forcible return to them of persons who wish to remain out of their control is an amazing disclosure before the whole world of the operation of their system.

2. That the United Nations Command will not insist on prohibiting reconstruction or rehabilitation of airfields.

3. That the neutral nations supervisory commission should comprise representatives of four countries; Poland and Czechoslovakia chosen by the Communists, Sweden and Switzerland chosen by the United Nations Command.

The three parts of General Ridgway's proposal are all parts of a whole. They must be considered as an entity—not piecemeal. Our agreement is contingent upon acceptance of the whole proposal. This is our position. The Communists thus far have indicated only a willingness to withdraw their proposal that the U.S.S.R. be a member of the neutral inspection commission. This spurious issue was raised by them late in negotiations and its withdrawal is no real concession on their part.

The patience and understanding shown by General Ridgway and the United Nations Command negotiators merit the highest praise. In spite of almost overwhelming provocation, they have made real progress in reaching agreement on many substantial terms for an armistice. General Ridgway's proposal offers a sound and sensible way to settle the remaining issues all at once. It will have compelling appeal to those sincerely desiring peace.

58. PROGRESS OF THE ARMISTICE NEGOTIATIONS: Forty-Second Report of the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, to the United Nations Security Council, June 13, 1952 (Excerpt) ¹

Substantive progress was made on agenda item 3, concrete arrangements, through the persistent efforts of United Nations Command staff officers.

The subject of ports of entry was finally resolved when the United Nations Command reduced its requirement for these complexes from six to five and the Communists agreed to the following United Nations Command provisions:

A. A port of entry shall include the railheads, airheads and seaport facilities associated with and supporting a city, and

B. Rotation and replenishment shall be conducted only in the mutually agreed ports of entry.

Detailed maps of the ports of entry were prepared by each side and were exchanged. The following specific ports of entry have been prepared:

A. By the Communists: Sinuiju, Chongjin, Manpojin, Hungnam and Sinanju.

B. By the United Nations Command: Pusan, Inchon, Kangnung, Kunsan and Taegu.

Slight progress was made on the subject of the neutral nations inspection teams when the Communists agreed, on the staff officers level, that these teams will not be authorized to inspect or examine secret designs or characteristics of combat aircraft, armored vehicles, weapons or ammunition.

The United Nations Command Representatives have brought up repeatedly the problem of neutral nations and the previously agreed to principle which stated that the neutral nations would be selected on the basis of being mutually acceptable to both sides, reiterating their stand that the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics is not acceptable to the United Nations Command as a neutral nation. In each instance the Communist side answered with vague generalities.

There are only two important issues remaining to be settled under agenda item 3. United Nations Command reports numbers thirty-seven, thirty-eight and forty ² have explained the United Nations Command position on these issues, which are:

A. Agreement to limit airfield construction and rehabilitation

B. Agreement on the composition of the neutral nation inspection teams

59. REQUEST FOR SOVIET GOOD OFFICES IN OBTAINING NORTH KOREAN AND CHINESE COMMUNIST COMPLIANCE WITH THE 1949 GENEVA CONVENTION ON TREATMENT OF PRISONERS OF WAR: Note Delivered by the American Ambassador at Moscow¹ to the Soviet Foreign Minister,² July 23, 1952³

Early in the course of the Korean hostilities, on July 13, 1950, the North Korean authorities issued a declaration stating that they would strictly abide by the principles of the Geneva Convention in respect to prisoners of war.⁴ On July 16, 1952, the Chinese Communist authorities issued a declaration of intention to adhere, with certain reservations, to the Geneva Convention of August 12, 1949, for the protection of prisoners of war.

Up to the present time, the Chinese Communist and North Korean authorities have failed to observe the provisions of the Geneva Convention. More specifically, the following provisions which are of particular importance to the welfare of the personnel of the United Nations Command who are prisoners in North Korean and Chinese Communist hands have not been observed: inspection of prisoner of war camps by an impartial international body has not been permitted (Article 126); relief parcels have not been delivered (Article 72); and prisoner of war camps have been placed in areas in proximity to military objectives, exposing the prisoners to danger of attack (Article 23).

The United Nations Command has consistently abided by the provisions of the Geneva Convention and has in good faith carried out the responsibilities laid upon belligerents by this convention.

It is, therefore, requested that in the interest of the accomplishment of the humanitarian objectives of the Geneva Convention, the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics use its good offices with the North Korean and Chinese Communist authorities, for the purpose of requesting them to observe the provisions of the Geneva Convention.

60. PROPOSAL FOR A SOLUTION OF THE PRISONER OF WAR PROBLEM: Statement by the Chief United Nations Command Negotiator⁶ at Panmunjom, September 28, 1952⁶

I have an important statement to make. For many weeks the prisoner of war issue has blocked the achievement of an armistice in Korea. On July 1 we suggested to you that a solution to the problem must be one that to a reasonable degree meets the requirements of both sides. You have admitted the soundness of that proposition.

It must now be clear to you that one of the requirements of our side which cannot be compromised is that of no forced repatriation.

Within this humanitarian principle the United Nations Command has made honest efforts to achieve an armistice. So that there can be no doubt of the objectivity and sincerity with which the United Nations Command delegation has attempted to find a solution to the prisoner of war question, I will restate the proposals which we have previously offered and which you have summarily rejected.

We have previously proposed that joint teams or Red Cross teams, with or without military observers of both sides, be admitted to the prisoner of war camps of both sides to verify the fact that non-repatriates would forcibly resist return to the side from which they came. As an alternative we proposed that all prisoners of war of both sides be delivered in groups of appropriate size to the demilitarized zone and given the opportunity to express their preference on repatriation, the interview to be done by one or a combination of the following:

- A. International Committee of the Red Cross
- B. Teams from impartial nations
- C. Joint teams of military observers
- D. Red Cross representatives from each side

Either one of these proposals, if accepted by your side, would have allayed any legitimate fear you might have had that the prisoners of war were being coerced into rejecting repatriation to your side and would have produced an armistice.

I now present to you three additional alternate proposals any one of which will lead to an armistice if you truly desire one.

I ask that you give careful consideration to them because they represent the only remaining avenues of approach on which our side can agree to an armistice. All of these proposals are based on the prior formal acceptance of an armistice by both sides, with the disposition of prisoners of war to be determined thereafter according to one of the following procedures.

A. Proposal Number One:

As soon as the armistice agreement goes into effect all prisoners of war in the custody of each side shall be entitled to release and repatriation. Such release and repatriation of prisoners of war shall begin in accordance with the provisions of article three of the armistice agreement. Both sides agree that the obligation to exchange and repatriate prisoners of war shall be fulfilled by having them brought to an agreed exchange point in the demilitarized zone. The prisoner of war shall be identified and his name checked against the agreed list of prisoners of war in the presence, if desired, of one or a combination of the International Committee of the Red Cross, joint Red Cross teams, or joint military teams. The prisoner of war shall thereupon be considered as fully repatriated for the purposes of the agreement. Both sides agree, however, that any prisoner of war who at time of identification states that he wishes to return to the side by which he had been detained shall immediately be allowed to do so.

Such former prisoner of war shall thereupon go into the custody of the side to which he wishes to go, which side shall provide him with transportation from the demilitarized zone to territory under its control in Korea. Such individual, of course, shall not be detained as a prisoner of war but shall assume civilian status, and, in accordance with paragraph 52 of the armistice agreement, shall not again be employed in acts of war in the Korean conflict.

B. Proposal Number Two:

As soon as the armistice agreement goes into effect all prisoners of war who desire repatriation will be exchanged expeditiously. All prisoners objecting to repatriation will be delivered to the demilitarized zone in small groups where, at a mutually agreeable location, they will be freed from military control of both sides and interviewed by representatives of a mutually agreed country or countries whose forces are not participating in the Korean hostilities, such persons being free to go to the side of their choice as indicated by such interview. The foregoing procedure will be accomplished, if desired, with or without military representation from each side and under the observation of one or a combination of the following:

1. International Committee of the Red Cross
2. Joint Red Cross teams
3. Joint military teams

C. Proposal Number Three:

As soon as the armistice is signed and becomes effective, all prisoners of war who desire repatriation will be exchanged expeditiously. Concurrently, if logistical capability permits, or as soon as possible thereafter, those prisoners of war who have previously expressed their objections to repatriation will be delivered in groups of appropriate size to a mutually agreed upon location in the demilitarized zone and there freed from the military control of both sides. Without questioning, interview, or screening, each individual so released will be free to go to the side of his choice. We will agree, if desired, to have this movement and disposition of non-repatriates accomplished under the observation of one or a combination of the International Committee of the Red Cross, joint teams of military observers, or Red Cross representatives from both sides.

We have now offered you the widest selection of choices the United Nations Command can offer. Each of them will produce an armistice. I urge that you give mature and careful consideration to our proposals.

For that purpose I propose a recess for 10 days, and that we meet again here at 1100 hours on 8 October.

Our staff officers will be available at any time to answer questions on any of our proposals.

61. SUSPENSION OF THE ARMISTICE NEGOTIATIONS:

Statement by the Secretary of State, October 8, 1952¹

As was made clear by General Clark's statement,² the armistice negotiations at Panmunjom are not terminated. After the Communists rejected all of the latest proposals made by the U.N. Command delegation, General Harrison³ called a recess. The duration of the recess is entirely up to the Communists. General Harrison made it clear that the U.N. Command delegation continues ready to negotiate and will again meet with the Communist delegation whenever they are ready to accept any one of our numerous proposals or make a constructive proposal of their own for an honest settlement of the prisoner-of-war question. However, the U.N. Command delegation will not continue to go to Panmunjom merely to be subjected to Communist abuse and propaganda harangues.

For many months we have been attempting to negotiate an honorable armistice with patience and sincerity. The three alternative proposals which General Harrison presented on September 28¹ represented a further earnest effort by the United Nations to find an acceptable solution to the prisoner-of-war question. All three of those proposals preserve the humanitarian principles of nonforcible repatriation. Any one of these proposals could lead to an armistice.

The Communists have claimed that the U.N. Command has forced prisoners to say they would resist repatriation, although, in fact, the opposite was the case. The U.N. Command pointed out to each prisoner the possibilities that his family might be persecuted if he refused repatriation and that the U.N. Command could make no promise whatever as to the ultimate fate of those who refused to go home. General Harrison's proposals even included the device that the prisoners should be taken in small groups to a neutral area and there be released to walk north or south. Certainly, nothing could be more fair or reasonable. If the Communists want to settle this issue, our latest proposals point the way.

We have submitted numerous proposals throughout the negotiations and have thoroughly explored every possible solution, while the Communist negotiators have utilized the negotiating table as a sounding board for false and vicious propaganda. We have tried everything we can think of to meet the considerations raised by the Communists.

We have said and will continue to say that we shall not compromise on the principle that a prisoner should not be forced to return against his will. For us to weaken in our resolve would constitute an abandonment of the principles fundamental to this country and the United Nations. We shall not trade in the lives of men. We shall not forcibly deliver human beings into Communist hands.

General Harrison's action last night does not represent a loss of hope in an armistice; we believe that it is an affirmative step toward obtaining an armistice. The Communists must now recognize that the position of the U.N. Command is firm as well as right. The Communists must now recognize that they cannot continue to toy with the hopes of the world for a Korean peace. We continue to believe that a humanitarian solution to the prisoner-of-war question can be found, and that this can be done at Panmunjom.

As General Clark said this morning, we remain ready at any time to conclude an armistice acceptable to the conscience of free peoples. It is up to the Communists to show whether they too want such an armistice.

62. PROPOSALS FOR A SOLUTION OF THE PRISONER OF WAR PROBLEM: Resolution 610 (VII) of the United Nations General Assembly, December 3, 1952¹

The General Assembly,

Having received the special report of the United Nations Command of 18 October 1952 on "the present status of the military action and the armistice negotiations in Korea"² and other relevant reports relating to Korea,

Noting with approval the considerable progress towards an armistice made by negotiation at Panmunjom and the tentative agreements to end the fighting in Korea and to reach a settlement of the Korean question,

Noting further that disagreement between the parties on one remaining issue, alone, prevents the conclusion of an armistice and that a considerable measure of agreement already exists on the principles on which this remaining issue can be resolved,

Mindful of the continuing and vast loss of life, devastation and suffering resulting from and accompanying the continuance of the fighting,

Deeply conscious of the need to bring hostilities to a speedy end and of the need for a peaceful settlement of the Korean question,

Anxious to expedite and facilitate the convening of the political conference as provided in article [paragraph] 60 of the draft armistice agreement,³

1. Affirms that the release and repatriation of prisoners of war shall be effected in accordance with the Geneva Convention relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, dated 12 August 1949, the well-established principles and practice of international law and the relevant provisions of the draft armistice agreement;

2. Affirms that force shall not be used against prisoners of war to prevent or effect their return to their homelands, and that they shall at all time be treated humanely in accordance with the specific provisions of the Geneva Convention and with the general spirit of the Convention;

3. Accordingly requests the President of the General Assembly to communicate the following proposals to the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China and to the North Korean authorities as forming a just and reasonable basis for an agreement so that an immediate cease-fire would result and be effected; to invite their acceptance of these proposals⁴ and to make a report to the

General Assembly during its present session and as soon as appropriate:

PROPOSALS

I. In order to facilitate the return to their homelands of all prisoners of war, there shall be established a Repatriation Commission consisting of representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland, Sweden and Switzerland, that is, the four States agreed to for the constitution of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission and referred to in paragraph 37 of the draft armistice agreement, or constituted, alternatively, of representatives of four States not participating in hostilities, two nominated by each side, but excluding representatives of States that are permanent members of the Security Council.

II. The release and repatriation of prisoners of war shall be effected in accordance with the Geneva Convention relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, dated 12 August 1949, the well-established principles and practice of International Law and the relevant provisions of the draft armistice agreement.

III. Force shall not be used against the prisoners of war to prevent or effect their return to their homelands and no violence to their persons or affront to their dignity or self-respect shall be permitted in any manner or for any purpose whatsoever. This duty is enjoined on and entrusted to the Repatriation Commission and each of its members. Prisoners of war shall at all times be treated humanely in accordance with the specific provisions of the Geneva Convention and with the general spirit of that Convention.

IV. All prisoners of war shall be released to the Repatriation Commission from military control and from the custody of the detaining side in agreed numbers and at agreed exchange points in agreed demilitarized zones.

V. Classification of prisoners of war according to nationality and domicile as proposed in the letter of 16 October 1952 from General Kim Il Sung, Supreme Commander of the Korean People's Army, and General Peng Teh-huai, Commander of the Chinese People's Volunteers, to General Mark W. Clark, Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command¹ shall then be carried out immediately.

VI. After classification, prisoners of war shall be free to return to their homelands forthwith, and their speedy return shall be facilitated by all parties concerned.

VII. In accordance with arrangements prescribed for the purpose by the Repatriation Commission, each party to the conflict shall have freedom and facilities to explain to the prisoners of war "depending upon them" their rights and to inform the prisoners of war on any matter relating to their return to their homelands and particularly their full freedom to return.

VIII. Red Cross teams of both sides shall assist the Repatriation Commission in its work and shall have access, in accordance with the terms of the draft armistice agreement, to prisoners of war while they are under the temporary jurisdiction of the Repatriation Commission.

IX. Prisoners of war shall have freedom and facilities to make representations and communications to the Repatriation Commission and to bodies and agencies working under the Repatriation Commission, and to inform any or all such bodies of their desires on any matter concerning themselves, in accordance with arrangements made for the purpose by the Commission.

X. Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph III above, nothing in this Repatriation Agreement shall be construed as derogating from the authority of the Repatriation Commission (or its authorized representatives) to exercise its legitimate functions and responsibilities for the control of the prisoners under its temporary jurisdiction.

XI. The terms of this Repatriation Agreement and the arrangements arising therefrom shall be made known to all prisoners of war.

XII. The Repatriation Commission is entitled to call upon parties to the conflict, its own member governments, or the Member States of the United Nations for such legitimate assistance as it may require in the carrying out of its duties and tasks and in accordance with the decisions of the Commission in this respect.

XIII. When the two sides have made an agreement for repatriation based on these proposals, the interpretation of that agreement shall rest with the Repatriation Commission. In the event of disagreement in the Commission, majority decisions shall prevail. When no majority decision is possible, an umpire agreed upon in accordance with the succeeding paragraph and with article 132 of the Geneva Convention of 1949 shall have the deciding vote.

XIV. The Repatriation Commission shall at its first meeting and prior to an armistice proceed to agree upon and appoint the umpire who shall at all times be available to the Commission and shall act as its Chairman unless otherwise agreed. If agreement on the appointment of the umpire cannot be reached by the Commission within the period of three weeks after the date of the first meeting this matter should be referred to the General Assembly.

XV. The Repatriation Commission shall also arrange after the armistice for officials to function as umpires with inspecting teams or other bodies to which functions are delegated or assigned by the Commission or under the provisions of the draft armistice agreement, so that the completion of the return of prisoners of war to their homelands shall be expedited.

XVI. When the Repatriation Agreement is acceded to by the parties concerned and when an umpire has been appointed under paragraph 14 above, the draft armistice agreement, unless otherwise altered by agreement between the parties, shall be deemed to have been accepted by them. The provisions of the draft armistice agreement shall apply except in so far as they are modified by the Repatriation Agreement. Arrangements for repatriation under this agreement will begin when the armistice agreement is thus concluded.

XVII. At the end of ninety days, after the Armistice Agreement has been signed, the disposition of any prisoners of war whose return to their homelands may not have been effected in accordance with the procedure set out in these proposals or as otherwise agreed, shall be referred with recommendations for their disposition, including a target date for the termination of their detention to the political conference to be called as provided under article [paragraph] 60 of the draft armistice agreement. If at the end of a further thirty days there are any prisoners of war whose return to their homelands has not been effected under the above procedures or whose future has not been provided for by the political conference, the responsibility for their care and maintenance and for their subsequent disposition shall be transferred to the United Nations, which in all matters relating to them shall act strictly in accordance with international law.

63. PROPOSAL FOR THE EXCHANGE OF SICK AND WOUNDED PRISONERS OF WAR: Letter From the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command,¹ to the Commanders-in-Chief of the North Korean and Chinese Communist Forces,² February 22, 1953³

To Kim Il Sung, Supreme Commander of the Korean People's Army, and Peng Teh-Huai, Commander of the Chinese People's Volunteers:

The Executive Committee of the League of Red Cross Societies, in a resolution adopted in Geneva, Switzerland, on 13 December 1952 called on both sides in the Korean conflict as a gesture of good will to take immediate action in implementing the humanitarian provisions of the Geneva Convention by repatriating sick and wounded prisoners of war in accordance with appropriate articles of the Geneva Convention.

As has been repeatedly stated to you in the course of negotiations at Panmunjom the United Nations Command has from the very beginning adhered scrupulously to the humanitarian provisions of the Geneva Convention and in particular has been prepared to carry out the provisions of the Geneva Convention in regard to the sick and wounded prisoners in its custody. The United Nations Command remains ready immediately to repatriate those seriously sick and seriously wounded captured personnel who are fit to travel in accordance with provisions of Article 109 of the Geneva Convention.⁴

I wish to be informed whether you are prepared for your part to proceed immediately with the repatriation of seriously sick and wounded captured personnel of the United Nations Command who are in your hands. The United Nations Command liaison officers will be prepared to meet your liaison officers to make necessary arrangements for impartial verification of the conditions and for the mutual exchange of such seriously sick and wounded in accordance with the provisions of Article 109 of the Geneva Convention.¹

64. REQUEST FOR COMMUNIST COMMAND STATEMENT ON REPATRIATION OF PRISONERS OF WAR: Letter From the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, to the Commanders-in-Chief of the North Korean and Chinese Communist Forces, April 5, 1953 (Excerpt)²

At as early a date as possible, I request that your liaison group furnish our liaison group with a detailed statement of suggestions on the implementation of the proposal for settling the entire question of repatriating prisoners of war as set forth in the statement of Foreign Minister Chou En-lai,³ and endorsed by Marshal Kim Ki [II] Sung, in order that it may be studied while reasonable settlement of the repatriation of sick and wounded is being effected.

65. REPATRIATION OF SICK AND INJURED CAPTURED PERSONNEL: Agreement Between the United Nations Command and the North Korean and Chinese Communist Commands, April 11, 1953⁴

AGREEMENT FOR THE REPATRIATION OF SICK AND INJURED CAPTURED PERSONNEL

The Senior Member of the United Nations Command Liaison Group and the Senior Member of the Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers Liaison Group, in order to effect the repatriation of sick and injured captured personnel in accordance with the provisions of Article 109 of the 1949 Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War,⁵ agree to the following:

1. Repatriation shall be accomplished at Panmunjom.
2. Repatriation shall commence at Panmunjom not later than ten (10) days after the signing of this agreement.

3. a. The Korean Peoples Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers shall deliver sick and injured captured personnel at the rate of approximately one hundred (100) per day until delivery of all sick and injured captured personnel to be repatriated by the Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers is completed. The number of persons actually delivered each day shall be contingent upon the ability of the United Nations Command to receive them, but delivery shall in any case be completed prior to the termination date of this agreement.

3. b. The United Nations Command shall deliver sick and injured captured personnel at the rate of approximately five hundred (500) per day until delivery of all sick and injured captured personnel to be repatriated by the United Nations Command is completed. The number of persons actually delivered each day shall be contingent upon the ability of the Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers to receive them, but delivery shall in any case be completed prior to the termination date of this agreement.

4. The United Nations Command shall deliver sick and injured captured personnel in groups of approximately twenty-five (25); the Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers shall deliver sick and injured captured personnel in groups of approximately twenty-five (25). Each group shall be accompanied by rosters, prepared by nationality, to include:

- a. Name.
- b. Rank.
- c. Internment or military serial number.

5. After each group of sick and injured captured personnel is delivered and received, a representative of the receiving side shall sign the roster of the captured personnel delivered as a receipt and shall return this to the delivering side.

6. In order to insure that the sick and injured captured personnel of both sides are given maximum protection during the full period of repatriation, both sides agree to guarantee immunity from all attacks to all rail and motor movements carrying sick and injured captured personnel to Kaesong and Muusan-ni, respectively, and thence through presently established immunity routes to Panmunjom, subject to the following conditions:

a. Movement of motor convoys to Kaesong and Munsan-ni, respectively shall be restricted to daylight hours, and each convoy shall consist of not less than five (5) vehicles in close formation; except that north of Panmunjom, because of actual conditions, the latter provision shall apply only to the route from Pyongyang to Kaesong.

b. Each car in rail movements and each vehicle in motor convoys shall display clearly visible identification markings.

c. Each side, prior to the initial movement, shall provide the Liaison Group of the other side with a detailed description of the markings utilized to identify motor convoys and rail movements. This shall include color, size and manner in which the markings will be displayed.

d. Each side, prior to the initial movement, shall provide the Liaison Group of the other side with the sites and markings of the bivouac areas and night stop-over locations for motor convoys.

e. Each side shall inform the Liaison Group of the other side, twenty-four (24) hours in advance of each movement, of the selected route, number of cars in rail movement or number of vehicles in motor movement, and the estimated time of arrival at Kaesong or Muksan-ni.

f. Each side shall notify the Liaison Group of the other side, by the most expeditious means of communications available, of the location of emergency stop-overs.

7. During the period while sick and injured captured personnel are being repatriated through the Panmunjom conference site area, the October 22, 1951 Agreement Between Liaison Officers,¹ with the exception of the part therein provided for in Paragraph 8 of this Agreement, shall continue in effect. Liaison Groups of both sides and their parties shall have free access to, and free movement within, the Panmunjom conference site area. The composition of each Liaison Group and its party shall be as determined by the Senior Member thereof; however, in order to avoid congestion in the conference site area, the number of personnel of each side in the area, including captured personnel under its control, shall not exceed three hundred (300) persons at any one time. Each side shall transfer repatriated personnel out of the Panmunjom conference site area as expeditiously as possible.

8. During the period while sick and injured captured personnel are being repatriated through the Panmunjom conference site area, the armed military police of each side, who undertake to maintain order within the conference site area, shall be increased from the maximum number of fifteen (15), as provided for in the October 22, 1951 Agreement Between Liaison Officers, to thirty (30).

9. Other administrative details shall be mutually arranged by officers designated by the Senior Member of the Liaison Group of each side.

10. This agreement is effective when signed and will terminate twenty (20) days after the commencement of repatriation of sick and injured captured personnel at Panmunjom.

66. ESCAPE OF NORTH KOREAN NON-REPATRIATE PRISONERS OF WAR: Letter From the Senior Delegate of the United Nations Command at the Armistice Discussions to the Senior Delegate of the Communist Command, June 18, 1953²

Gen. NAM IL,

Senior Delegate, Delegation of the Korean People's Army, and the Chinese People's Volunteers:

Between midnight and dawn today, approximately 25,000 North Korean prisoners of war, who have refused to be repatriated following an armistice, broke out of United Nations Command prisoner of war camps Nos. 5, 6, 7 and 9.

Statements attributed to high officials of the Republic of Korea indicate that the action had been secretly planned and carefully coordinated at top levels in the Korean Government and that outside assistance was furnished the prisoners of war in their mass breakout. Republic of Korea Army security units assigned as guards at the prisoner of war camps did little to prevent the breakout, and there is every evidence of actual collusion between the Republic of Korea Army guards and the prisoners.

The Republic of Korea Army security guard units used at the camps containing anti-Communist prisoners of war had been considered especially suitable in view of the previous cooperative attitude of these prisoners while in custody.

These Republic of Korea Army security guard units which have left their posts at nonrepatriate camps are being replaced by United States troops.

Efforts are being made to recover the prisoners now at liberty and

67. ESCAPE OF NORTH KOREAN NON-REPATRIATE PRISONERS OF WAR: Letter From the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, to the President of the Republic of Korea, June 20, 1953²

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In the summer of 1950, when the United States and other nations responded to your appeal to the United Nations to repel the armed attack upon the Republic of Korea by forces from North Korea, the United Nations received from you a message assigning command authority over all land, sea and air forces of the Republic of Korea to the commander, United Nations Command, for the duration of hostilities.³

The United Nations Command did not seek, and indeed, did not consider necessary any further or more formal commitments from your Government regarding the participation of Republic of Korea armed forces in the United Nations Command. I therefore have considered and do now consider that I have full command authority over all land, sea and air forces of the Republic of Korea. Nothing in our long association during our mutual prosecution of our common cause has prepared me to believe that I should consider otherwise.

This notwithstanding, and in clear violation of my authority, certain officers and men of the Republic of Korea Army willfully permitted the escape of many thousands of lawfully detained prisoners of war from various prisoner of war installations during the early morning hours of 18 June 1953, such officers and men having been officially enjoined with responsibility for the security of said installations and for the detention of said prisoners. Further, I have received information through the public press that this action was initiated on your orders and issued through an official who is not within the forces under my command.

I must inform you with all the sincerity which I possess that I am profoundly shocked by this unilateral abrogation of your personal commitment, which was so freely and voluntarily given at the time.

As a matter of fact on several occasions in recent weeks you have personally assured both Ambassador Briggs¹ and me that you would not take unilateral action with reference to R. O. K. forces under my control until after full and frank discussion with me.

Your actions today have clearly abrogated these assurances.

I cannot at this time estimate the ultimate consequences of this precipitous and shocking action on your part, nor can its effect on the common cause for which we have sacrificed so much during these past several years be forecast at this time.

Sincerely,

MARK W. CLARK,
General, U.S. Army

68. ESCAPE OF NORTH KOREAN NON-REPATRIATE PRISONERS OF WAR: Letter From the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, to the Commanders-in-Chief of the North Korean and Chinese Communist Forces,² June 29, 1953³

The United Nations Command agrees, of course, that the escape of about 25,000 captured personnel of the Korean People's Army is a serious incident and unfortunately has not been conducive to the early armistice for which both sides have been earnestly striving. The United Nations Command, by means of General Harrison's letter of 18 June 1953, immediately informed you of the facts regarding the loss of these prisoners.⁴

We felt that you deserved to have this information at the earliest possible time. However, in your letter of 19 June⁵ I note that for one reason or another you fail to accept the realities of the situation which we accurately reported to you, and you have made several inaccurate statements of fact. In an earnest endeavor to achieve an early armistice, I shall further clarify these facts.

Despite our voluntary and accurate presentation of these facts you still seem to consider that the "escape" of the prisoners and their "release" by order of the Republic of Korea Government are contradictory terms. The fact is, as you are well aware by this time, that the prisoners "escaped" by breaking through the prison fences and barricades and, except for those who were captured, disappeared into the civil population. They were "released" in that the Republic of Korea Government, without the knowledge of, and contrary to the intent of, the United Nations Command, planned and arranged the breakout, and the Republic of Korea Army security guards made little real effort to prevent the escape.

In replying to the questions which you asked in your letter, I believe that you realize the armistice which both of us seek is a military armistice between the military commanders of both sides. The United Nations Command is a military command and, contrary to the opinion indicated in your letter of 19 June, does not exercise authority over the Republic of Korea, which is an independent sovereign state whose government is the product of the self-determination of its millions of people. The Republic of Korea Army was placed by its Government under the control of the United Nations Command in order to more effectively repel the armed aggression against the Republic of Korea. I believe it should be clear to you that the United Nations Command, as the result of a commitment made by the Republic of Korea, does not command the Republic of Korea Army. In this incident that Government violated its commitment, issuing orders which were unknown to me, through other than recognized military channels to certain Korean Army units, which permitted the prisoners of war to escape.

You also asked whether the armistice in Korea included the Republic of Korea as represented by President Syngman Rhee; another question, which is closely related, expressed your interest in knowing what assurances there may be for the implementation of the armistice agreement on the part of South Korea. It is necessary here to reiterate that the armistice which we seek is a military armistice between the commanders of both sides and involving the forces available to the commanders of both sides.

It is recognized that certain provisions of the armistice agreement require the cooperation of the authorities of the Republic of Korea. You are assured that the United Nations Command and the interested governments concerned will make every effort to obtain the cooperation of the Government of the Republic of Korea. Where necessary the United Nations Command will, to the limits of its ability, establish military safeguards to insure that the armistice terms are observed.

Our willingness to do this should be apparent to you by the concurrence which we have given to those portions of the terms of reference which require the United Nations Command to take certain action to insure the safety and security of the neutral nations reparations commission and its personnel.

It is regrettable that you choose to allege that the United Nations Command connived in the escape of the prisoners. Besides being contrary to the obvious facts, such accusation tends to obstruct rather than to facilitate an armistice agreement. The United Nations Command is continuing its efforts to recover the prisoners of war who have escaped. It would be unrealistic, however, and misleading to imply that an appreciable number of these prisoners could be recovered now that they have disappeared among the population, which is disposed to shelter and protect them. You undoubtedly realize that the recovery of all these prisoners would be as impossible for us as it would be for your side to recover the 50,000 South Korean prisoners "released" by your side during the course of hostilities. You, of course, understand that the cessation of hostilities will facilitate the return of the escaped Korean prisoners of war to your side if they are not opposed to such return. Under the provisions of Paragraph 59 of the draft armistice agreement, the escaped prisoners of war can proceed to your side if they so desire after the armistice becomes effective.

Following the signing of an armistice, the exchange of those prisoners of war who desire repatriation will involve the 12,000 of our personnel reported by you in April 1952, plus the additional ones captured since that date and now in your hands, as compared with about 74,000 of your personnel, including approximately 69,000 Koreans, now in our hands, whom we are prepared to return to you.

This letter is an earnest effort by the United Nations Command to acquaint you with the facts. It is suggested that the delegations meet immediately to exchange information as to the time at which respective components of the neutral nations supervisory commission can be prepared to function in order that an effective date for the armistice may be established and, on receipt of that information, the armistice agreement as has been developed by our respective delegations be signed.

"We the United Nations Members whose military forces are participating in the Korean action support the decision of the Commander-in-Chief of the United Nations Command to conclude an armistice agreement. We hereby affirm our determination fully and faithfully to carry out the terms of that armistice. We expect that the other parties to the agreement will likewise scrupulously observe its terms.

"The task ahead is not an easy one. We will support the efforts of the United Nations to bring about an equitable settlement in Korea based on the principles which have long been established by the United Nations, and which call for a united, independent and democratic Korea. We will support the United Nations in its efforts to assist the people of Korea in repairing the ravages of war.

"We declare again our faith in the principles and purposes of the United Nations, our consciousness of our continuing responsibilities in Korea, and our determination in good faith to seek a settlement of the Korean problem. We affirm, in the interests of world peace, that if there is a renewal of the armed attack, challenging again the principles of the United Nations, we should again be united and prompt to resist. The consequences of such a breach of the armistice would be so grave that, in all probability, it would not be possible to confine hostilities within the frontiers of Korea.

"Finally, we are of the opinion that the armistice must not result in jeopardizing the restoration or the safeguarding of peace in any other part of Asia."

0. TRIBUTE TO UNITED NATIONS FORCES IN KOREA:
Resolution 712 (VII) of the United Nations General Assembly, August 28, 1953¹

The General Assembly

Recalling the resolutions of the Security Council of 25 June, 27 June and 7 July 1950 and the resolutions of the General Assembly of October 1950, 1 December 1950, 1 February 1951, 18 May 1951 and December 1952,²

Having received the report of the Unified Command dated 7 August 1953,³

Noting with profound satisfaction that fighting has now ceased in Korea on the basis of an honourable armistice,

1. Salutes the heroic soldiers of the Republic of Korea and of all those countries which sent armed forces to its assistance;
2. Pays tribute to all those who died in resisting aggression and thus in upholding the cause of freedom and peace;
3. Expresses its satisfaction that the first efforts pursuant to the call of the United Nations to repel armed aggression by collective military measures have been successful, and expresses its firm conviction that this proof of the effectiveness of collective security under the United Nations Charter will contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security.

 COMMAND AND SOVIET AIRCRAFT IN THE KOREAN CONFLICT, 1950-1953

1. SHOOTING DOWN OF SOVIET BOMBER: Message Delivered by the Deputy United States Representative at the United Nations⁴ to the U.N. Secretary-General, September 5, 1950⁵

On September 4, 1950, United Nations naval forces were operating off the west coast of Korea at approximately the 38th parallel on missions in pursuance of the resolution of the Security Council of June 27, 1950.⁶

At 13:29 o'clock, Korean time, a twin-engine bomber identified only by bearing a Red Star passed over a screening ship and continued toward the center of the United Nations formation in a hostile manner. The bomber opened fire upon a United Nations fighter patrol which returned its fire and shot it down.

A United Nations destroyer succeeded in picking up the body of one member of the bomber crew. Identification papers indicated that the body was that of Lt. Mishin Tennadii Vasilebiu, of the armed forces of the U.S.S.R., Serial No. 25054.

72. UNITED STATES REFUSAL TO ACCEPT SOVIET NOTE CONCERNING BOMBER: Statement by the American Ambassador at Moscow, September 6, 1950¹

The American Ambassador at Moscow, Admiral Alan G. Kirk, was called today to the Soviet Ministry of Foreign Affairs by Foreign Minister Vyshinsky, who read to him a note on the subject of the airplane incident which took place off Korea on September 4 and which was reported to the Security Council by the deputy representative of the United States, Ernest A. Gross, the following day.²

Admiral Kirk made the following statement in reply to Mr. Vyshinsky:

The information at my disposal indicates that the question to which you refer pertains to defensive action by United Nations Forces operating in the Korean area in accordance with resolutions of the United Nations Security Council and that it has, in fact, been brought to the attention of the Security Council for appropriate consideration. I am therefore not in a position to accept on behalf of the United States Government the communication of the Soviet Government on this subject. It would appear to be appropriate for any representations on this question to be presented to the United Nations Security Council.

Admiral Kirk did not accept the note for delivery to this Government.

73. SOVIET ATTACK AGAINST UNITED NATIONS AIRCRAFT: Communication Delivered by the United States Representative at the United Nations³ to the U.N. Secretary-General, November 24, 1951⁴

The United States representative to the United Nations presents his compliments to the Secretary-General of the United Nations and has the honor to report the following from the Unified Command under the United States for submission to the Security Council:

A United Nations plane, a two-motored P2V bomber operating under General Ridgway's command in connection with the U.N. operations in Korea failed to return from a weather reconnaissance over the Sea of Japan on November 6, 1951. An intensive search for survivors proved fruitless.

From the last reported position of this plane at 0850 (—9 time zone) on November 6, it is undoubtedly this plane that was the subject of a Soviet statement to the U.S. Chargé d'Affaires in Moscow on November 7¹ admitting that two Soviet fighter planes fired on a two-engine bomber at 1010 November 6 in the vicinity of Cape Ostrovnya.

The route this plane was following did not approach closer than 40 miles to U.S.S.R. territory, and the plane crew had been thoroughly briefed not to approach closer than 20 miles to U.S.S.R. territory under any circumstances.

It can only be concluded that an intentional or unplanned approach to the Russian coast was not made, and the plane was intercepted and attacked without warning while over international waters, and furthermore, while well outside of 20 miles from the Russian coastline.

74. SHOOTING DOWN OF SOVIET IL-12 BY UNITED NATIONS AIRCRAFT: Statement by the Department of State, August 1, 1953²

According to confirmed information received from United States military authorities, an aircraft of the IL-12 type was attacked and shot down by a United States Army Air Force fighter plane on a combat mission for the United Nations' Command over Korean territory at 12:25 p. m., local time, on July 27, 1953. The location of the United States plane at the time of the attack was 41 degrees 38 minutes north latitude and 126 degrees 55 minutes east longitude. This position is inside Korean territory approximately eight miles from the Yalu River.

The United States Government assumes that the foregoing incident is the one which is the subject of the Ministry's Note of July 31³ in which the Soviet Government falsely alleges that the attack took place over Chinese territory. Since facts available to United States military authorities and to the United Nations' Command have clearly established that the attack was carried out over Korean territory prior to the termination of hostilities there, the Embassy has been instructed to reject the Ministry's Note as being without foundation in fact.

The United States Government can only deplore the loss of life incurred in this incident. In view of the fact, however, that the incident occurred in the Korean Zone of hostilities, the responsibility therefore must rest with those Soviet authorities who flew the Soviet aircraft through Korean territory.

F. THE COMMUNIST "GERM WARFARE" CAMPAIGN, 1951-1953

75. REFUTATION OF COMMUNIST CHARGES OF GERM WARFARE: Statement by the Secretary of State, May 7, 1951¹

I have just been reading the alleged "confessions" of two American fliers who were shot down in Communist-held North Korea in January. I should like to talk about these so-called "confessions" for a minute because they are so revealing, though not in the sense that Communist propagandists intended.

A reading of these statements makes one fact crystal clear: while they may have been signed under duress by the American fliers, they were dictated by Communist propagandists. They contain all the Communist clichés so alien to American youths. We have no way of knowing, of course, whether the fliers signed the statements at all.

Both statements have picked up the standard Communist picture of the world as divided into two hostile "camps"—the so-called "peace-loving camp" of Communists and the "imperialistic" and "warmongering" camp of Wall Street.

For example, Lt. Kenneth Enoch is alleged to have stated: "I have seen the truth as printed by the democratic Chinese press, and all these truths and kind treatment show all the more clearly the lies and untruthful war propaganda of the Wall Street radio and press . . . I am beginning to see very clearly just who is the peace-lover and who is the warmonger responsible for this inhuman war, and I am determined to struggle for peace against Wall Street capitalism, to clear my conscience of past errors. I am filled with determination to join the peace-loving camp."

I submit that there are no two men in the whole U. S. Air Force who would of their own volition express themselves in such terms.

These statements are, of course, merely additional trumped-up "evidence" to support the utterly false Communist charges that we have waged bacteriological warfare in Korea. They are another example of the incredible lengths to which they will go to propagate the "big lie."

These charges have been flatly denied by American authorities, by the Secretary-General of the United Nations, and by authorities of other nations having forces in Korea. Moreover, the Communists, knowing their charges would not stand up under the scrutiny of competent, independent investigators, have refused the offer of the International Committee of the Red Cross to conduct an impartial investigation on both sides of the battleline in Korea. They have rejected an offer of the U. N.'s World Health Organization to provide technical assistance in Communist-held areas where we were accused of having caused epidemics.

Although not permitted to make an on-the-spot investigation, competent scientists in many parts of the world have examined the "evidence" submitted by the Communists and, as a result, have pronounced the charges an obvious and clumsy hoax.

All of this is generally understood, at least in parts of the world where people have access to facts. These Communist propaganda themes are part of the "hate America" line which is now being supplemented with a "hate Americans" line.

Sowing the seeds of hate among people may in the Communist view produce some short-range benefits, but I am convinced that as their cynicism is increasingly revealed, they will find that they were in fact sowing the wind.

76. REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF GERM WARFARE CHARGES BY THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE OF THE RED CROSS (ICRC): Telegram From the Secretary of State to the President of the ICRC,¹ March 11, 1952²

Despite categorical denials by the United States Government and the United Nations Command, Communists continue to charge that biological warfare by the United Nations Command has caused an epidemic in Communist-held areas of Korea.

I repeat that the United Nations Command has not engaged in any form of biological warfare.

In the interest of having the facts clearly established by a disinterested international body, the United States Government as the Unified Command would like to suggest that the International Committee of the Red Cross make arrangements to conduct an investigation to determine (1) the nature and extent of this epidemic and (2) the real cause of the epidemic.

To establish the facts beyond all doubt, such an investigation would have to be conducted on both sides of the battle line in Korea. Investigation in the Communist-held areas would reveal the nature and extent of this epidemic plus evidence of the real cause of the epidemic. Investigation behind the United Nations lines would provide additional evidence with regard to the falsity of the biological warfare charge. For example, International Committee of the Red Cross investigators would be given free access to all sources of possible information behind United Nations lines bearing upon the investigation.³

77. COMMUNIST REFUSAL TO PERMIT INVESTIGATION OF GERM WARFARE CHARGES BY THE ICRC: Statement by the Secretary of State, March 26, 1952¹

At his news conference on March 26, Secretary Acheson was asked for comment on the statement, highly publicized by the Communists, of a group of jurists who claim to have "substantiated" the waging by United Nations forces in Korea of germ warfare.

Secretary Acheson made the following extemporaneous reply:

As I understand it, this group of very eminent jurists to which you refer are a group of Communists and former Nazis who have turned Communist, who have gone from East Germany into this area. That would not seem to imply any special impartiality or disinterest in their approach to it.

We have stated often, I have stated, General Ridgway has stated that there is not the slightest truth whatever in these statements.

We have asked the International Red Cross to make an investigation.² We have offered all facilities to the Red Cross. The World Health Organization has proposed that it be used to make an investigation, also to attempt to deal with any epidemic if such an epidemic exists. We have supported that request. The Communists have never replied to either request.

It seems perfectly clear that the Communists are determined not to have any fair or impartial investigation made. They continue on the one hand to say there is no epidemic. On the other hand they say that we are engaged in these nefarious practices.

There is no truth in the statements. The fact that there is no truth is shown by the refusal of the Communists to permit any investigation by an impartial international body.

78. CALL FOR INVESTIGATION OF GERM WARFARE CHARGES BY THE ICRC: Draft Resolution of the United Nations Security Council, June 20, 1952³

The Security Council,

Noting the concerted dissemination by certain governments and authorities of grave accusations charging the use of bacteriological warfare by United Nations forces,

Noting that the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics has repeated these charges in organs of the United Nations,

Recalling that when the charges were first made the Unified Command for Korea immediately denied the charges and requested that an impartial investigation be made of them,

1. Requests the International Committee of the Red Cross, with the aid of such scientists of international reputation and such other experts as it may select, to investigate the charges and to report the results to the Security Council as soon as possible;
 2. Calls upon all governments and authorities concerned to accord to the International Committee of the Red Cross full co-operation, including the right of entry to, and free movement in, such areas as the Committee may deem necessary in the performance of its task;

79. INVESTIGATION OF GERM WARFARE CHARGES BY A UNITED NATIONS COMMISSION: Resolution 706 (VII) of the United Nations General Assembly, April 23, 1953¹

The General Assembly,

Noting that accusations have been made by certain governments and authorities charging the use of bacteriological warfare by United Nations Forces, and that the Unified Command has repeatedly denied such charges,

Recalling that when the charges were first made the Unified Command had requested that an impartial investigation be made of them,

Noting that the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China and the North Korean authorities have so far refused to accept an offer by the International Committee of the Red Cross to carry out an investigation,

Noting that the draft resolution² submitted in the Security Council by the Government of the United States of America proposing an investigation of these charges by the International Committee of the Red Cross failed to carry because of the negative vote of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics,

Desiring to serve the interests of truth,

1. Resolves that, after the President of the General Assembly has received an indication from all the governments and authorities concerned of their acceptance of the investigation proposed in the present resolution, a Commission, composed of Brazil, Egypt, Pakistan, Sweden and Uruguay, shall be set up and shall carry out immediately an investigation of the charges that have been made;

2. Calls upon the governments and authorities concerned to enable the Commission to travel freely throughout such areas of North and South Korea, the Chinese mainland and Japan as the Commission may deem necessary in the performance of its task and to allow the Commission freedom of access to such persons, places and relevant documents as it considers necessary for the fulfilment of its task and to allow it to examine any witness, including prisoners of war, under such safeguards and conditions as the Commission shall determine: all prisoners of war who are alleged to have made confessions regarding the use of bacteriological warfare shall, prior to examination by the Commission, be taken to a neutral area and remain under the responsibility and custody of the Commission until the end of the Korean hostilities;

3. Requests the President of the General Assembly to transmit the present resolution immediately to the governments and authorities concerned, requesting them to indicate their acceptance of the investigation proposed in the present resolution;

4. Requests the President of the General Assembly to report to the General Assembly at the earliest practicable date on the results of his efforts;

5. Directs the Commission, when set up, to enlist the aid of such scientists of international reputation, especially epidemiologists, and such other experts as it may select;

6. Directs the Commission, after acceptance of the investigation proposed in the present resolution by all the governments and authorities concerned, to report to the Members of the General Assembly through the Secretary-General as soon [as] possible and no later than 1 September 1953;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to furnish the Commission with the necessary staff and facilities.

80. COMMUNIST FAILURE TO REPLY TO OFFER OF UNITED NATIONS INVESTIGATION OF GERM WARFARE CHARGES: Report by the President of the United Nations General Assembly, ¹ July 28, 1953 ²

In accordance with its terms, resolution 706 (VII) of 23 April 1953 ³ on the "Question of impartial investigation of charges of use by United Nations forces of bacterial warfare" was duly communicated to the Governments of the United States of America, of the People's Democratic Republic of Korea, of the People's Republic of China, of the Republic of Korea, and of Japan, with the request that they indicate their acceptance of the investigation proposed in the resolution. The commission of investigation which was to be set up upon acceptance of the investigation by all the governments and authorities concerned has not been established as, to date, only the following three replies have been received:

1. The representative of the United States of America to the United Nations, in a note dated 1 May 1953, replied as follows:

"The representative of the United States of America to the United Nations presents his compliments to the Secretary-General of the United Nations and, with reference to note SCA/459/6/01 dated 24 April 1953, has the honor to inform the Secretary-General that the United States of America accepts the investigation proposed in the resolution adopted by the General Assembly under item 73 of its agenda, entitled 'Question of impartial investigation of charges of use by United Nations forces of bacterial warfare'.

"In accordance with paragraph 2 of the resolution, the United States of America, in its capacity as the Unified Command, after the Commission is set up will issue instructions to the United Nations Command to accord to the Commission for the performance of its task the various appropriate facilities within the competence of the United Nations Command. The United States of America will issue similar instructions to the Commander in Chief, United States Forces in the Far East".

2. The Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Korea, in a cablegram dated 13 May 1953, replied as follows:

"I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your radiogram dated 27 April regarding a resolution entitled 'Question of impartial investigation of charges of use by United Nations forces of bacterial warfare', adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations at its 428th plenary meeting on 23 April 1953.

"I also have the honour to inform you that the Government of the Republic of Korea willingly accepts the investigation proposed in the resolution and will co-operate in regard to the provisions of paragraph 2 of the resolution".

3. The Minister for Foreign Affairs of Japan, in a cablegram dated 18 May 1953, replied as follows:

"Have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Excellency's telegram transmitting the text of the resolution entitled 'Question of impartial investigation of charges of use by United Nations forces of bacterial warfare', with the request that the Japanese Government indicate its acceptance of the investigation proposed in the resolution. To co-operate with the United Nations, the Japanese Government is prepared to render every practicable assistance to the Commission contemplated in the said resolution in its free travel throughout such areas of Japan as it may deem necessary in the performance of its task, its free access to such persons, places and relevant documents as it considers necessary for the fulfilment of its task and its examination of any witness".

81. DISCUSSION OF GERM WARFARE CHARGES IN THE EIGHTH UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY: Statement by the United States Representative,¹ November 3, 1953²

The objective of the United States in the discussion of this item was to bring the truth before the world so that these dreadful things would never happen again. Two main events have taken place since the General Assembly last April passed its resolution calling for an impartial investigation of the charges of use by the United Nations forces of bacteriological warfare.³ The first event was that the Republic of Korea and Japan indicated their acceptance of the investigation. The Chinese and North Korean Communists did not reply to the communication of the President of the Seventh General Assembly on this subject.⁴ The second event related to certain materials introduced by the Soviet Union in connection with the debate on this item in the Seventh General Assembly. I am referring to the so-called "confessions" of six American fliers that they had waged bacteriological warfare over North Korea and China.⁵

These fliers had been repatriated and had indicated their so-called "confessions" were obtained under coercion and torture. My Government brought this to the attention of the Committee and also indicated to the Committee the significance of the entire bacteriological warfare campaign in relation to the general political tactics of worldwide Communist imperialism.⁶

Since the resolution of the Seventh General Assembly is still operative, my Government saw no occasion for any further resolution on the subject. An impartial investigation can be conducted pursuant to that resolution, any time that the Chinese or North Korean Communists indicate their willingness to cooperate.

The Soviet Union, however, introduced into the Committee discussion a resolution⁷ calling upon all states which have not acceded to or ratified the Geneva Protocol of June 17, 1925,⁸ for the "prohibition of use of bacteriological weapons to accede to the Protocol or ratify it." This Soviet resolution was properly described in the Committee as a "red herring," totally irrelevant to the question which the Committee was discussing. It was pointed out that the sole motive of the action of the Soviet Union was to cast an aspersion on my Government and thus divert attention from a debate which it could not win.

The Governments of the United Kingdom, Canada, Colombia, France, and New Zealand introduced into the Committee, and the Committee accepted, a proposal¹ to refer to the Disarmament Commission the draft resolution of the Soviet Union. My Government supported this resolution in the Committee and will vote for it today. The entire question of the elimination of bacteriological warfare as well as of other major weapons of mass destruction properly belongs in the Disarmament Commission. The Soviet Union has reintroduced into the General Assembly the same resolution which it presented to the Committee. The adoption by this Assembly of the resolution approved in the Committee in the view of my Government will make unnecessary a vote on the Soviet resolution.

I sincerely hope that the debate on this matter has established to the satisfaction of all members of the General Assembly that these frightful charges of the use of bacteriological warfare by U.N. forces in Korea are totally unfounded and are false. I further hope that all states will consider thoroughly the significance of such a campaign of falsehood in relation to the broader subject of the political tensions now engulfing the world.

G. EFFORTS TO REACH A POLITICAL SETTLEMENT IN KOREA, 1953-1955

82. COMMON OBJECTIVES WITH RESPECT TO KOREA: Joint Statement Issued at Seoul by the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs² and the President of the Republic of Korea, July 11, 1953³

During the past 2 weeks we have had many frank and cordial exchanges of views which have emphasized the deep friendship existing between the Republic of Korea and the United States and have gone far toward achieving mutual understanding of the troubled questions which have arisen in connection with arrangements for an armistice, the exchange of prisoners, and the forthcoming political conference.

These discussions have cemented our determination to continue and extend in the postarmistice period the close collaboration for our common objectives, marking our relations since the Communist aggression commenced 3 years ago.

In respect to the prisoners of war, we have reaffirmed our determination that no prisoners shall be subject to coercion and that, at the end of the specified period, all prisoners desiring to avoid returning to Communist jurisdiction shall be set free in South Korea, or, in the case of the non-Communist Chinese, to proceed to a destination chosen by them.

Our two Governments are in agreement in respect to entering into a mutual-defense pact, negotiations for which are under way.

We have likewise discussed collaboration along political, economic, and defense lines, and our conversations have disclosed a wide area of agreement concerning these matters.

In particular, we wish to emphasize our determination to work together for the realization within the shortest practical time of our common objective; namely, a free, independent, and unified Korea.

We are confident that the spirit of accord in which our talks have progressed, and the large areas of agreement which have resulted, will be followed by continuing mutual consideration and by the spirit of mutual accommodation which will lead most certainly to our broad objective of a secure and lasting peace in the Far East.

83. UNDERSTANDING RESPECTING A POLITICAL CONFERENCE ON KOREA: Statement by the Secretary of State at a News Conference, July 28, 1953 ¹

Asked about reports that the United States had agreed with President Syngman Rhee to withdraw from the Korean political conference after 90 days of the convening of that conference, Secretary Dulles said:

I think that what there is to say has already been said, but I will be glad to try to make it clearer. We have agreed through Assistant Secretary Robertson that if after 90 days it seems that the conference is a sham and unproductive and is being availed of by the Communists as a cover for carrying on subversive activities in Korea, we would join with President Rhee in walking out of the political conference.

We will make our own decision on this as the conference progresses.

We have made it clear to President Rhee, however, that we would not automatically resume war at that time. It was made clear to him that the question of what, if anything, we would do would be a matter for discussion and agreement at that time in the light of the surrounding circumstances.

84. POST-ARMISTICE UNITED STATES-KOREAN POLICY: Joint Statement Issued at Seoul by the Secretary of State and the President of the Republic of Korea, August 8, 1953 ²

Our friendly and understanding consultations demonstrate clearly the determination of the United States and the Republic of Korea to stand together in cordial cooperation to achieve our common objectives, including the reunification of Korea.

We have today initialed a draft of a mutual defense treaty. That treaty is designed to unite our nations in common action to meet common danger and it will cement the ties which have brought us together to combat in Korea the menace of Communist aggression.

Our two Governments will actively proceed with the constitutional processes necessary to bring this treaty into full force and effect. These constitutional processes, in the case of the United States, require that the U.S. Senate consent to the ratification. The U.S. Senate, having adjourned this week, will not again be in regular session until next January. However, U.S. Senate leaders have been kept fully informed of the exchange of views which have led to the action we have taken today and it is our sincere hope that this will lead to prompt and favorable U.S. Senate action.

Between now and the date when the mutual defense treaty can be expected to come into force and effect, our armed forces in Korea will be subject to the U.N. Command which will comply with the armistice terms. If, during this period, there should occur unprovoked armed attack by the Communist forces against the Republic of Korea in violation of the armistice, the Unc, including the Republic of Korea forces, would at once and automatically react, as such an unprovoked attack would be an attack upon and a threat to the Unc itself and to the forces under its command. Such reaction to an unprovoked armed attack would not be a new war but rather a resumption by the Communist forces of the active belligerency which the armistice has halted. The Unc will be constantly alert against such an attack.

Our Governments will promptly negotiate agreements to cover the status of such forces as the United States may elect to maintain in Korea after the mutual defense treaty comes into force and effect, and the availability to them of Korean facilities and services needed for the discharge of our common task. In the meantime, the Republic of Korea will continue to cooperate with the Unc and the status of Unc forces in Korea and the availability to them of Korean facilities and services will continue as at present.

The armistice contemplates that a political conference will be convened within 3 months, that is, prior to October 27, 1953. At that conference the U.S. delegation, in cooperation with the Rok delegation and other delegations from the Unc side, will seek to achieve the peaceful unification of historic Korea as a free and independent nation. We and our advisers have already had a full and satisfactory exchange of views which we hope and trust will establish a preparatory foundation for coordinated effort at the political conference.

If, after the political conference has been in session for 90 days, it becomes clear to each of our Governments that all attempts to achieve these objectives have been fruitless and that the conference is being exploited by the Communist delegates mainly to infiltrate, propagandize, or otherwise embarrass the Republic of Korea, we shall then be prepared to make a concurrent withdrawal from the conference. We will then consult further regarding the attainment of a unified, free, and independent Korea which is the postwar goal the United States set itself during World War II, which has been accepted by the United Nations as its goal and which will continue to be an object of concern of U.S. foreign policy.

We recognize that the Republic of Korea possesses the inherent right of sovereignty to deal with its problems, but it has agreed to take no unilateral action to unite Korea by military means for the agreed duration of the political conference.

We contemplate that the projected 3 to 4 year program for the rehabilitation of the war-ruined Korean economy shall be coordinated through the combined economic board, under the joint chairmanship of the Korean and American representatives. This program contemplates the expenditure of approximately one billion dollars of funds, subject to appropriations thereof by the U.S. Congress. Two hundred million dollars has already been authorized, out of prospective defense savings.

We have exchanged preliminary views with respect to various problems involving the maintenance and development of Rok land, air, and sea forces.

We feel confident that the relationship thus established between our two Governments marks an important contribution to the developing of independence and freedom in the Far East. With unshaking faith in the principle of collective security, and with loyal adherence to the Charter of the United Nations, we intend to move forward together toward the achievement of our common objective—the restoration of a unified, democratic, and independent Korean nation.

There are no other agreements or understandings stated or implied resulting from these consultations other than those herein contained.

85. CONVENING OF A POLITICAL CONFERENCE ON KOREA: Resolution 711 (VII) of the United Nations General Assembly, August 28, 1953¹

A

IMPLEMENTATION OF PARAGRAPH 60 OF THE KOREAN ARMISTICE AGREEMENT²

The General Assembly

1. Notes with approval the Armistice Agreement concluded in Korea on 27 July 1953, the fact that the fighting has ceased, and that a major step has thus been taken towards the full restoration of international peace and security in the area;

2. Reaffirms that the objectives of the United Nations remain the achievement by peaceful means of a unified, independent and democratic Korea under a representative form of government and the full restoration of international peace and security in the area;

3. Notes the recommendation contained in the Armistice Agreement that "In order to ensure the peaceful settlement of the Korean question, the military Commanders of both sides hereby recommend to the governments of the countries concerned on both sides that, within three (3) months after the Armistice Agreement is signed and becomes effective, a political conference of a higher level of both sides be held by representatives appointed respectively to settle through negotiation the questions of the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Korea, the peaceful settlement of the Korean question, etc.";

4. Welcomes the holding of such a conference;

5. Recommends that:

(a) The side contributing armed forces under the Unified Command in Korea shall have as participants in the conference those among the Member States contributing armed forces pursuant to the call of the United Nations which desire to be represented, together with the Republic of Korea. The participating governments shall act independently at the conference with full freedom of action and shall be bound only by decisions or agreements to which they adhere;

(b) The United States Government, after consultation with the other participating countries referred to in sub-paragraph (a) above, shall arrange with the other side for the political conference to be held as soon as possible, but not later than 28 October 1953, at a place and on a date satisfactory to both sides;

(c) The Secretary-General of the United Nations shall, if this is agreeable to both sides, provide the political conference with such services and facilities as may be feasible;

(d) The Member States participating pursuant to sub-paragraph (a) above shall inform the United Nations when agreement is reached at the conference and keep the United Nations informed at other appropriate times;

6. Reaffirms its intention to carry out its programme for relief and rehabilitation in Korea, and appeals to the governments of all Member States to contribute to this task.¹

86. COMPOSITION OF AND ARRANGEMENTS FOR A POLITICAL CONFERENCE ON KOREA: Proposals Submitted by the Deputy to the Secretary of State at the Conference Preparatory Talks at Panmunjon, December 8, 1953²

I. Composition and place of the political conference.

1. The political conference shall take the form of a conference on an equal footing between the two sides referred to in paragraph 60 of the armistice agreement. The two sides participating in the political conference shall have plenary authority as to its proceedings.

2. The political conference shall have as voting participants: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Colombia, Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, People's Republic of China, Philippines, Republic of Korea, Thailand, Turkey, Union of South Africa, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom, and United States of America.³

3. All decisions of the political conference shall be deemed to have been reached by agreement among the voting participants on the two sides referred to in the armistice agreement and the USSR, only if a decision has received the affirmative vote of both sides and the USSR at the political conference. All decisions shall be binding upon each signatory government. Each side shall determine its own procedure as to the manner in which it will signify concurrence or non-concurrence in decisions.

Each voting participant shall be bound only by the specific agreements to which it adheres.

4. In consideration of their responsibilities in connection with the stabilization of the armistice and consequent concern in a peaceful settlement in Korea, and to promote the smooth progress of the political conference, some or all of the governments whose nations are now actually working there or who have current experience in Korea and are currently familiar with its problems, shall be invited by both sides to attend and take part in the political conference without vote on either of the two sides.

³ In presenting this proposal Ambassador Dean said: "Some of the governments on our side may not actually attend the political conference. I understand from unofficial information that it is the present intention of the Government of the Union of South Africa not to attend. There may be one or two others who do not join in this offer or who will not care to attend the Conference for one reason or another." [Footnote in Bulletin.]

The governments so invited shall be entitled to express their views in plenary sessions or committee meetings on any item on the agenda agreed upon by both sides when that item is under discussion by agreement between the two sides, and in accordance with the scheduling of debate and speeches acceptable to both sides.

On this basis the invited governments may participate in the discussion in the political conference. In view of the responsibilities of the two sides for reaching agreement, the invited governments shall not introduce formal motions or proposals.

5. The political conference shall be convened at Geneva, Switzerland.

II. Time of the political conference.

6. The political conference shall be convened not less than 28 nor more than 42 days after the termination of these preliminary talks.

III. Procedural matters of the political conference.

7. The agenda of the political conference shall be determined on the basis of the armistice agreement by unanimous agreement between both sides at the political conference as its first order of business after its opening and initial organization.

8. Each government represented at the political conference shall be limited to one representative at the conference table with the right to speak. Each representative as designated in the official list of the political conference shall be entitled to appoint a deputy to sit in his absence, due notification being given to the other side.

9. The rules of procedure shall be decided by unanimous agreement between the two sides and shall include regulations for the conduct of meetings, order of speaking, order of items, and scheduling of the opening and closing of debate.

10. The order and timing of debate, and the schedule of speeches and items for discussion shall be determined by unanimous agreement between the two sides. No representative shall be permitted to speak on any topic not on the agenda and then only in the order on the agenda.

11. The political conference shall establish such committees or subordinate bodies as are agreed between the two sides.

12. The official languages of the political conference shall be English, Korean, and Chinese. The English, Korean, and Chinese texts of all resolutions and documents of the political conference shall be equally authentic. Representatives of the governments invited by the two sides may bring their own interpreters to participate in the conference.

13. Sessions of the political conference shall be held daily, except Sundays or holidays or as otherwise agreed between the two sides.

14. Except as determined by unanimous agreement between both sides, sessions of the political conference shall normally be closed to the public.

Each side shall be entitled to issue communications to the press following the sessions of the conference.

The conference may meet in executive sessions if both sides agree, each side being free to propose the end of such sessions at any time. Neither side shall issue any communication to the press following executive sessions, except as agreed to by both sides.

IV. Administrative arrangements for the political conference.

15. The Secretary-General of the United Nations shall be invited to furnish the joint secretariat for the political conference proceedings and facilities for simultaneous interpretation. This shall not restrict each side, or each government represented, from having such separate secretariat, at its own expense, as it may deem necessary.

16. Before _____ each side shall designate representatives to meet at Geneva, Switzerland, together with a representative whom the Secretary-General of the United Nations shall be invited to designate, to prepare recommendations for the consideration of the political conference with regard to:

- (a) Rules of procedure,
- (b) Manner of determining the expenses to be shared equally by the two sides, and
- (c) Related administrative and procedural matters.

Their recommendations shall be subject to ratification at the political conference by the unanimous agreement of both sides.

V. Expenditures of the political conference.

17. Expenditures of each delegation to the political conference shall be borne by each government itself. All joint expenses, such as cost of the conference buildings, joint secretariat, and other joint administrative expenses shall be charged on an equal basis to the governments of the two sides.

87. BREAKDOWN OF THE KOREAN POLITICAL CONFERENCE PREPARATORY TALKS: Address by the Deputy to the Secretary of State,¹ December 21, 1953²

As the Special Envoy appointed by President Eisenhower and Secretary of State Dulles, I am reporting to the American people tonight on my 7 weeks' attempted negotiations at Panmunjom, Korea, with the delegates from Red China and Communist North Korea in an effort to bring about an early convening of the Korean peace conference.

² Made over radio and television networks; Department of State Bulletin, Jan. 4, 1954, pp. 15-17.

The Communists usually introduce false premises, exaggerations, colorations of fact, distortions of the truth, and completely false accusations for propaganda purposes to mislead and to divert. These talks were no exception.

At the meeting on December 10, 1953, in an uninterrupted 5½-hour session, the Chinese delegate, Huang Hua, after several warnings from me accused the United States of America of perfidy or deliberate treachery in connection with the release of prisoners by President Rhee of the Republic of Korea on June 17-18¹ after Lieutenant General Harrison had signed the terms of reference for prisoners on June 8, 1953.²

My Government has never been guilty of perfidy and pray God it never shall.

I told him that his statement was false—that my Government was not guilty of perfidy and unless he withdrew the charge I would treat the meetings as in indefinite recess. He repeated the charge. And I withdrew in protest. To my mind it is quite sufficient. If I had not, the Communists would have broadcast far and wide that a representative of the United States Government had admitted the charge of perfidy.

President Rhee said to me, "We salute you, Mr. Dean, for the stand you took to teach the Soviets that they cannot all the time throw insults at the United States of America and get away with them."

Tonight I shall explain to you what we were talking about at Panmunjom and why, and where we go from here.

In our preliminary talks with the Communists we were endeavoring to bring about the political or peace conference for Korea called for by paragraph 60 of the Armistice Agreement.

The purpose of the political conference originally scheduled for October 28 is "to settle through negotiation the questions of the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Korea, the peaceful settlement of the Korean question, etc." The Korean question is the unification of a free, independent, and democratic Korea.

The nations I represented at these preliminary talks consisted of the 17 nations contributing troops to the United Nations Command, including the United States of America and the Republic of Korea.

The other side consisted of Red China and Communist North Korea. Not present, but really there, was the U.S.S.R., which, as everyone knows, actually instigated the aggression in Korea in June 1950.

As you know, through the noble and persistent efforts of President Eisenhower, the Armistice Agreement was signed by both sides on July 27, 1953, and was designed to bring about "a complete cessation of hostilities and of all acts of armed force in Korea until a final peaceful settlement is achieved."

The fighting and the bloodshed and the destruction have been stopped.

If the political conference is not held, does that mean hostilities will be resumed? No—it does not. The armistice agreement provides that it shall remain in effect until expressly superseded.

Will the Communists resume hostilities? I do not think so. The destruction in North Korea is indescribable. Whole villages have been wiped out, power stations have been destroyed, and factories, roads, farmhouses, and public facilities are in ruins. The Communists took a terrific beating. We stopped the tide and timetable of Red aggression.

Posters all over North Korea depict peace, and children releasing white doves. The emphasis is on civilian building. The construction of huge concrete bunkers and tunnels in the north leads us to believe they have no wish to resume hostilities but are preparing to hold the north.

Will President Rhee unilaterally resume hostilities? In my judgment the answer is “no.”

President Rhee is an indomitable fighter for a free, united, and democratic independent Korea. Those are our objectives and of the United Nations. We admire his patriotism and courage and his fight against communism tremendously.

We have signed the armistice and are determined to keep it. On August 7, 1953, President Rhee and Secretary Dulles signed a joint communiqué¹ in which President Rhee agreed to leave his troops under the United Nations Command and to take no unilateral action until the mutual defense pact might be expected to come into operation next spring if approved by the Senate. In view of his talks with Secretary Dulles, Assistant Secretary of State Robertson, and Vice President Nixon and my many talks with him on this subject, I believe President Rhee will take no unilateral action.

What is the argument all about? Why can't we and the Communists agree on the time, place, and composition of the conference?

Time and place are relatively easy. As to time, we are agreeable to any date so long as there is adequate time to prepare the necessary facilities, transport the delegations, etc. As to place, we say Geneva, the Communists say New Delhi, and we could probably agree on Beirut, or Colombo or Kandy or Nuwara Eliya in Ceylon.

The meat of the coconut is the composition. Who will attend the conference—who will be bound by agreements reached? Can we bring about unification of Korea and the withdrawal of foreign forces?

With regard to composition, although the armistice does not so provide, the other side proposed we should invite five neutrals, including the U.S.S.R. as one of them, with the same rights to participate in the discussions and to vote as the nations on the two sides. They include the U.S.S.R. among these truly neutral nations presumably to hide her aggression in Korea. The U.S.S.R. cannot be classified with such truly fine neutrals as Burma, India, Indonesia, and Pakistan. We have said the U.S.S.R. can attend provided the other side wants her.

It is readily apparent why the U.S.S.R. is not a neutral and why it would be desirable to have her at the conference and to know her attitude on each agenda item at the conference—whether she agreed with the other side and whether she will be bound by any agreements reached.

Why do the Communists want neutrals? The Communists think they can stir up trouble for us with India by nominating her as a neutral at the conference. They want well-intentioned people to believe that the Government of the United States does not like India, its great leader, or its freedom-loving people, which is fantastic.

Let me here pay tribute to a great military man, a great humanitarian, and a man combining superb common sense with patience and a warm friendly feeling for the helpless prisoners of war—General Thimayya of India, Chairman of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission. I believe that General Thimayya is in full sympathy with our desire to observe the unalterable clockwork timetable of the agreement for the release of the prisoners of war.

If the political conference is in session December 22 to January 22, it can discuss until that date but no longer the disposition of prisoners who have not elected repatriation to the country of their origin. It cannot discuss that question longer than January 22. If it is not in session that does not affect by one jot the automatic operation of the time schedule for the release of prisoners.

On midnight, January 22, unless both sides ask them to remain, the Indian forces will withdraw and the prisoners will be assisted to a neutral country. We have assured General Thimayya our side will not so request.

I think there is reason to hope that there will be no action either by the Communists or the Republic of Korea to cause bloodshed and that the prisoners will revert to civilian status on January 22 without difficulty or trouble.

To stop the other side's byplay as to neutrals and to further the early convening of the conference, our side has put forward an overall constructive proposal for the participation at the conference of neutrals as nonvoting observers on the items on the agenda as agreed between the two voting sides and in the order of discussion as agreed upon.¹ This would permit India and the others to participate as nonvoting observers and to discuss items on the agreed agenda and in the agreed order. If an item is not on the agenda it cannot be discussed. Nor can items be brought up out of their agreed order.

Except for the other side's insistence on the U.S.S.R. participating as a neutral, and ironing out the particular neutrals to participate which really constitutes no fundamental difficulty, we have fully met the other side on this question as to the participation of nonvoting observers and their rights at the conference and voting procedures.

As to voting, each side votes as a unit. But any nation, in accordance with resolution 5 (b) adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on August 28, 1953,² can announce before the voting she does not elect to be bound by her vote on that particular item. This should facilitate agreement.

The other side insists that talk continue and that there should be no voting until all nations on each side are bound. If any one nation's vote, as a practical matter, is really needed—for example, unification of Korea or withdrawal of foreign forces—this would, as a practical matter, have to be worked out before voting took place; so really we are not too far apart.

Thus we may have to have some agreement as to the territorial integrity of Korea and agreement to insure that the troops withdrawn across the northern border will not return or that other troops will not cross the border when we withdraw pursuant to some agreement to be worked out for phased withdrawal of troops at the peace conference.

Do I feel there still is a good chance for a true Korean peace, or has Panmunjom demonstrated the futility of a Korean political conference? I do believe the Chinese Communists are determined to keep North Korea politically and economically integrated into their own economy. The outlook is discouraging but by no means hopeless. There is no easy, pat solution. It will take all the brains, energy, resolution, and patience at our command.

Communists are in no hurry. They have no timetable. They think time is on their side and that Americans, being optimistic, friendly, truthful, constructive, and inclined to believe and to hope for the best, will become discouraged.

They believe that at a long, drawn-out conference the American negotiators will be forced by American public opinion to give in, in order to have a "successful" conference. Impatience mounts as no progress is reported. People ask, "What progress did you make today?"

The Communists know this and burn bonfires under the American negotiators and utter rude, insulting, arrogant demands that the American negotiators stop their unconstructive, stalling tactics.

The Communist press is completely government-controlled. Ours is free and pray God it ever shall be. The Communists can plan and talk and vote as a unit. We must marshal facts, argue, and convince the individual nations on our side. I wouldn't have it otherwise. But sometimes it's tough to see your best play spilled before it gets off the ground because someone has unintentionally revealed the signals.

As against that, consider how much better off we would be today if the secret agreements with respect to China, Manchuria, and the U.S.S.R. had never been entered into at Yalta without notice to Nationalist China or to the American public.

The issue between us and the U.S.S.R. and the Chinese Communists—slavery or freedom—is fundamental. There is no easy formula which can either hide it or solve it.

We are fighting to free the minds and souls of men from communism and we in the free world must stand together in this great fight.

It is not a fight of left against right. It is a fight for the human dignity of man as a creature of God against the Communist doctrine that he has no value except as the state desires to use him.

88. RESOLUTION ON THE HOLDING OF A FAR EASTERN CONFERENCE AGREED TO BY THE FOREIGN MINISTERS OF THE UNITED STATES, THE UNITED KINGDOM, FRANCE, AND THE SOVIET UNION¹ AT THE BERLIN FOREIGN MINISTERS CONFERENCE, FEBRUARY 18, 1954²

The Foreign Ministers of the United States, France, the United Kingdom, and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, meeting in Berlin,

Considering that the establishment, by peaceful means, of a united and independent Korea would be an important factor in reducing international tension and in restoring peace in other parts of Asia,

Propose that a conference of representatives of the United States, France, the United Kingdom, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the Chinese People's Republic, the Republic of Korea, the People's Democratic Republic of Korea, and the other countries the armed forces of which participated in the hostilities in Korea, and which desire to attend, shall meet in Geneva on April 26 for the purpose of reaching a peaceful settlement of the Korean question;

Agree that the problem of restoring peace in Indochina will also be discussed at the conference, to which representatives of the United States, France, the United Kingdom, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the Chinese People's Republic, and other interested states will be invited.

It is understood that neither the invitation to, nor the holding of, the above-mentioned conference shall be deemed to imply diplomatic recognition in any case where it has not already been accorded.

89. ESTABLISHMENT OF A UNITED AND INDEPENDENT KOREA: Statement by the Secretary of State at the Geneva Conference on Korea and Indochina, April 28, 1954³

We are here to establish a united and independent Korea. It may be given us to write a new page in what has been a tragic history. The people of Korea for centuries lived together as one nation, and together they have long endured foreign subjugation and aggression. They have sought to be united in freedom and independence. This is a right which no nation or group of nations can legitimately deny them.

The United States has come here with the Republic of Korea and with the other governments whose armed forces came to Korea's assistance, in a renewed and determined effort to aid the Korean people to realize their reasonable and rightful aspirations.

Why does Korea remain divided? The 1943 Declaration of Cairo¹ promised that victory over Japan would be used to make Korea "free and independent." But that has not happened.

The present phase of Korea's martyrdom goes back to August 1945. Then the United States, which had for four years borne the burden of the Japanese War, agreed that the Soviet Union might move into Manchuria and Korea north of the 38th parallel, in order to accept there the surrender of the Japanese.² But the Soviets, having gotten into North Korea for one purpose, stayed on for another purpose. Their goal has been, directly or through puppets, to turn North Korea into a satellite state and, if possible, to extend their rule throughout all Korea. In so doing, they have consistently defied agreements with their former allies, and also the collective will represented by the United Nations.

It is important that we should constantly have in mind that what is here at stake is not merely Korea, important as that is; it is the authority of the United Nations. The United Nations assumed primary responsibility for establishing Korea as a free and independent nation. It helped to create the Republic of Korea and nurtured it. When aggressors threatened the Republic of Korea with extinction, it was the United Nations which called on its members to go to Korea's defence.

Korea provides the first example in history of a collective security organization in actual operation. If this Conference is disloyal to the United Nations and its decisions, then each of us will bear a share of responsibility for destroying what protects us all.

Yesterday, the Delegates of the Republic of Korea and of Colombia told eloquently of the mission which the United Nations had assumed in relation to Korea.³ It is a story that bears repetition.

The United Nations first took jurisdiction of the Korean problem in the year 1947. It then created a Temporary Commission for Korea to help organize a government of Korea and to observe the initial elections.⁴ The Soviet Union refused to permit the United Nations Commission to have access to North Korea. Elsewhere the Commission functioned as the United Nations had intended.

In December 1948 the United Nations General Assembly received the report of its Temporary Commission and it adopted, by a vote of 48 to 6 with one abstention, a resolution which I shall read. The resolution declared:

"That there has been established a lawful government (the Government of the Republic of Korea) having effective control and jurisdiction over that part of Korea where the Temporary Commission was able to observe and consult and in which the great majority of the people of all Korea reside; that this Government is based on elections which were a valid expression of the free will of the electorate of that part of Korea and which were observed by the Temporary Commission; and that this is the only such Government of Korea.”¹

The United States, trusting to the moral authority of the United Nations and the Charter undertakings of its members, withdrew its own armed forces from South Korea. That left South Korea with only local forces suitable for maintenance of internal order. In contrast, the Soviet Union rapidly built up the war power of the Communist regime it had installed in North Korea, and on June 25, 1950, these forces launched a full-scale attack, implemented with many Russian-made tanks and planes.

The United Nations Temporary Commission, which was present on the spot, and the membership of which included India, instantly and unanimously found that this was armed aggression, and so reported to the United Nations Security Council.² That Council in turn, by a vote of 9 to 0, with one absence and one abstention, certified to the fact of aggression, and called on the members of the United Nations to help to resist the aggression.³ Sixteen nations responded with military contributions, and over forty responded with either military or material aid.

The small and lightly armed forces of the Republic of Korea were initially overpowered by the assault. The Communist aggressors quickly occupied all of Korea except a small beachhead at Pusan. But the forces of ROK quickly rallied and the United Nations members gave increasing support. A brilliant military operation, involving a bold landing at Inchon, caught the aggressors off balance, and enabled the United Nations Command to break out of the Pusan beachhead. The aggressors were routed and destroyed as an effective force.

It seemed that the United Nations could now complete its earlier action to unify Korea. Accordingly, on 7 October 1950, the General Assembly set up a new body, known as the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea—initials UNCURK and usually used—to complete the task of the previous Commissions.⁴ The new Commission proceeded to Korea.

But the long-sought unification and freedom of Korea was not yet to be. Another Communist aggression intervened. In November 1950 the Chinese Communist regime sent masses of its armed forces into Northern Korea. The United Nations General Assembly by a vote of 44 to 7, with 9 abstentions, adjudged this intervention to be aggression.⁵

The United Nations Command was forced to withdraw again to the south of Korea. But again they fought their way back to a point where the aggressors held less territory than when they had committed the initial aggression from the 38th parallel.

On 27 July 1953, an Armistice was concluded with the United Nations Command.¹ This was no free-will gift of peace by the Communists. It came only after final fanatical efforts to break the line of the United Nations Command had failed with ghastly losses to the attackers. It came only after the Communists realized that, unless there was a quick armistice, the battle area would be enlarged so as to endanger the sources of aggression in Manchuria. Then and only then did the Communist rulers judge that it would be expedient to sign the Armistice.

The Armistice contemplated that there should be a political conference with reference to Korea within three months. But the Communists found it inexpedient to live up to that agreed recommendation. They desired first to consolidate their position in North Korea.

Only now does the Korean Political Conference meet, after long haggling over its composition and place of meeting.

The composition and the place of the Conference are precisely those which the United Nations side proposed six months ago.

This fact enables one to judge where lies the responsibility for the delay.

The seven-year story I have summarized is a story of persistent attack against the forces of international law and order represented by the United Nations. Whether this attack will still prevail may be determined by this Conference.

During the seven-year period of 1947 to the present time, which I have briefly reviewed in relation to Korea, the Governments of France, Great Britain and the United States have been working with the Soviet Union to bring about the unification of Germany and liberation of Austria. There have been hundreds of meetings of the Foreign Ministers or their aides on these subjects. Nothing has been accomplished. But something has been learned. This Conference can usefully have that in mind as we judge the proposals which come before us here.

It seems to us that Soviet Communist conduct has been largely influenced by fear of freedom.

It seems that the Communist ruling class believe that a society is most peaceful and most productive if its members conform to a pattern which is prescribed by rulers possessed of absolute power. This inherently involves a suppression of freedom, for freedom implies diversity, not conformity, but it is not enough that freedom be suppressed within what is now the Soviet orbit, because freedom is contagious. Accordingly, freedom outside that orbit cannot be acquiesced in and the area of suppression must be constantly expanded in order to preserve the existing area of suppression.

Thus, the Soviet Communist rulers seem to have been driven by their own doctrine, by their own fears, to seek constantly, in one way or another, to extend their control until there is finally achieved the goal which Lenin referred to as "the amalgamation of all nations" and which Stalin referred to as "the amalgamation of the masses into a single state Union."

It may be said that Lenin and Stalin are dead—and so they are. But their doctrine is not dead. It continues to be taught to Communists throughout the world, and Communists continue to practice it throughout the world.

As the record stands to this date, the Communist rulers have at no time, at no place, voluntarily relaxed their grasp on what they had. This is so even though, as in the case of Eastern Germany, Austria and North Korea, they had promised that the grasp was to be only temporary. Also, in every non-Communist nation of the world the agents of international communism work to achieve the amalgamation of the nation and its people into the system of Communist dictatorship.

The problem which we face here at Geneva is the same problem that has been faced elsewhere. It is the problem of achieving "peace" and "democracy"—in the historic meaning of those words. They are alluring words, rich in their traditional meaning. Communist propaganda has adopted them as lures, to trap the unwary. It must be remembered that when the Communists speak of "peace," they mean a society of conformity under a single directing will. When they speak of "democracy," they mean a "dictatorship of the proletariat."

The sum of the matter is this:

When we negotiate with the Soviet Communists and their satellites, we are confronted with something far more formidable than individual or national lust for glory. We are confronted with a vast monolithic system which, despite its power, believes that it cannot survive except as it succeeds in progressively destroying human freedom.

I do not present this analysis in a mood of pessimism, but rather in a mood of realism. Communist doctrine authorizes accommodation when the opposition is strong. It is our task here to show such strength—strength of honourable and non-aggressive purpose—that the Communists will find it acceptable to grant unity and freedom to Korea.

Yesterday, we heard three proposals for the solution of the problem of Korea. The Republic of Korea and the Republic of Colombia advocated a solution giving vitality to the resolutions of the United Nations—those resolutions which refer to the establishment of a united and free Korea.

The proposal of the North Korean-Communist regime was, however, something different.¹ It did not so much as mention the United Nations or its resolutions. These, it seems, are to be treated as nullities.

The Communist proposal is in essence the same as that made in June 1950, as a prelude to the armed attack upon the Republic of

Korea. Also, it is strikingly similar to the scheme which the Soviet Union presented at Berlin last February¹ for the unification of Germany. Conformity, you see, is the Communist rule.

The present Communist proposal on Korea provides that the freely elected government of the Republic of Korea, representing at least three-quarters of the Korean people, would be forced into combination, on a basis of equality, with the Communist regime ruling a small minority of the people in the North.

General elections are proposed by the Communists under a law, the terms of which would be subject to veto by the Communist regime. The proposal stipulates that the election conditions should exclude all "foreign interference." Presumably, this is intended to exclude United Nations supervision.

The scheme is designed to destroy the authority of the existing government and to replace it by a Communist puppet regime.

The North Korean Communist proposal likewise requires that all foreign forces should be withdrawn from Korean territory within six months. The United Nations forces would have a long way to go. The Chinese Communist forces would have only a few miles to go—and they could quickly return.

The United States does not desire its troops to remain indefinitely in Korea. But we remember that once before we had our troops in Korea and withdrew them prematurely as it turned out. We do not want that history to repeat itself.

This then is the North Korean proposal. The United States must reject that proposal because it does not meet the requirements of a free, unified and independent Korea, for which so much blood has been expended and suffering endured.

Peace is always easy to achieve—by surrender. Unity is also easy to achieve—by surrender. The hard task, the task that confronts us, is to combine peace and unity with freedom.

The people of the Republic of Korea know freedom, and they have fought and suffered as have few others to preserve their freedom.

I have myself seen the freedom of the Republic of Korea.

I have been to the University of Seoul and seen the young men and women of Korea eagerly acquiring knowledge in a free, liberal educational institution.

I have attended sessions of the Korean Assembly and seen the functioning of this body, whose members had been chosen by freely contested elections observed by a United Nations Commission.

I have met in a vast auditorium with thousands of Christian refugees who had recently fled from North Korea into the Republic of Korea to escape the religious persecution of the Communist North and to gain the freedom of religion which prevailed in the Republic of Korea.

The Republic of Korea, which fought so valiantly for freedom, will never accept unity at the price of thinly disguised annexation by the

Soviet-Chinese Communist bloc. The United States sent over one million of their youth to fight in Korea to save Korea from violent annexation by aggressors. Of them, over 140,000 became casualties. Certainly we are not disposed, here at the Council table, to give away what our sons battled so bravely to preserve.

It is basic that whatever programme is adopted here for the unification of Korea must in fact also be a programme which will assure the freedom of Korea.

A workable programme for unifying Korea does not have to be invented by us. It is already at hand. It was laid down by the United Nations General Assembly resolution of October 7, 1950. That is the resolution to which I have already referred, the resolution which established a Commission to complete the unification of Korea by observing elections in that part of Korea where observed elections had not yet been held.

That United Nations Commission (UNCURK) is at this very moment waiting in Korea ready to fulfil its clear and precise mandate from the United Nations.

Accomplishment of that mandate would complete the unification and freedom of Korea which was interrupted first by Soviet obstruction in 1948, then by North Korean Communist aggression in June 1950, and then by the Chinese Communist aggression of November 1950. Now that aggression has been thwarted, the interrupted work of the Commission should proceed. That is our proposal.

It would require the Chinese Communist regime to withdraw their forces of aggression and occupation from North Korea so that the United Nations can complete its task in an atmosphere free of menace.

It is important to think of freedom not only in terms of the freedom of individuals but also in terms of national freedom. Korea is a peninsula of such strategic value that it has for many years been the subject of big-power politics. Russia, Japan and China have successively sought to use Korea to serve their own policies of aggrandizement. For a long time the Koreans have not been the masters of their own destiny. That state of affairs should be ended.

The United States seeks no advantages in Korea. We are in the process of concluding a Mutual Security Treaty with the Republic of Korea.¹ But that treaty implies no aggressive purpose and the United States does not seek thereby to gain a forward position which could menace anyone.

Japan is no longer an aggressive force and has loyally undertaken to refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or the political independence of any other country.

The Republic of Korea has itself no ambitions which extend beyond its natural borders.

Are Soviet Russia and Communist China willing to renounce ambitions which would be served by control of Korea? If so, it will be possible to give Korea that national independence which the United Nations has been seeking for Korea, and which the Koreans want for themselves.

Such a Korea should of course be a member of the United Nations and enjoy the added dignity and protection which membership may give. It may be recalled that the Republic of Korea applied for membership in the United Nations in 1949.¹ It was prevented only by a Soviet Union veto in the Security Council.² That is another of the wrongs which we should agree here to remedy.

There are those who feel that past experience and cold reason combine to show the futility of the task which we here undertake. I do not underestimate the difficulty of that task. But I still feel that we need not be discouraged, and that it is not a waste of our time to seek resourcefully to achieve our allotted goal.

We properly recall the failures of the past, so that we may profit by experience. But we can also remember that the future is never a mere repetition of the past.

We need not let cold logic chill our hopes. We know that those who live by faith prevail in the end over those who live by calculation.

It is right that Korea should be united and should be a free and independent nation able to realize a destiny which conforms to the peaceful aspirations of its people.

It is right that the United Nations should be sustained as an authority to which all peoples, for all time, may turn to save them from the scourge of war and to assure the dignity and worth and equal rights of nations large and small.

Our duty is to pursue these goals with dedication, and with a purity of purpose which admits of no self-aggrandizement. Then we shall have done our part in serving principles of moral order, which impose themselves on men and nations.

Conference for the purpose of establishing a united and independent Korea by peaceful means.

We have made a number of proposals and suggestions in accord with the past efforts of the United Nations to bring about the unification, independence, and freedom of Korea; and within the framework of the following two principles which we believe to be fundamental.

1. The United Nations, under its Charter, is fully and rightfully empowered to take collective action to repel aggression, to restore peace and security, and to extend its good offices to seeking a peaceful settlement in Korea.

2. In order to establish a unified, independent and democratic Korea, genuinely free elections should be held under UN supervision, for representatives in the national assembly, in which representation shall be in direct proportion to the indigenous population in Korea.

We have earnestly and patiently searched for a basis of agreement which would enable us to proceed with Korean unification in accordance with these fundamental principles.

The Communist delegations have rejected our every effort to obtain agreement. The principal issues between us, therefore, are clear. Firstly, we accept and assert the authority of the United Nations. The Communists repudiate and reject the authority and competence of the United Nations in Korea and have labelled the United Nations itself as the tool of aggression. Were we to accept this position of the Communists, it would mean the death of the principle of collective security and of the UN itself. Secondly, we desire genuinely free elections. The Communists insist upon procedures which would make genuinely free elections impossible. It is clear that the Communists will not accept impartial and effective supervision of free elections. Plainly, they have shown their intention to maintain Communist control over North Korea. They have persisted in the same attitudes which have frustrated United Nations efforts to unify Korea since 1947.

We believe, therefore, that it is better to face the fact of our disagreement than to raise false hopes and mislead the peoples of the world into believing that there is agreement where there is none.

In the circumstances, we have been compelled reluctantly and regretfully to conclude that so long as the Communist delegations reject the two fundamental principles which we consider indispensable, further consideration and examination of the Korean question by the conference would serve no useful purpose. We reaffirm our continued support for the objectives of the United Nations in Korea.

In accordance with the resolution of the General Assembly of the United Nations of August 28, 1953, the member states parties to this declaration will inform the United Nations concerning the proceedings at this conference.¹

91. TRANSFER TO THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA OF ADMINISTRATIVE CONTROL OVER THE REGION BETWEEN THE ARMISTICE DEMARCATION LINE AND THE 38th PARALLEL: Resolution of the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea, August 9, 1954¹

"The United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea,

"Recalling the resolution of the Interim Committee on Korea of 12 October 1950,² subsequently endorsed by UNCURK, which advised the Unified Command to assume provisionally all responsibilities for government and civil administration of areas north of the 38th parallel³ which might come under occupation by United Nations forces and over which the United Nations had not recognized any Government as having legal and effective control, pending consideration by UNCURK in the light of its responsibility for establishing a unified, independent and democratic Government of all Korea,

"Noting that the Unified Command has, through the United Nations Command, administered in accordance with that resolution the small area north of the 38th parallel which has been under United Nations control since 1951,

"Considering that the cessation of hostilities consequent upon the conclusion of the Armistice Agreement on 27 July 1953 has enabled the United Nations Command to develop civilian resettlement of that area, so far as possible with original inhabitants who have been living as refugees in South Korea, under a programme viewed favourably by the Commission as a means of relieving the refugee problem and assisting the economy,

"Recognizing that the civilian population has now grown to some 130,000 in this area of approximately 2,300 square miles and has created an increasingly large and complex administrative task which needs the facilities of civilian administration,

"Bearing in mind that the United Nations Command has in consequence indicated to the Commission that it now wishes to be relieved of responsibility for an administration which it considers it is not organized to carry out,

"Believing that in any event it is undesirable to keep a civil population under military administration for a prolonged period after hostilities have ceased.

"Considering that this problem can be appropriately resolved by transferring administrative control to the Government of the Republic of Korea, and

"Further considering that such transfer of administrative control will be without prejudice to the final disposition of the territory and will not adversely affect any future negotiations for a settlement of the Korean question,

92. RESULTS OF THE KOREAN PHASE OF THE GENEVA CONFERENCE ON KOREA AND INDOCHINA: Letter, Report, and Annex From Certain Members of the United Nations to the U.N. Secretary-General, November 11, 1954 ²

LETTER DATED 11 NOVEMBER 1954 FROM THE MEMBERS OF THE UNITED NATIONS WHICH PARTICIPATED IN THE UNITED NATIONS ACTION IN KOREA AND ATTENDED THE KOREAN POLITICAL CONFERENCE, AT GENEVA, ADDRESSED TO THE SECRETARY-GENERAL

In paragraph 60 of the Korean Armistice Agreement signed on 27 July 1953 the military commanders of both sides recommended that, in order to ensure the peaceful settlement of the Korean question, a "political conference of a higher level of both sides" be held. The General Assembly, in its resolution of 28 August 1953,³ welcomed the holding of such a conference and recommended that "the side contributing armed forces under the United Nations Command in Korea shall have as participants in the conference those among the Member States contributing armed forces pursuant to the call of the United Nations which desire to be represented, together with the Republic of Korea". It also recommended that the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics participate in the conference, "provided the other side desires it". The United States Government was requested to make the arrangements for the political conference with the other participants. Finally, the Assembly recommended that Member States participating in the political conference on the United Nations side should inform the United Nations when agreement was reached at the conference and keep the United Nations informed at other appropriate times.

Efforts by the United States to make arrangements for the conference in accordance with these resolutions were for long frustrated. However, the Foreign Ministers of France, the United Kingdom, the United States, and the USSR, meeting in Berlin, proposed on 18 February 1954 that "a conference of representatives of the United States, France, the United Kingdom, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the Chinese People's Republic, the Republic of Korea, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, and the other countries the armed forces of which participated in the hostilities in Korea, and which desire to attend, shall meet in Geneva on 26 April for the purpose of reaching a peaceful settlement of the Korean question".¹

The Conference convened as scheduled on 26 April in accordance with the Berlin communiqué of 18 February 1954 with all eligible countries attending except the Union of South Africa. In our view this Conference was in effect the conference referred to in paragraph 60 of the Korean Armistice Agreement and the General Assembly's resolution of 28 August 1953. The Korean problem was discussed in fifteen plenary sessions and one special meeting over a period of seven weeks, from 26 April to 15 June.

Pursuant to the Assembly's resolution of 28 August 1953, the Members of the United Nations who participated in the United Nations action in Korea and attended the Geneva Conference believe it appropriate to inform the United Nations of their efforts to bring about, by negotiation, a peaceful solution of the Korean problem. It is requested that their report on the Conference, and this letter, be circulated to the Members of the United Nations. Copies of the records of the Conference have been transmitted to the United Nations Secretariat.

1. Our Governments, which participated in the United Nations action in Korea, made every effort at the Korean Political Conference in Geneva to obtain agreement that would lead to the establishment of a unified, independent, and democratic Korea. To this end, our delegations made a number of proposals and suggestions, consistent with the authority and principles of the United Nations, to achieve the unification of Korea by peaceful means on a practical and honorable basis. Agreement was sought on the basis of the following two fundamental principles:

(1) The United Nations, under its Charter, is fully and rightly empowered to take collective action to repel aggression, to restore peace and security, and to extend its good offices to seeking a peaceful settlement in Korea; and

(2) In order to establish a unified, independent and democratic Korea genuinely free elections should be held under United Nations supervision for representatives in a National Assembly, in which representation shall be in direct proportion to the indigenous population in all parts of Korea.

2. The three Communist delegations rejected these principles. In the first place, they argued that the United Nations, through the collective action taken in Korea, had lost its moral and legal authority to deal with the Korean problem. For example, in a speech to the Conference on 11 May 1954, Mr. Molotov said:

"In the situation which has arisen the United Nations has deprived itself of the possibility of acting as an impartial international organ [,] and it can no longer play an objective part in the settlement of the Korean question."¹

The same viewpoint was expressed on 22 May by Mr. Chou En-lai, who asserted that:

"... the United Nations has been placed in the position of a belligerent in the Korean War and has lost its competence and moral authority to deal impartially with the Korean question".

Mr. Nam Il told the Conference on 22 May that:

"We fail to understand the statement[s] of some delegates who have called upon the Korean people to respect the United Nations' actions and resolutions on the Korean question."²

3. The Governments which participated in the United Nations action in Korea believed that it was essential to declare and adhere to the first of the principles mentioned above in order to uphold the validity of the Charter of the United Nations and the legality of the collective action undertaken by the United Nations to repel the Communist aggression and to restore peace and security in Korea. This principle was reaffirmed by the General Assembly which, in a resolution of 28 August 1953, expressed satisfaction that "the first efforts pursuant to the call of the United Nations to repel armed aggression by collective military measures have been successful" and expressed its firm conviction that "... this proof of the effectiveness of collective security under the United Nations Charter will contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security". Our delegations at the Geneva Conference therefore rejected the contention that the United Nations, in taking collective action against aggression, had lost its authority under the Charter to find a peaceful solution of the Korean question. We believe that, had we taken any other position in this matter at Geneva and accepted the repudiation of the authority and competence of the United Nations in Korea, this would have gravely undermined the principle of collective security which is embodied in the Charter of the United Nations.

4. Our Governments also strongly believed that the second principle—genuinely free elections—was essential to the achievement of the objectives of the United Nations in Korea. Free elections are the only means by which the Korean people can express their will without fear of coercion; they are, therefore, the essential first step towards the unification of Korea. To ensure that the elections are held under conditions of genuine freedom in Korea, we maintained that they must be conducted under appropriate supervision. In our view, such supervision must be impartial and effective and should be under the authority and auspices of the United Nations.

5. The proposals put forward by the three Communist delegations on the subject of elections were, briefly, that:

(1) Elections in Korea must be prepared and conducted by an "all-Korean commission" in which North and South Korea would have equal representation and which would function only by agreement between the two.

(2) International supervision of the elections must be limited to a "neutral nations supervisory commission", composed of an equal number of Communist and non-Communist nations to be designated by the Conference, and operating only by unanimous agreement.

6. In our view, these proposals were unacceptable. They repudiated the competence of the United Nations and were inherently unworkable. They failed entirely to provide any guarantee that elections would be carried out in genuine freedom. They rejected the principle of proportional representation by insisting that in the so-called "all-Korean commission" the minority of the population who inhabit North Korea should have the same number of representatives as the overwhelming majority of the population who live in South Korea. Even if the "all-Korean commission" could successfully have been constituted, it could only have functioned to the extent that its North Korean and South Korean members were in complete agreement. There was no provision for resolving points of disagreement. In practice, the Communist members would have retained an absolute veto over the conduct of the elections, which would have meant that they could never have taken place in freedom, if at all.

7. As for the proposed "Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission", it could only have functioned in the unlikely event that the "all-Korean commission" was able to agree on a plan for the elections. Even then the equal representation of Communist and non-Communist nations, and the provisions under which decisions could only be taken by unanimous agreement, would have enabled the Communist members of the supervisory commission to frustrate the commission's operations and to prevent any effective observation of the elections. As was pointed out at Geneva, this form of international supervision would have been identical with that of the neutral nations supervisory commission established under the Korean Armistice Agreement. The inherent vice in the proposal becomes the more patent in the light of past experiences when we consider that Communist representatives have freely used the veto to frustrate any contemplated action no matter how reasonable. There was no basis for believing that the proposed Commission would have been any more effective in practice than the neutral nations supervisory commission established by the Armistice Agreement which, because of Communist obstruction, has been unable to ensure compliance with the Agreement in North Korea.

8. The proposals of the three Communist delegations indicated plainly a refusal to submit the solution of the Korean problem to the will of the Korean people expressed in honest and free elections, adequately and impartially supervised. They sought to obliterate the distinction between the Government of the Republic of Korea, and the North Korean régime whose forces were declared by the United Nations to have committed aggression in Korea. The Communist proposals would have served to extend their control over all of Korea or, at the very least, to perpetuate its division.

9. The three Communist delegations also called for the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Korea before the holding of elections. This proposal would have involved the withdrawal of the United Nations forces before the mission of the United Nations to establish peace and security in Korea had been completed, leaving behind them a country still divided, still without a single government, and with no early hope of obtaining one. Furthermore, the proposal amounted to a demand that the aggressor forces in Korea should be placed on a plane of equality with the United Nations forces which are in Korea in accordance with United Nations resolutions to repel aggression.

10. Our Governments were all agreed that all United Nations forces should be withdrawn as soon as this could be done without prejudice to the objectives of the United Nations to restore peace and security in the area. We believed, therefore, that the withdrawal of the United Nations forces from Korea should be completed as soon as these objectives had been achieved and after the establishment of a unified Korea.

11. For more than seven weeks every effort was made by our delegations to secure agreement on a basis consistent with the principles set out in paragraph 1 above. These efforts were in vain. It became clear that serious negotiation was impossible and that the Conference was being exploited by the Communist spokesmen to attack the very basis of the United Nations action in Korea and to attempt to confuse world opinion on the fundamental issues in the Korean question. To the very end, the Communist proposals would have made the unification of Korea impossible, except on the basis of extending Communist control over all of Korea. We came to the conclusion, therefore, that further discussions at the Geneva Conference could hold out no prospect of success.

12. At the final session of the Conference on 15 June, the three Communist delegations presented a number of further proposals. These were designed essentially to blur the issues at stake and to make it appear that the Conference was in complete agreement on the objectives it sought in Korea. Nevertheless, it quickly became evident that the Communist Delegations maintained their previous position on the points of principle discussed above. They still insisted on the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Korea before the beginning of the elections, and that these elections should be arranged by an "all Korean Commission" and supervised by a "Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission" in each of which the Communist members would retain a power of veto. They continued to assert (in the words of the Foreign Minister of the Soviet Union on 15 June) that the United Nations Organization "has acted in Korea as a belligerent and . . . in consequence has no moral right to function as an impartial organization for the solution of the Korean problem".¹

13. They also claimed that the adoption of their proposals was necessary in order to bind all parties in Korea to maintain peace there. It was pointed out to them that the Korean Armistice Agreement already contained formal and exact provisions for the maintenance of the cease-fire in paragraph 62 which lays down that:

"The articles and paragraphs of this Armistice Agreement shall remain in effect until expressly superseded either by mutually acceptable amendments and additions or by provision in an appropriate agreement for a peaceful settlement at a political level between both sides".

14. In our view the proposals submitted by the three Communist delegations at the final session could have served only to conceal the serious issues of principle which remained unresolved. We considered that it was better to face the facts of our disagreement and that it would be wrong to raise false hopes and mislead the peoples of the world into believing there was agreement when in truth there was none. Accordingly, at the final plenary session of 15 June, our Delegates and the Delegate of the Republic of Korea made the Declaration by the Sixteen (of which the text is attached),² in which we informed the Communist Delegations that we had been compelled, reluctantly and regretfully, to conclude that, so long as they rejected the two fundamental principles which we consider indispensable, further consideration and examination of the Korean question by the Conference would serve no useful purpose.

15. The Governments which participated in the United Nations action in Korea deeply regret that the Communist delegations persisted at Geneva in the same refusal to accept elections impartially supervised which has frustrated the efforts of the United Nations since 1947 to bring about the unification of Korea.

Our delegations made it clear that the failure of the Geneva Conference to solve the Korean question does not prejudice the armistice a Korea, which remains in effect. We expressed our intent to continue to support the objectives of the United Nations in Korea, in particular that of achieving a unified, independent, and democratic Korea by peaceful means. 3. APPROVAL OF REPORT ON THE KOREAN PHASE OF THE GENEVA CONFERENCE ON KOREA AND INDOCHINA: Resolution 811 (IX) of the United Nations General Assembly, December 11, 1954¹

The General Assembly,
Having noted the report of the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea signed at Seoul, Korea, on 7 August 1954,²

Having received the report on the Korean Political Conference held in Geneva from 26 April to 15 June 1954,³ in pursuance of General Assembly resolution 711 (VII) of 28 August 1953,

Noting that the negotiations in Geneva have not resulted in agreement on a final settlement of the Korean question in accordance with the United Nations objectives in Korea,

Recognizing that these objectives should be achieved by peaceful methods and by constructive efforts on the part of the Governments concerned,

Noting that paragraph 62 of the Armistice Agreement of 27 July 1953 provides that the Agreement "shall remain in effect until expressly superseded either by mutually acceptable amendments and additions or by provision in an appropriate agreement for a peaceful settlement at a political level between both sides",

3. Expresses the hope that it will soon prove possible to make progress towards these objectives;
4. Requests the Secretary-General to place the item on the provisional agenda of its tenth session.

REPORT OF THE UNITED NATIONS COMMISSION FOR THE UNIFICATION AND REHABILITATION OF KOREA

The General Assembly,

Having noted the report of the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea signed at Seoul, Korea, on 7 September 1955,²

Recalling that, in resolution 811 (IX) of 11 December 1954,³ in approving the report⁴ of the fifteen Governments participating in the Geneva Conference on behalf of the United Nations, the General Assembly expressed the hope that it would soon prove possible to make progress towards the achievement by peaceful means of a unified, independent and democratic Korea under a representative form of government and of full restoration of international peace and security in the area,

Noting that paragraph 62 of the Armistice Agreement of 27 July 1953 provides that the Agreement "shall remain in effect until expressly superseded either by mutually acceptable amendments and additions or by provision in an appropriate agreement for a peaceful settlement at a political level between both sides",

1. Reaffirms its intention to continue to seek an early solution of the Korean question in accordance with the objectives of the United Nations;

2. Urges that continuing efforts be made to achieve these objectives;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to place the Korean question on the provisional agenda of the eleventh session of the General Assembly.

H. THE PRISONER OF WAR PROBLEM FOLLOWING THE ARMISTICE, 1953-1955

5. POSSIBLE COMMUNIST DETENTION OF KOREAN WAR PRISONERS: Statement by the Department of State, August 8, 1953¹

The State Department is gravely concerned by reports that the Communists may not intend to return all of our prisoners now in their custody. It has long been believed on good authority that the Soviet Union still holds an unknown number of World War II prisoners of different nationalities, and it was with this in mind that we insisted on a clause in the armistice agreement which provided that any U.N. personnel who are said not to desire repatriation must nevertheless be transferred to the custody of the [Neutral Nations] Repatriation Commission where United Nations and U.S. officials will have access to them. This would include any prisoners alleged to have been given "jail sentences." None is exempt.

We must avoid action which might jeopardize the safety or liberty of our prisoners now in Communist hands. The progress of the prisoner exchange is being watched closely and appropriate action will be taken just as soon as definite facts are established.

6. AUTHORITY FOR RELEASE OF NON-REPATRIATE PRISONERS OF WAR: Statement by the Secretary of State, November 17, 1953²

There has been some inquiry as to the status of prisoners of war in Korea 120 days after they were turned over to the Repatriation Commission. The armistice provisions are clear.³ All prisoners who have not chosen repatriation, and as to whom no other disposition has been agreed to by the Political Conference, shall be given their freedom after 120 days. This period ends January 22, 1954. Even if no Political Conference has been held by that time the prisoners on that date should receive their freedom.

Since the beginning of the POW [Prisoner of War] discussion, the U.S. position has been consistently that POW's must not be forcibly repatriated or held indefinitely.

This was made clear and accepted by the United Nations when its resolution of December 3, 1952,⁴ was under discussion. It was made clear to the Communists when armistice negotiations were resumed in the spring of 1953. This position was finally accepted by the Communists in June 1953, although the Communists attempted to insert a provision which would have held the prisoners until final agreement by the Political Conference. The U.N. negotiators maintained their position that POW's should not be indefinitely held and the Communists finally accepted the U.N. position. The agreement thus confirms the consistent and firm position of the United States.

The relevant portion of paragraph 11 of the Terms of Reference for the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission,¹ annexed to the Armistice Agreement, reads:

The Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission shall declare the relief from the prisoner of war status to civilian status of any prisoners of war who have not exercised their right to be repatriated and for whom no other disposition has been agreed to by the Political Conference within one hundred and twenty (120) days after the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission has assumed their custody.

97. AUTHORITY FOR RELEASE OF NON-REPATRIATE PRISONERS OF WAR: Statement by the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, December 23, 1953²

The terms of reference for the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission,³ signed at Panmunjom on June 8 of this year as an annex to the armistice agreement which later halted armed conflict in Korea, resolved an issue which alone had protracted the cease-fire discussions for more than a year.

The issue was the right of a Pow [Prisoner of War] who resists repatriation to seek asylum and of a detaining power to grant it. This right is based on respect under the law for individual freedom and human dignity. To uphold it the Unc [United Nations Command] fought throughout the long and at times frustrating negotiations.

Paragraph 11 of the terms of reference provide that at the expiration of 90 days after the transfer of custody of Pow to the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission, access to captured personnel by representatives of their original sides shall terminate. That 90-day period of explanations comes to an end on December 23.

Paragraph 11 provides that as of the end of the day of 22 January these men will become entitled to their freedom as civilians. There will no longer be authority for their custody by the Indian troops. As civilians they are to be enabled to go to any available country of their choice. Public statements made by representatives of the ROK [Republic of Korea] and the National Government of the Republic of China contain open invitations to the nearly 8,000 Korean and more than 14,000 Chinese anti-Communists, respectively, in the south CFI [Custodian Force, India] camp to make their new homes in the ROK and in the territory under the control of the National Government of the Republic of China. Representatives of these 2 nations are being informed that my command will use all available facilities to expedite the movement of the individuals who desire to go to those countries. Under paragraph 11 of the terms of reference to the NNRC [Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission] and the Indian Red Cross are to assist any individual who may wish to apply to go to neutral countries elsewhere in the world.

It is regrettable that Communist obstructions have caused disagreements and disrupted the explanations to nonrepatriate POW [Prisoners of War]. Despite the fact that agreement was once reached concerning the fundamental rights of these thousands of prisoners, the Communists have persisted in employing their habitual frustrating tactics to the extent that the work of the NNRC has been interfered with and the already difficult job of the Custodial Force, India, greatly complicated.

With the expiration of this period of explanations, I desire to express my profound admiration and respect for the Indian troops. In their unique and sensitive mission these officers and men have demonstrated an almost unprecedented capacity for military firmness and humane restraint. Their rigid adherence to mandate imposed upon them by the terms of reference has earned them the plaudits of all fairminded nations of the world and an unshakable confidence in their ability to continue their duty in the same splendid manner until their mission is completed some 30 days hence.

98. AUTHORITY FOR RELEASE OF NON-REPATRIATE PRISONERS OF WAR: Letter From the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command,¹ to the Chairman of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission,² January 16, 1954³

I have read your letter of 14 January⁴ in which you propose to request the United Nations Command to accept the restoration of custody, beginning at 0900 hours, 20 January, of those prisoners of war given over to the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission by this command.

In my communication to you of 6 January,⁵ the position of the United Nations Command was stated clearly. That position has not and will not be changed, since it is founded on both the spirit and the letter of the terms of reference which embody the factors of humanity and justice for the prisoners themselves and the recognition of their inalienable right of freedom of choice.

It is recognized that Communist intransigence made it impossible for the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission fully to accomplish its mission under its agreed terms of reference. The United Nations Command in good faith turned over the prisoners of war in its custody to the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission, with confidence that each prisoner would be given full opportunity to hear explanations and to make freely and without coercion his own choice as to his future. The United Nations Command made an earnest effort to explain their rights to repatriation to the prisoners it turned over to custody of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission. The United Nations Command also sought to assist the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission in conducting explanations to prisoners of war formerly detained by the United Nations Command. Failure to complete explanations to more than a minority of prisoners of war formerly detained by the United Nations Command can only be attributed to the stubborn refusal of the Korean People's Army and Chinese People's Volunteers to continue explanations except under conditions of their own choosing, which conditions required the use of physical force against the prisoners of war. Such use of force is contrary to the terms of reference, the Geneva Convention and the universally accepted concepts of human decency and rights. The United Nations Command supports and commends the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission and the Custodian Force, Indian, in their refusal to use force illegally against prisoners of war.

The United Nations side has made every effort to convene the political conference recommended in Paragraph 60, Armistice Agreement, and referenced in Paragraph 11, Terms of Reference, Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission, which was to consider within the specified period of thirty days the disposition of prisoners of war. These efforts have been thwarted by the other side. However, as I made clear in my letter of 6 January, the plain intent of Paragraph 11 of the Terms of Reference is to prevent either party to the agreement from frustrating the basic purpose of avoiding indefinite captivity for the prisoners.

For the United Nations Command now to agree to further and indefinitely prolonged captivity of these prisoners of war would negate the very principle of human rights for which so many men of this command have fought and died. Such unjust and unworthy action is intolerable to any free people, and is obviously unthinkable. The United Nations Command agreed to the Terms of Reference for the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission only because they included a prohibition against enforced repatriation, and made clear provisions for the final release of prisoners of war to civilian status 120 days after being placed in the custody of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission.

I reiterate the unalterable conviction of the United Nations Command that the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission has a solemn obligation to fulfill its responsibilities and release to civilian status at 23 January all prisoners of war who have refused repatriation. Failure of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission to fulfill this obligation would be a deliberate avoidance of an important element of the Terms of Reference and the United Nations Command could not concur in an action constituting default by the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission.

The United Nations Command cannot accept custody of these prisoners of war in accordance with the terms of your proposal. However, in view of your stated intention to release unilaterally the prisoners of war starting 20 January, the United Nations Command must necessarily be prepared to arrange for their accommodation and disposition. In processing these personnel, after they leave the demilitarized zone, it must be clearly understood that we do so out of regard for humanitarian consideration and in order to insure the prisoners the fullest possible continued enjoyment of the benefits the agreement was designed to assure to them. The United Nations Command, in accordance with the agreement on prisoners of war, will honor its obligation to treat them as fully entitled to their freedom as civilians on 23 January. You are already aware of the detailed plans for processing which have been made by the United Nations Command. The return to the United Nations Command of personnel prior to 2300 1 January can only be regarded as a failure by the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission fully to discharge its duties, but this failure will in no way, it must be emphasized, affect the right of prisoners of war to become civilians at that time regardless of their physical location.

Accordingly, I have instructed the Commanding General, Eighth United States Army,¹ to adjust his present plans to permit handling and processing of personnel beginning 20 January. He will, as a matter of priority, make the necessary arrangements with you.²

99. REPORTS OF UNITED STATES PRISONERS OF WAR HELD IN SOVIET CUSTODY: Note From the American Embassy at Moscow to the Soviet Ministry of Foreign Affairs, May 5, 1954³

The Embassy of the United States of America presents its compliments to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and has the honor to request the Ministry's assistance in the following matter:

The United States Government has recently received reports which support earlier indications that American prisoners of war who had seen action in Korea have been transported to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and that they are now in Soviet custody. The United States Government desires to receive urgently all information available to the Soviet Government concerning these American personnel and to arrange their repatriation at the earliest possible time.

100. ACCOUNTING FOR MISSING UNITED NATIONS PERSONNEL: Statement by the Senior United Nations Representative on the Military Armistice Commission,¹ August 17, 1954²

On the ninth of September, 1953, we presented to your side a list of the names of United Nations Command personnel who, according to our best available information, were prisoners of war held by your side in the months immediately preceding the end of active hostilities in Korea and who were not returned to our side in the programs of prisoner exchange. As subsequently amended, the list currently in your hands totals 3,405 individuals. The reason that we gave you these amendments from time to time was because of our sincere desire to provide your side with the most accurate information possible so that a satisfactory accounting could be made by your side for these prisoners of war.

Because of the fact that additional information has recently become available which warrants the deletion of a considerable number of names from the list currently in your possession and since further amendments to the original list might create confusion, we have prepared a completely new list for your use. This new list supersedes and replaces all previous information we have presented you on this subject. I now hand you a list containing the names of 2,840 United Nations Command personnel who we are convinced were in your hands and whom we consider as not having been accounted for in a satisfactory manner. The names of persons of Korean nationality are listed in the Korean language, all others are listed in English.

The difference between this new list and previous lists furnished amounts to 418 United States personnel, 1 British soldier, and 146 Republic of Korea personnel. These deletions are largely persons determined to be deceased or, particularly in the case of some of the Korean persons, found to have been repatriated.

The United Nations Command is desirous of securing a complete report as to the current status of each of these persons. If they are currently held in North Korea, Manchuria, China, or elsewhere, the location of the place of custody and the reason therefor is requested. If they are deceased, that information should also be furnished together with any additional details available regarding cause of death and place of burial, including an indication that the remains will be returned in the exchange program beginning on 1 September 1954.

During the recent negotiations at Geneva it was developed that certain of the prisoners are being held in China. We are particularly interested in obtaining information regarding these individuals. Since their captive status resulted from the conflict in Korea, it is appropriate that the necessary exchange of information concerning both the place of detention and reason therefor be conducted here in this commission. It is requested that for each name in this category the reason for detention and the time and place of their expected release be furnished to our side.

The families of the personnel in this unaccounted-for category are anxious to reach an early and satisfactory settlement of this entire problem. Accordingly, immediately upon receipt from your side of a complete accounting by name for each of these 2,840 United Nations Command personnel, in return and as evidence of our sincerity in desiring to exchange the most complete information available on the present status of former prisoners of war, we are prepared to present to your side an explanation by individual name for the 98,739 personnel of your side on the list you submitted to our side on 21 September 1953. It is proposed that this exchange of information will be reciprocal and simultaneous. Such an exchange of information will contribute greatly to the successful accomplishment of our mission of negotiations here in the Military Armistice Commission. I await your reply as to when you expect to be able to furnish the information we have requested and thereby expedite the receipt of the information you desire regarding your list.

101. PROTEST OF IMPRISONMENT OF UNITED STATES PRISONERS OF WAR BY THE CHINESE COMMUNISTS:
Note From the United States Government to the Chinese Communist Authorities (Transmitted by the British Embassy at Peiping), November 26, 1954¹

The United States Government vigorously protests the wrongful action of the Chinese Communist authorities in sentencing on November 23rd eleven members of the United States Armed Forces and two American civilians employed by the Department of the Army to terms of imprisonment on political charges which are without foundation.² These Americans were in planes which were attacked over the recognized combat zone in Korea, or over international waters, in the course of the Chinese Communist aggression against Korea. Their detention is in patent violation of the Korean Armistice Agreement.

The sentencing of the members of the United States Armed Forces to penitentiary terms in these circumstances is grossly contrary to the substance and spirit of all recognized international standards as to the protection of prisoners of war. The maltreatment of the two civilian American citizens, whose names were willfully and deceitfully withheld by the Chinese Communist representatives at Geneva last June from the list of American civilians held in Chinese Communist jails, is equally reprehensible.

The United States Government calls upon the Chinese Communist authorities to release these unjustly detained American nationals forthwith, in accordance with the provisions of the Korean Armistice Agreement and in conformity with the elementary precepts of justice and humanity.

The Chinese Communist authorities are under an obligation to redress in so far as possible the wrong they have inflicted on these American nationals and their families. The United States Government reserves the right to claim compensation as may be determined appropriate, and to demand the punishment of the Chinese Communist officials responsible for the denial of the rights of these persons.

The Chinese Communist authorities should bear in mind that the long list of Chinese Communist outrages against American nationals, which the American people have borne with restraint thus far, is significantly extended by the Chinese Communist announcement of November 23rd.

102. COMMUNIST DETENTION OF UNITED NATIONS PERSONNEL: Letter and Explanatory Memorandum From the United States Representative at the United Nations¹ to the U.N. Secretary-General, December 4, 1954²

The Government of the United States of America, as the Unified Command of United Nations forces in Korea, proposes herewith the inclusion of the following additional item in the agenda of the ninth regular session of the General Assembly:

Pursuant to rule 20 of the rules of procedure, an explanatory memorandum is attached.

In view of the urgency and importance of this item, I request that a meeting of the General Committee be convened at the earliest possible moment.

EXPLANATORY MEMORANDUM

COMPLAINT OF DETENTION AND IMPRISONMENT OF UNITED NATIONS MILITARY PERSONNEL IN VIOLATION OF THE KOREAN ARMISTICE AGREEMENT

A United States Air Force B-29 type aircraft, on a mission of the United Nations Command in Korea, was attacked fifteen miles south of the Yalu River near the North Korean town of Sonchon and shot down on 12 January 1953. The officers and men of the United States Air Force on the plane were captured. More than a year and a half later, and long after the conclusion of the Korean Armistice Agreement providing for the release of all captured personnel desir-repatriation, eleven officers and men from the above-mentioned craft were brought before a Chinese Communist military tribunal and sentenced to long terms of imprisonment.

This is a clear-cut violation of the Armistice Agreement.

The United States Government first learned of this action by the Chinese Communist authorities through a broadcast of the Peking Radio on 24 November 1954. Immediately thereafter, the United States Government sought to communicate with the Chinese Communist authorities, both directly in Geneva and through the United Kingdom Government, to protest this serious violation of the Korean Armistice Agreement. The Chinese Communist authorities rejected these representations.

The Government and people of the United States are shocked and enraged by the treatment thus accorded to its airmen who were giving the cause of peace under the Charter, and hold these same feelings for the men of other nations who are held prisoner. The Governments of other nations having troops in Korea share this feeling of indignation at this violation of the Armistice Agreement.

The United States believes this conduct of the Chinese Communist authorities has created a serious situation for the United Nations, which called for the action in Korea to repel Communist aggression, and which requested the United States to provide a Unified Command of United Nations forces in Korea. The United States believes the United Nations must now act promptly and decisively to bring about the release of these eleven officers and men and all other captured personnel of the United Nations Command still detained.

3. COMMUNIST DETENTION OF UNITED NATIONS PERSONNEL: Resolution 906 (IX) of the United Nations General Assembly, December 10, 1954¹

The General Assembly,

Having considered the item proposed by the United States of America as the Unified Command regarding eleven members of the United States armed forces under the United Nations Command captured by Chinese forces when undertaking a mission on 12 January 1953, at the direction of the United Nations Command.

Recalling the provisions of article III of the Korean Armistice Agreement regarding the repatriation of prisoners of war,

1. Declares that the detention and imprisonment of the eleven American airmen, members of the United Nations Command, referred to in document A/2830,² and the detention of all other captured personnel of the United Nations Command desiring repatriation is a violation of the Korean Armistice Agreement;

2. Condemns, as contrary to the Korean Armistice Agreement, the trial and conviction of prisoners of war illegally detained after 25 September 1953;

3. Requests the Secretary-General, in the name of the United Nations, to seek the release, in accordance with the Korean Armistice Agreement, of these eleven United Nations Command personnel, and all other captured personnel of the United Nations Command still detained;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to make, by the means most appropriate in his judgment, continuing and unremitting efforts to this end and to report progress to all Members on or before 31 December 1954.¹

104. COMMUNIST DETENTION OF UNITED NATIONS PERSONNEL: Statement by the Department of State, January 19, 1955²

Secretary Dulles, Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr., and Assistant Secretary Walter S. Robertson met with the U.N. Secretary-General, Dag Hammarskjold, and U.N. Under Secretary Ahmed S. Bokhari on January 19. They conferred for about an hour and a half. Mr. Hammarskjold gave Secretary Dulles a detailed report of the conversations that he had had in Peiping in pursuance of his mandate from the United Nations³ to make continuing and unremitting efforts to effect the release of captured personnel of the U.N. Command detained by the Chinese Communist regime in violation of the terms of the Korean Armistice.

The Secretary-General gave a full account of the information and views that had been exchanged at Peiping on the question of the U.N. Command prisoners and expressed the hope that, given restraint on all sides, it would be possible to effect their release. In the meantime he had made inquiries and received assurances regarding the well-being of the prisoners, and he has transmitted this information to the Secretary of State. This will be transmitted in turn to the families by the U.S. Defense Department.

Secretary Dulles expressed, on behalf of the President and himself, their appreciation of the painstaking efforts which had been made and their hope that the United Nations would persist effectively in the course upon which it had embarked pursuant to the U.N. General Assembly resolution of last December. Secretary Dulles pointed out that there was in the United States a strong sentiment in favor of direct action but that it was the policy of the President for the time being to leave the handling of this matter, insofar as it was covered by the U.N. resolution, to the United Nations itself and to abstain

105. COMMUNIST DETENTION OF UNITED NATIONS PERSONNEL: Statement by the Department of State, January 21, 1955¹

The Secretary-General of the United Nations was informed during his Peiping discussions that Chinese Communist authorities might permit relatives to visit those United States personnel who had been convicted and those whose cases were under investigation and that they would provide them the necessary entry visas. This morning the Chinese Communists made this announcement.

The United States Government cannot, of course, in good conscience encourage those who may wish to go into an area where the normal protections of an American passport cannot be offered. World public opinion will judge the motives of those who, having it in their power and being under an obligation to end promptly the tragic grief they have caused, now visit upon the families of these imprisoned Americans a harrowing dilemma. It is by releasing those they hold that the Chinese Communists can convincingly show concern for the human sufferings they have caused.

106. NEGOTIATIONS FOR RELEASE OF UNITED NATIONS PERSONNEL DETAINED BY THE COMMUNISTS: Report of the U.N. Secretary-General, September 9, 1955²

1. The General Assembly, by resolution 906 (IX) of 10 December 1954,³ requested the Secretary-General to seek the release, in accordance with the Korean Armistice Agreement, of eleven United Nations Command personnel and all other captured personnel of the United Nations Command⁴ still detained. It further requested the Secretary-General to make, by the means most appropriate in his judgment, continuing and unremitting efforts to this end and to report progress to all Members on or before 31 December 1954.

⁴ In the debate on this resolution attention was drawn to four jet pilots, serving under the United Nations Command, who were known to be detained in China. [Footnote in the original document.]

2. On 31 December 1954,¹ I submitted a report informing Members that, following an exchange of communications with the Prime Minister of the State Council and Minister for Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China and a meeting in Stockholm with General Keng Piao, Ambassador of the People's Republic of China, arrangements were made for the Secretary-General to visit Peking.

3. As stated in my annual report to the General Assembly on the work of the Organization,² my visit to Peking was made necessary because of the need to establish a direct contact with the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China, since this Government was not represented in any organs of the United Nations. The visit, aimed primarily at clarifying the substantive and legal aspects of the matter, established this direct contact on a personal basis. It thus provided possibilities to pursue the discussion concerning the problem raised by the detention of the United Nations personnel referred to in the General Assembly resolution.

4. After my return from Peking I continued, within the framework of the contact thus established, an exchange of views with Mr. Chou En-lai, Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China. The contact was maintained mainly through a series of communications transmitted by the Swedish Embassy in Peking. I received valuable assistance also from representatives of the Governments of other Member States.

5. A renewed personal contact with a representative of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China, Ambassador Keng Piao, was made by me in Stockholm on 23 April 1955.

6. By a letter to me, given to the Swedish Ambassador in Peking in the early afternoon of 29 May 1955 (New York time), Mr. Chou En-lai announced that an investigation of the cases of four detained fliers had been completed and that it had been decided that they should be deported immediately from the territory of the People's Republic of China. The four men arrived in Hong Kong on 31 May 1955.³

7. By an oral message to me, given to the Swedish Ambassador in Peking at 1 o'clock in the morning, 1 August 1955 (New York time), and transmitted by him, Mr. Chou En-lai announced that the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China had decided to release as soon as feasible the eleven American fliers who had been detained and imprisoned, and that an announcement to that effect would be made in Peking at 10 a. m. on 1 August 1955 (New York time). The eleven men arrived in Hong Kong on 4 August 1955.⁴

8. Mr. Chou En-lai has expressed his hope that the contact established will be continued. In reply I have stated that this hope is shared by me.

. OPERATION OF THE KOREAN ARMISTICE MACHINERY, 1953-1955

07. COMMUNIST OBSTRUCTION OF INSPECTION ACTIVITIES IN KOREA: Letter From the Senior United Nations Representative on the Military Armistice Commission¹ to the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission, April 15, 1954²

1. For investigation of violations of the Armistice Agreement by the KPA/CPV [Korean People's Army/Chinese People's Volunteers]³ side, during the period 29 November 1953 to 9 February 1954, the following facts are presented for your immediate consideration.

2. On 29 November 1953, after the KPA/CPV in a meeting of the MAC [Military Armistice Commission] refused to submit a joint letter to the NNSC [Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission], the UNC [United Nations Command] unilaterally requested the NNSC to investigate the case of three soldiers apprehended by the UNC on 19 November 1953 in the Joint Security Area. These three soldiers were identified beyond question to be former soldiers of the ROKA [Republic of Korea Army]. The place and date of their capture by the KPA/CPV was firmly established. Although ample evidence was available to verify the fact that these persons were impressed into the KPA/CPV military units, and were retained after 24 September 1953, a clear violation of paragraph 51 of the Armistice Agreement by the KPA/CPV, the Czech and Polish members of the NNSC refused to participate in any proceedings for the consideration of this critical matter as a violation of the Armistice Agreement.

3. On 18 December 1953, after the KPA/CPV in another meeting of the MAC again refused to submit a joint letter to the NNSC, the UNC unilaterally, and for the second time, requested the NNSC to investigate the case of two individuals apprehended by the UNC, south of the Southern boundary of the Demilitarized Zone on 10 December 1953. These individuals, as in the case of the three ROKA persons previously cited, were also identified beyond question to be former soldiers of the ROKA who had been impressed into the KPA/CPV military units. Their retention after 24 September 1953 constituted a second clear violation of paragraph 51 of the Armistice Agreement by the KPA/CPV. For the second time, the NNSC failed to take any action on a unilateral request from the Senior Member of a side as authorized in paragraphs 28 and 42F of the Armistice Agreement. For the second time, the Czech and Polish members of the NNSC refused to participate in the performance of their solemn obligation under the terms of the Armistice Agreement.

4. On 18 January 1954, and again on 26 January 1954, the UNC submitted separate unilateral requests to the NNSC to investigate specific military units of the several ROKA persons, who had been impressed into the military service of the KPA/CPV, in order to ascertain whether these and other individuals had also been forcibly detained in the territory under the military control of the KPA/CPV. For the third and fourth time, respectively, the Czech and Polish members of the NNSC again refused to cooperate in the investigation of KPA/CPV violations of the Armistice Agreement. The arguments presented by the members gave every indication of being mere excuses to prevent the NNSC from confirming KPA/CPV violations of the Armistice Agreement in the territory under the military control of the KPA and the CPV. Particularly significant, however, was the fact that the responses of the Polish and Czech members as evidenced by an examination of the minutes of the 89th and 96th meetings of the NNSC, conformed to and appeared to be unduly influenced by the contents of two prior letters of 19 January and 27 January, issued by the Senior Member of the KPA and CPV, MAC, as his reply to the UNC unilateral requests submitted to the NNSC on 18 January and 26 January, respectively. Substantiation of such influence is found in the following remark made by the Polish member and confirmed by the Czech member, at the 96th meeting of the NNSC:

The Polish Delegation also deems it its duty to declare that for the above stated reasons it will not agree—either now or in the future—to a request of one of the sides to conduct any investigation in connection with the issue of retention of the captured personnel of the other side—until settlement or understanding is reached on the matter by the two opposing sides or by the forthcoming political conference.

Such a decision by the Czech and Polish members is considered by the UNC to render the NNSC ineffective for future investigation of any Armistice violations relating to captured ROKA personnel impressed into KPA and CPV military units.

5. Finally, on 9 February, 1954, the UNC unilaterally requested the NNSC to investigate the illegal introduction of combat material into the territory under the military control of the KPA and the CPV, in violation of the Armistice Agreement. Names of places and exact locations were included in this request of the UNC. Before the NNSC had officially announced its decision regarding the UNC request, the Senior Member of the KPA and CPV, MAC, addressed a letter to the Senior Member of the UNC, MAC, denying all the facts presented. Concurrently he forwarded an almost identical letter to the NNSC. The influence that this letter had on the proceedings of the NNSC cannot be discounted.

6. In attempting to veil these KPA and CPV violations, the Senior Member of the KPA and CPV, MAC, charged the UNC with violations of the Armistice Agreement, with no foundation in fact. In addition to labeling the UNC charges slanderous fabrication, the Senior Member of the KPA and CPV, MAC, attempted to offset the UNC requests for investigation of violations by submitting unfounded charges against the UNC. In a letter dated 23 Feb. 1954, the NNSC indicated its inability to carry out its pledged obligations with regard to the UNC requests of 9 February 1954. This letter was received on 19 March 1954. This was the fifth time that the Czech and Polish members of the NNSC refused to participate in the performance of their duties as members of the NNSC, in accordance with the provisions of the Armistice Agreement.

7. Reliable information available to the UNC shows that the KPA and CPV have introduced operating combat aircraft into the territory under the military control of the KPA and the CPV, and are introducing combat equipment in such a manner as to by-pass and evade the NNITs [Neutral Nations Inspection Teams] at the ports of entry in the territory under the military control of the KPA and the CPV, all of which acts are deliberate violations of the Armistice Agreement. Although the Senior Member of the UNC, MAC, has requested that investigation of these violations be accomplished by the NNSC, the Senior Member of the KPA and CPV, MAC, has stated that no such inspection could ever be permitted since the KPA and CPV have not violated the agreement. The Senior Member of the KPA and CPV, MAC, as the representative of his commanders, has clearly violated that portion of para 17 of the Armistice Agreement which states:

The Commanders of the opposing sides shall establish within their respective commands all measures and procedures necessary to insure complete compliance with all of the provisions hereof by all elements of their commands. They shall actively cooperate with one another and with the Military Armistice Commission and the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission in requiring observance of both the letter and the spirit of all of the provisions of this Armistice Agreement.

8. The UNC has made every effort to facilitate the operations of the NNSC in the territory under the military control of the UNC and has in good faith complied with the letter and spirit of the Armistice Agreement. The NNITs have been given maximum freedom to inspect incoming and outgoing equipment according to the agreement. The NNITs have been given access to documents listing combat materiel and military personnel introduced into and evacuated from the territory under the military control of the UNC. With the aid of these documents they have been able to accomplish their supervisory duties quickly and efficiently. At airfields the teams received information on all arrivals and departures of aircraft including approximate flight appointment times, type of aircraft, and flight numbers. The teams have been allowed to board cargo aircraft to accomplish their inspections and inspections have been carried out daily. The UNC has always willingly and freely complied with requests of the NNITs for additional information. The UNC, in its desire to carry out both the spirit and letter of the Armistice Agreement, has allowed the above mentioned freedom to the NNITs in spite of the fact that it has been obvious from the first that the Polish and Czech members of the NNITs have been utilizing this very freedom for the purpose of taking advantage of administrative errors and technical discrepancies to charge the UNC with deliberate efforts to violate the Armistice Agreement. If the UNC had intended to violate the Armistice Agreement it would have followed the system used in the territory under the military control of the KPA and CPV. In that territory the NNITs have been so restricted and handicapped by the established procedures that they have been unable to report or investigate any possible violations of the Armistice. Since the Czech and Polish members of the NNSC have subscribed to and supported the views of the Senior Member, KPA and CPV, MAC, before making proper investigations of violations to the Armistice Agreement, as requested by the Senior Member of the UNC, MAC, it appears clear that the NNSC has been paralyzed to such a degree that it cannot carry out its pledged obligations as outlined under the terms of the Armistice Agreement. The acceptance of the KPA and CPV views of the letters of 19 January, 27 January, and 12 February, respectively, by the members from Poland and Czechoslovakia, without consideration of the evidence submitted by the UNC, serves to prevent other investigations for substantiated charges of violations of the Armistice Agreement committed by the KPA and CPV.

9. It is obvious that the exercise of the full responsibilities of the NNSC is confined to the area of the UNC. In the territory under the military control of the KPA and the CPV, the NNSC has been unable to conduct investigations as provided for in the Armistice Agreement. The Czech and Polish members of the NNSC, and the Senior Member of the KPA and the CPV, MAC, have obstructed the work of the NNSC to date, and their recent statements appear to preclude the NNSC from ever performing all of its pledged obligations in the future. In view of the outright repudiation by the KPA and CPV of this portion of the Armistice Agreement, and the inability of the NNSC to carry out the obligations charged to it by the same agreement, the UNC considers that its rights as a signatory to the Armistice Agreement have been denied it. There is to date no indication that the NNSC either can or will fulfill, in the area under the military control of the KPA and CPV, the full obligations which its members undertook by accepting office on the NNSC. Neither has the NNSC acknowledged the fact that in prohibiting inspections lawfully requested by the UNC the KPA and CPV have in effect unilaterally abrogated that part of the Armistice Agreement applicable to the functions of the NNSC in the territory under the military control of the KPA and CPV.

108. REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF VIOLATIONS OF THE KOREAN ARMISTICE AGREEMENT: Letter From the Representative of the United Nations Command on the Military Armistice Commission to the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission, February 21, 1955¹

1. The United Nations Command charges that the Korean Peoples Army and Chinese Peoples Volunteers have between the dates of 27 July 1953 and 5 February 1955 introduced into the territory under the military control of their side combat aircraft of the MIG type, arms, and ammunition therefor, in excess of combat aircraft of the MIG type, arms, and ammunition therefor in the territory under the military control of the Korean Peoples Army and Chinese Peoples Volunteers side on 27 July 1953, and have failed to report them in the prescribed manner and form to the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission, in violation of paragraph 13d and other provisions of the Armistice Agreement. Furthermore, the United Nations Command reports and charges that the above indicated violations occurred at the air installations at: 40° 09' North, 124° 30' East in the vicinity of Ujiu, 39° 57' North, 125° 13' East in the vicinity of Namsi, 39° 54' North, 125° 30' East in the vicinity of Taechon, 39° 01' North, 125° 50' East in the vicinity of Pyongyang East (Mirim-Ni), 39° 12' North, 125° 40' East in the vicinity of Sunan, 39° 24' North, 125° 55' East in the vicinity of Pyong-Ni, all in the territory under the military control of the Korean Peoples Army and Chinese Peoples Volunteers side.

2. Therefore in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 28 of the Armistice Agreement, I, as Senior Member of the United Nations Command component of the Military Armistice Commission, request that the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission dispatch three mobile Neutral Nations inspection teams to the places indicated above, outside the demilitarized zone, to conduct special observations and inspections under the provisions of paragraphs 41, 42c and 42f of the Armistice Agreement of the illegal introduction of combat aircraft of the MIG type, arms, and ammunition therefor by the Korean Peoples Army and Chinese Peoples Volunteers into the territory under their military control, between the dates 27 July 1953 and 5 February 1955, in excess of those items which were in the territory under the military control of the Korean Peoples Army and Chinese Peoples Volunteers on 27 July 1953 in violation of paragraph 13d of the Armistice Agreement, and a failure to report the same to the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission in accordance with the requirements of the Armistice Agreement.

3. The United Nations Command is prepared to present photographs and other evidence in support of the above indicated charges.

109. TERMINATION OF THE ACTIVITIES OF THE NEUTRAL NATIONS SUPERVISORY COMMISSION: Aide-Mémoire From the Department of State to the Swedish Embassy at Washington, March 2, 1955¹

Reference is made to the Aide-Mémoire of the Embassy of Sweden (Legation of Switzerland) of January 27, 1955² concerning the desire of the Swedish (Swiss) Government that consideration be given to the termination of the activities of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission, or, failing that, to agreement by the signatories to the Korean Armistice Agreement to a solution comprising a sizeable reduction of the personnel of the four delegations to the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission. In replying to these proposals, this Government has consulted with its Allies whose forces fought under the United Nations Command to repel the Communist aggression.

The Government of the United States appreciates the difficulties Sweden (Switzerland) is encountering in carrying out a task which the Swedish (Swiss) Government had undertaken on the understanding that the Commission would last for only a limited time. Furthermore, it is aware that obstructionist activities on the part of the Communist side have made it impossible for the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission to fulfill its responsibilities under the Armistice Agreement. The Government of the United States, therefore, agrees with the Government of Sweden (Switzerland) that the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission should be abolished.

It is understood, however, that the Chinese Communist reply to the Swedish Aide-Mémoire rejects the liquidation of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission which is the solution preferred by the Government of Sweden (Switzerland), but accepts in concept the less preferred alternative of a reduction in the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission personnel. Despite the current activities undertaken by the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission at the request of either the United Nations Command side or the Communist side, it is the view of the Government of the United States, primarily because of the consistent history of Communist obstruction, that it is doubtful that any useful purpose would be served by a continuation of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission.

The Government of the United States expresses the hope that the Government of Sweden (Switzerland) will conduct its further consultations on the problem on an urgent basis and awaits with interest the results of such consultation.

110. COMMUNIST VIOLATIONS OF THE KOREAN ARMISTICE AGREEMENT: Statement by the Senior United Nations Command Representative on the Military Armistice Commission,¹ July 5, 1955²

A concept basic to the establishment and maintenance of the Armistice in Korea was that the balance which existed between the military forces of the opposing sides on July 27, 1953, would not be altered thereafter by the opposing commanders through the introduction of reinforcing military personnel or combat materiel. Provisions for implementing this basic concept were clearly spelled out in detail in paragraph 13 of the Armistice Agreement.

Shortly after the signing of the Armistice it became apparent to the United Nations Command that the Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers were resorting to every possible ruse to avoid compliance with the provisions of paragraphs 13 (c) and (d) of the Armistice Agreement. Whereas the United Nations Command submitted its first combat materiel and personnel report prescribed in paragraphs 13 (c) and (d) of the Armistice Agreement on 28 July 1953, the day following the signing of the Armistice, it was not until 12 September 1953 that your side submitted its first report of rotation personnel and not until 6 October 1953 that you submitted your first combat materiel report. Your first personnel report dated 12 September 1953 instead of reflecting actual arrivals and departures merely listed 964 departures and no arrivals for the 7-week period of 15-16 September 1953. Apparently you would have the United Nations Command and Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission believe that from 28 July to 15 September, with a military force exceeding 1,200,000 men, the majority of whom came from Red China, not one soldier arrived or left Korea during that 7-week period. Your first combat materiel report of 6 October 1953 reflected an outgoing shipment of four 57 mm. anti-tank guns with 20 rounds of ammunition, and it was not until 9 February 1954 that you submitted your first legitimate combat materiel report reflecting an incoming shipment—covering one 37 mm. AA gun. Again, you would apparently have us believe that you could logistically support your large military force in war-torn and ravaged North Korea for the entire first 6 months of the Armistice without a single incoming shipment.

That the United Nations Command has continued scrupulously to comply with provisions of 13 (c) and (d) is reflected in the following figures taken from the official records covering the first year of the Armistice. From 27 July 1953, to 31 July 1954, the United Nations Command submitted 370 personnel reports covering 287,343 permanent arrivals and 362,122 departures. During this same period the Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers side submitted only 42 reports covering the ridiculous figures of 12,748 permanent arrivals and 31,201 departures.

The United Nations Command during this period submitted 1,057 combat materiel reports covering the movement of 9,717 combat aircraft, 1,034 armored vehicles, 194,385 weapons, and 386,828,087 rounds of ammunition.

The Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteer side, on the other hand, submitted only 24 combat materiel reports covering the movement of zero combat aircraft, 14 armored vehicles, 848 weapons, and 746,500 rounds of ammunition.

The United Nations Command established a system and procedures to insure that all incoming and outgoing combat materiel and personnel were shipped only through designated ports of entry and took necessary measures to facilitate free and open inspections of these shipments by the Neutral Nations inspection teams. The Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers, on the other hand, established no such system or procedures, failed to use your designated ports of entry, and resorted to every conceivable pretext to circumvent the provisions of 13 (c) and (d). Attempts by the Swiss and Swedish members of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission to carry out their functions of inspection and observation were effectively blocked by the Czechs and Poles.

RELATIVE MERITS OF INSPECTION SYSTEMS

The relative merits of the inspection system established in the South as compared with that established in the North was the subject of considerable discussion and deliberation by the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission.

In the 107th plenary session of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission on 23 February 1954, General Wacker, the Senior Swiss Member, made these observations:

In the South, rotation takes place every day and every hour in all ports of entry with the exception of one, whereas in the North some spare parts are shipped out once a month through one or two ports of entry and then introduced again a few weeks after. I have never heard anything about rotation of aircraft, armored vehicles, or even complete weapons and ammunition in the North. I think we have the right to ask ourselves how it is possible that an army counting several one hundred thousand soldiers can be logistically supported by the amount of material as shown by the figures which are being submitted to us. . . . in the South the teams control . . . all material being brought into Korea—a control which is being carried out, thanks to documents submitted by the local authorities (load manifests, ship manifests) as well as by means of inspections on the spot. I emphasize the fact that in the South these documents and inspections concern non-combat material as well as combat material. In contrast to this, we find that in the North not more than two to four inspections of spare parts of war material have been carried out every month only in the ports of entry of Sinuiju and Manpo.

General Mohn, the Senior Swedish Member of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission, observed that, Gradually the teams in the South secured an insight in the movements of all cargo in their respective ports of entry. The Polish and Czechoslovakian members of the teams were only too eager to inspect all sorts of goods which did not even remotely have any connection with combat material. They were not in the slightest embarrassed by the restrictive interpretation of the armistice agreement apparently held by their principals in Panmunjom. . . . Well, what happened in the North? As we all know, the teams in North Korea had to wait an unusually long time before they found anything to put their teeth in. They wandered about aimlessly in their ports of entry, not knowing exactly what to do.

The airfield situation that existed in the territory under your control at the time the Armistice Agreement was signed is well known by your side as well as ours. All airfields under the control of the Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers had been under continuous attack and were inoperative. Photographs taken by the United Nations Command on 27 July 1953 prove that on that date the Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers had no Air Force and not one usable airfield. Our side has presented these official photographs to the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission and the evidence disclosed by them has never been challenged or refuted.

Within a few months after the Armistice Agreement was signed our air surveillance detected continuously increasing jet aircraft activity in the territory occupied by the Korean People's Army and Chinese People's Volunteers side. Such radar detection was irrefutable proof of your violation of paragraph 13 (d). On 21 September 1953 this evidence was further confirmed when a pilot of a MIG-15 aircraft, Lieutenant Ro Kum Suk, a Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers pilot officer who deserted from the Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers side, was observed at a Republic of Korea airport and surrendered a MIG-15 combat aircraft which had been illegally introduced into Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers territory in defiance of paragraph 13 (d) of the Armistice Agreement. This pilot furnished irrefutable proof that from 27 July 1953 until 21 September 1953 he was engaged in the air movement of MIG-15 aircraft. These combat planes were introduced into the territory under the military control of your side subsequent to the signing of the Armistice Agreement and in direct and willful violation thereof. This pilot had previously observed at least 80 combat aircraft that were brought into the territory of your side contrary to paragraph 13 (d).

ISSUES OF OFFICIAL PROTESTS

Confronted by this serious development and possessed with irrefutable evidence, the United Nations Command, on 12 October 1953, lodged its first official protest against the Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers for violating the provisions of paragraph 13 (d) of the Armistice Agreement by the illegal introduction of aircraft into the territory under your control. The United Nations Command requested the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission to conduct an investigation on an airfield near Uiju, where such aircraft were definitely known to be located. Despite the attempts of the Czech and Pole members on the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission to forestall this investigation, the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission finally agreed to dispatch a mobile inspection team, but due to collusion between the Czech and Pole members of the mobile inspection team with the Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers military representatives at the scene of investigation, you were successful in thwarting any realistic investigation. Documents requested by the Swiss and Swede members of the team were refused on grounds that they were secret, requests by the Swiss and Swede members to conduct inspections at the railroad station and other shipping points around the Uiju airfield were denied, and visual observations of the Uiju airfield were carefully restricted and controlled to insure that the team would observe no incriminating evidence.

Based upon new and additional evidence of your continued secret aircraft build-up, on 9 February 1954, the United Nations Command lodged its second official protest against your illegal introduction of combat aircraft.¹ A letter was dispatched to the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission outlining our charges and requesting that the Department of State Bulletin, Mar. 14, 1955, pp. 427-428.

mobile inspection teams be dispatched to conduct special observations, inspections, and investigations at the following airfields: Pyong-Ni, Taechon, Pyongyang East, Uiju, Pyongyang Main, Sinuiju Northeast, Wonsan, Saamcham, and Sunan, as well as road and rail by-passes in the vicinity of the ports of entry of Sinuiju, Chongjin and Manpo.

Although the Swiss and Swedish members of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission were in favor of dispatching the requested mobile inspection teams, the action was blocked by the veto power of your Polish and Czech comrades, and the investigation was thereby prevented. Previously, General Bures, Czechoslovak, on 29 January 1954, had summed up the attitudes always taken by the Czech and Polish members in regard to United Nations Command requests for investigations when he said, "All accusations against the Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers side are nothing but groundless fabrications. . . ." Later, 10 February 1954, Colonel Bibrowski, Polish member, in speaking of a United Nations Command request for a mobile inspection team, states, "The Polish delegation cannot agree to consider such a request and in no case is it ready to comply with it."

From the actions of your side and the actions of your unneutral Czech and Pole representation in the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission on this and the previous United Nations Command protest it became obvious that any realistic neutral inspection of your illegal activities was virtually impossible. Although the United Nations Command was cognizant throughout the following year of your continued illegal Air Force build-up, it was not until you overtly employed your illegally amassed air power on 5 February 1955 by making an unprovoked attack against United Nations Command aircraft on a routine training mission over international waters that the United Nations Command lodged another protest against your side.¹

In the Military Armistice Commission negotiations on this incident you inadvertently admitted that your own MIG aircraft participated in this air battle. This admission constituted conclusive corroboration of your illegal introduction of combat aircraft, of not making the proper combat materiel reports and of by-passing the designated ports of entry, all in violation of the Armistice Agreement.

The third official protest against your illegal introduction of combat materiel was therefore made by the United Nations Command on 21 February 1955. Again the complaint was spelled out in detail.

The United Nations Command charges that the Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers have between the dates of 27 July 1953 and 5 February 1955 introduced into the territory under the military control of their side combat aircraft of the MIG type, arms, and ammunition therefor, in excess of combat aircraft of the MIG type, arms, and ammunition therefor in the territory under the military control of the Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers side on 27 July 1953, and have failed to report them in the prescribed manner and form to the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission, in violation of paragraph 13 (d) and other provisions of the Armistice Agreement.

Again the United Nations Command requested a mobile inspection team investigation of six airfields where your illegally introduced MIG aircraft were known to be based. Again your Czech and Pole cohorts on the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission ably represented your side and successfully stalled the dispatch of the mobile inspection teams for one week, enabling you to fly your MIG's away from the bases to be investigated and otherwise remove or hide incriminating evidence. That most of your MIG's were flown out was irrefutably established by our radar surveillance. When the mobile inspection teams reached your airfields, every effort of the Swiss and Swede members to make full and impartial investigations was thwarted by the Czech and Polish members, just as they had thwarted the investigation of Uiju in October 1953. Although the official reports submitted by these teams reveal that at least 88 MIG's were observed on those fields, the Czechs and Poles vetoed requests by the Swiss and Swedes for available documents which could have established the dates when those aircraft were brought into the territory under your control. It is significant to note that these documents were the same type documents that were freely offered by the United Nations Command side to mobile inspection teams operating in the South.

On 10 May 1955 again your illegally introduced aircraft made an unprovoked attack against United Nations Command aircraft on a routine training mission over international waters. On 13 May 1955 the United Nations Command lodged a strong letter of protest against the Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers for this hostile act¹ and for the fourth time charged your side with illegally introducing combat aircraft in violation of the Armistice Agreement.

An analysis of the official reports submitted by the United Nations Command and the Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers covering combat materiel shipments for the period 28 July 1953 to 31 May 1955, reflects the following:

The United Nations Command has submitted 1,969 combat materiel reports, covering movement of 16,141 combat aircraft, 2,492 armored vehicles, 447,803 weapons, and 608,386,231 rounds of ammunition.

The Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers has submitted 162 combat materiel reports, covering the movement of zero combat aircraft, 245 armored vehicles, 144,808 weapons, and 50,674,619 rounds of ammunition. I repeat, in the first 22 months of the Armistice, despite the fact that you have twice openly employed your illegally acquired combat aircraft in large numbers in hostile and unwarranted attacks against the United Nations Command, your side has not yet submitted the report covering the movement of combat aircraft in or out of Korea.

EVIDENCE PROVIDED BY DEFECTORS

fecting from your side and leaving Pyongyang Main airfield, landed at Seoul airbase and surrendered a YAK-18 aircraft to our side. These men have also surrendered themselves and have asked for asylum from the tyranny and abuse they suffered under your control. This has been granted. Moreover, they have offered to make their full contribution toward the defeat of your iniquitous conspiracy.

Your side will recognize their names. They are men who have held positions of high trust and responsibility in your forces. Senior Lieutenant Lee, the pilot, had served 8 years and 6 months in your armed forces. He graduated from the Air Academy in Chkalov, U. S. S. R., and the Air Officers' School in Yenchi, Manchuria. Your side has rewarded him with the 3d Class Order of the National Flag Medal, 2d Class Order of the National Flag Medal, 2d Class Freedom and Independence Medal, Air Merit Medal. Senior Lieutenant Lee was a member of the Korean People's Armed Forces Air Force, 858th Independent Night-Bomber Regiment.

Junior Lieutenant Lee In Son has served in your forces for 4 years and 9 months. His services have been rewarded by the presentation of the Merit Medal. He was a member of the Korean People's Armed Forces Air Force, 858th Independent Night-Bomber Regiment.

Senior Lieutenant Lee, the pilot of the YAK-18 aircraft, was stationed at Pyongyang Main airfield from July 1953 until September 1954 and again from February 1955 until 21 June 1955, the date of his defection. The navigator was at Pyongyang Main from July of 1953 until his defection with Senior Lieutenant Lee on 21 June 1955. Both men had made frequent and regular flights to other principal bases used by your air forces. Consequently both men were well informed on the airfield development in North Korea, and the strength, composition, deployment, and operations of your illegally established Air Force.

I now present you with the evidence provided freely and voluntarily to our side by these two former members of your Air Force:

1. The YAK-18 aircraft which Senior Lieutenant Lee and Junior Lieutenant Lee flew from Pyongyang Main to Seoul on 21 June 1955 bears serial number 8715. The YAK-18 is fitted with one underwing bomb rack under each wing, and each rack is capable of carrying a 100 kilogram bomb. Senior Lieutenant Lee stated that while stationed at Antung, Manchuria, he flew aircraft of this type in night bombing combat operations from October 1951, to March 1952, and that he has flown 600 hours in this type of aircraft, of which 200 hours were in combat. The YAK-18 in which the defectors came to Seoul is a combat aircraft as defined by the Military Armistice Commission; it was brought to Korea in April, 1954, in direct violation of paragraph 13 (d).

2. Although we know, and our photographs taken on 27 July 1953 prove that at the time of the Armistice Agreement there were no airfields in the territory under your command capable of supporting combat aircraft, these defectors have stated that Uiju, Sunan, Sunchon, Pyongyang East (Mirin-Ni) and Onkong-Ni, have been restored to full operation and are supporting combat aircraft. Our our tracks have verified the flying activity at these fields. The defectors also stated that more fields are being built to support the flying strength of the Korean People's Armed Forces Air Force. This is further evidence of your expanding Air Force strength.

The two defectors were stationed at Pyongyang in March, 1955 during the period mobile inspection teams 6, 7, and 8 were conducting their investigations. Senior Lieutenant Lee and Junior Lieutenant provided specific information on steps your side took to remove, disguise and conceal incriminating evidence during the mobile inspection team investigations. Among the ruses employed by your side are the following:

1. Your side flew many combat aircraft away from the inspected airfields.

2. Your side hid combat aircraft in ravines in the hills in the vicinity of the airfields and camouflaged them.

3. Your side dismantled some of the aircraft and concealed them.

4. Your side stationed heavy guards about the hiding places and prevented inspection of these areas by the mobile inspection teams.

5. Your side arbitrarily reduced the boundaries of the airfields, thereby restricting the scope of the mobile inspection team inspection.

6. Your side prepared false testimony by long, detailed coaching of probable witnesses and by substituting politically indoctrinated lower ranking officers for lower ranking officers by switching insignias.

7. Your side delayed the assembly of newly arrived combat aircraft at Taechon by leaving them in their crates until the mobile inspection team investigations were completed. Senior Lieutenant Lee, who is Russian, noticed the wording "Kiev Aircraft Factory" on tags attached to one of his unit's combat aircraft. This aircraft's log book showed that the plane left the Russian factory in March 1955.

The defectors have also stated that since the signing of the Armistice Agreement the illegal build-up of the Korean People's Armed Forces Air Force has been taking place, so that at the present time there are more than 300 combat aircraft, the majority of which are jet fighters of the MIG-15 type. This has also been confirmed by our radar and by the incidents where our aircraft have been intercepted over international waters by Korean People's Armed Forces Air Force fighters.

The two defectors confirmed the fact that the MIG-15 jet fighters, which attacked United Nations planes over international waters on the 5th of February, 1955, and on the 10th of May, 1955, came from bases in the territory under the military control of your side and that these MIG aircraft belonged to your air forces.

OF CHARGES

The information provided our side by your two most recent defectors merely served to confirm existing evidence and provide another link in the long chain the United Nations Command has constructed to irrefutably prove your illegal Air Force build-up.

I have presented to you today the official record of your continuous and numerous violations of paragraph 13 (d), paragraph 17, and other fundamental provisions of the Armistice Agreement, throughout the Armistice period. It stands as monumental evidence to the United Nations Command and the free world of your complete insincerity, dishonesty, and utter lack of integrity. The combat forces, and particularly the air forces, that you have built up illegally and covertly since the signing of the Armistice, constitute a grave situation which threatens seriously the very structure and stability of the Armistice itself.

The United Nations Command, at this time, lodges the strongest and most serious protest made against your side since the signing of the Armistice and charges that, through your willful, deliberate and illegal build-up of your combat forces, you have:

1. Flagrantly violated every basic provision of the Armistice Agreement, including the spirit and intent of that document.
2. Clearly demonstrated your aggressive intent of acquiring a favorable military position over the forces of the United Nations Command.

The United Nations Command demands that:

1. You provide the United Nations Command, without delay, an accurate accounting of all combat materiel and combat aircraft introduced into the territory of your side since the signing of the Armistice.
2. You immediately provide the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission with corrected combat materiel reports which reflect the mass of combat materiel and hundreds of aircraft you have illegally introduced into Korea.
3. You cease immediately the illegal introduction of additional combat materiel and combat aircraft into the territory of your side.

We have listened since last summer to the soothing music of your peaceful propaganda and your expressions for a free and independent united Korea, while at the same time contending with your continued willful and flagrant violations of the Armistice Agreement, your hostile and aggressive actions, and your murderous and inhumane atrocities. The time has come to demand that the powers who are directing your iniquitous activities start trying to reconcile your Dr. Jekyll with your Mr. Hyde.

AND THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA RESPECTING POLITICAL, ECONOMIC, AND MILITARY MAT-TERS, 1953-1955

111. UNITED STATES POLICY IN KOREA: Letter From the President of the United States to the President of the Republic of Korea,
June 6, 1953¹

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT:

I received on June 2 the cabled text of your communication dated May 30.² I have given it the careful and sympathetic consideration it deserves.

The Republic of Korea has engaged all of its resources, human and material, in a struggle which will go down in history as one of the epic struggles of all time. You have dedicated your all without reservation to the principle that human liberty and national liberty must survive against Communist aggression, which tramples upon human dignity and which replaces national sovereignty with a humiliating satellite status. The principles for which your nation has fought and for which so many of your youth have died are principles which defend free men and free nations everywhere.

The United States has stood with you, and with you we have fought for those principles, as part of the United Nations Command. The blood of your youth and our youth has been poured out on the altar of common sacrifice. Thereby we have demonstrated not only our dedication to the cause of human freedom and political liberty, but also our dedication to an equally important principle which is that there cannot be independence without interdependence, and there cannot be human liberty except as men recognize that they are bound together by ties of common destiny.

The moment has now come when we must decide whether to carry on by warfare a struggle for the unification of Korea or whether to pursue this goal by political and other methods.

The enemy has proposed an armistice which involves a clear abandonment of the fruits of aggression. The armistice would leave the Republic of Korea in undisputed possession of substantially the territory which the Republic administered prior to the aggression, indeed this territory will be somewhat enlarged.

The proposed armistice, true to the principle of political asylum, assures that the thousands of North Koreans and Communist Chinese prisoners in our hands, who have seen liberty and who wish to share it, will have the opportunity to do so and will not be forcibly sent back into Communist areas. The principle of political asylum is one which we could not honorably surrender even though we thereby put an earlier end to our own human and material losses. We have suffered together many thousands of casualties in support of this principle.

It is my profound conviction that under these circumstances acceptance of the armistice is required of the United Nations and the Republic of Korea. We would not be justified in prolonging the war with all the misery that it involves in the hope of achieving, by force, the unification of Korea.

The unification of Korea is an end to which the United States is committed, not once but many times, through its World War II declarations and through its acceptance of the principles enunciated in reference to Korea by the United Nations. Korea is unhappily not the only country which remains divided after World War II. We remain determined to play our part in achieving the political union of all countries so divided. But we do not intend to employ war as an instrument to accomplish the world-wide political settlements to which we are dedicated and which we believe to be just. It was indeed a crime that those who attacked from the North invoked violence to unite Korea under their rule. Not only as your official friend but as a personal friend I urge that your country not embark upon a similar course.

There are three major points I would like to make to you:

1. The United States will not renounce its efforts by all peaceful means to effect the unification of Korea. Also as a member of the United Nations we shall seek to assure that the United Nations continues steadfast in its determination in this respect. In the political conference which will follow an armistice that will be our central objective. The United States intends to consult with your Government both before and during such a conference and expects the full participation of your Government in that conference.

2. You speak of a mutual defense pact. I am prepared promptly after the conclusion and acceptance of an armistice to negotiate with you a mutual defense treaty along the lines of the treaties heretofore made between the United States and the Republic of the Philippines, and the United States and Australia and New Zealand.¹ You may recall that both of these treaties speak of "the development of a more comprehensive system of regional security in the Pacific area." A security pact between the United States and the Republic of Korea would be a further step in that direction. It would cover the territory now or hereafter brought peacefully under the administration of the ROK. Of course you realize that under our constitutional system, any such treaty would be made only with the advice and consent of the Senate. However, the action which the United States has heretofore taken, and the great investment of blood and treasure which has already been made for the independence of Korea are certainly clear indications of American temper and intentions not to tolerate a repetition of unprovoked aggression.

3. The United States Government, subject to requisite Congress-

sional appropriations, will be prepared to continue economic aid to the Republic of Korea which will permit in peace a restoration of its devastated land. Homes must be rebuilt. Industries must be reestablished. Agriculture must be made vigorously productive.

The preamble of the Constitution of the United States states the goals of our people, which I believe are equally the goals of the brave people of Korea, namely "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty." Manifestly, not all of these conditions now prevail in Korea. Moreover, in existing circumstances they cannot be achieved either by prolongation of the present conflict or by reckless adventure with a new one. Only by peaceful means can these things be achieved.

With the conclusion of an armistice the United States is prepared to join with the Republic of Korea to seek for Korea these ends. We believe that in Korea there should be a more perfect union and, as I say, we shall seek to achieve that union by all peaceful methods. We believe that there should be domestic tranquillity and that can come from the end of fighting. There should be provision for the defense of Korea. That will come from the mutual security treaty which we are prepared to make. The general welfare should be advanced and that will come from your own peacetime efforts and from economic assistance to your war-torn land. Finally, a peaceful settlement will afford the best opportunity to bring to your people the blessings of liberty.

I assure you, Mr. President, that so far as the United States is concerned, it is our desire to go forward in fellowship with the Republic of Korea. Even the thought of a separation at this critical hour would be a tragedy. We must remain united.¹

112. SUMMARY OF A REPORT OF THE PRESIDENT'S SPECIAL REPRESENTATIVE² FOR KOREAN ECONOMIC AFFAIRS, JUNE 15, 1953 (Excerpt)³

Pursuant to a recommendation of the National Security Council, President Eisenhower on April 9, 1953, appointed Henry J. Tasca as special representative of the President for Korean Economic Affairs and requested that he head a mission to investigate ways and means of strengthening the Korean economy.⁴ The President directed that the mission's recommendations include the amounts and types of U.S. assistance desirable in support of the Korean economy; proposals as to the manner in which the United States and the United Nations can best be assured that any resources they may contribute are utilized in the most efficient manner possible; and the formulation of measures to be adopted to insure the coordination of all economic programs in Korea. The results of the mission's investigation are embodied in this report.

The mission arrived in Korea on April 17, 1953, and headquarters were established in Pusan. A series of meetings was held with U.N. Command agencies in Korea, with the U.N. Korean Reconstruction Agency, with each of the Ministries of the Republic of Korea, with the chairmen of National Assembly Committees, and with the Korean Chamber of Commerce. Each of the above prepared extensive material on the Korean economy for consideration by the mission. In addition, the special representative visited most of the important industrial plants and agricultural and mining areas in South Korea including Seoul, the capital.

In developing its plan the mission has examined in detail the economic support requirements of the Korean defense forces and the consumption requirements of the Republic of Korea (Rok) as well as production and investment possibilities and programs in all sectors. The report assumed, in this connection, that an armistice would be negotiated at the beginning of the reconstruction period.

The mission's major recommendations are:

1. The United States should institute a new program of defense support, relief, and reconstruction in Korea, of 4 or 5 years' duration, which it is anticipated will require a substantial amount in external assistance.

2. The new program would not replace the U.N. Korean Reconstruction Agency (UNKRA) program but would be coordinated with it, nor would it replace Civilian Relief in Korea (CRİK), the emergency relief program of the Department of the Army in Korea.

3. Funds for the new program should be sought through the Mutual Security Agency (MSA) or its successor.

4. Consistent with the expanded economic aid program, the Rok Government should initiate certain basic changes in its financial structure, aimed at such goals as balancing the Government budget, establishing and maintaining a uniform exchange rate, strengthening the currency, and making credit controls more effective.

5. Technical and professional skills of the Korean people should be developed as rapidly as possible.

6. A new agreement governing aid from the United States should be negotiated with the Rok Government.

113. REDUCTION OF UNITED STATES FORCES IN KOREA: Statement by the President, December 26, 1953¹

The fighting in Korea was ended by an armistice which has now been in effect for 5 months. We do not need as much ground strength there now as when there was fighting. That is the more true because of the capabilities of ROK [Republic of Korea] forces which were substantially built up during the war. Also our growing national air power possesses greater mobility and greater striking force than ever before.

Accordingly I have directed that the United States ground forces in Korea be progressively reduced as circumstances warrant. As an initial step, two Army divisions will soon be withdrawn and returned to the United States. While the United States is acting in good faith to preserve the armistice and accomplish its purposes, we remain alert to all possibilities. Therefore, I emphasize that the action being taken does not impair our readiness and capacity to react in a way which should deter aggression and, if aggression should nevertheless occur, to oppose it with even greater effect than heretofore.

Recently the United Nations members which had forces in Korea clearly stated that, together, we would be united and prompt to resist any renewal of armed attack.² The same statement pointed out that "the consequences of such a breach of the armistice would be so grave that, in all probability, it would not be possible to confine hostilities within the frontiers of Korea."

The United States military forces in the Far East will be maintained at appropriate levels to take account of the foregoing and to fulfill the commitments which the United States has undertaken in that area, and which are vital to the security of the United States. These forces will feature highly mobile naval, air, and amphibious units.

Thus, we move forward in pursuance of our broad policy to make evident to all the world that we ourselves have no aggressive intentions and that we are resourceful and vigilant to find ways to reduce the burdens of armament and to promote a climate of peace.

114. EXCHANGE OF VIEWS WITH RESPECT TO KOREAN DEVELOPMENTS: Joint Statement Issued at Washington by the President of the United States and the President of the Republic of Korea, July 30, 1954³

We have had a fruitful and cordial exchange of views on a number of matters of mutual concern. These conversations have strengthened the friendship existing between our two countries and are a further demonstration of our solidarity of purpose.

³ Department of State Bulletin, Aug. 9, 1954, p. 197.

On August 8, 1953, President Rhee and Secretary Dulles agreed that the United States and the Republic of Korea would again consult if the political conference envisaged in the Armistice of July 27, 1953 failed to produce a satisfactory settlement.¹ This conference was held at Geneva from April 26 to June 15, 1954, but at that meeting the Communists refused to accept any formula for the unification of Korea on the basis of genuinely free elections under U.N. supervision and instead continued to press for arrangements which would have led directly and inevitably to extinguishing the liberties of the Korean people.²

We reaffirm our intention to move forward, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and the resolutions of the General Assembly on Korea, to achieve a unified, democratic, and independent Korea. In view of the failure of the Conference at Geneva to reach a settlement of the Korean question, we have discussed means for continuing to seek this objective.

Our military and economic advisers will continue with more detailed discussions of the questions of common interest which concern them.

In conclusion, we reiterate our determination to continue to work together in close and reciprocal cooperation to attain our common objectives regarding Korea.

115. UNITED STATES-KOREAN COOPERATION: Agreed Minute Between the United States and the Republic of Korea, November 17, 1954³

It is in the mutual interest of the United States and the Republic of Korea to continue the close cooperation which has proved mutually beneficial and has played such an important part in the Free World's struggle against Communist aggression and its determination to remain free.

Accordingly,

It is the intention and policy of the Republic of Korea to:

1. Cooperate with the United States in its efforts to unify Korea, including possible efforts through the United Nations to secure this objective;

2. Retain Republic of Korea forces under the operational control of the United Nations Command while that Command has responsibilities for the defense of the Republic of Korea, unless after consultation it is agreed that our mutual and individual interests would best be served by a change;

3. Accept the force levels and principles set forth in Appendix B⁴ which will permit the maintenance of an effective military program consistent with economic stability and within available resources;

4. Continue to encourage private ownership of investment projects;

5. Cooperate in procedures for administration of United States aid funds consistent with United States legislation and the practices applied generally in such programs;

6. Take the necessary measures to make the economic program effective, including those set forth in Appendix A.

Based upon the conditions which the Republic of Korea declares it will create, it is the intention and policy of the United States to:

1. Continue its program of helping to strengthen the Republic of Korea politically, economically and militarily, with programmed economic aid and direct military assistance furnished during Fiscal Year 1955 to aggregate up to $700 million. This amount would exceed by more than $100 million the amount of assistance previously contemplated by the United States for Korea in Fiscal Year 1955. Of this total, programmed economic aid, including the CRIK [Civil Relief in Korea]¹ carryover and the United States contribution to UNKRA [United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency],¹ available for obligation in Fiscal Year 1955 would amount to approximately $280 million (actual expenditures in Fiscal Year 1955 are estimated at approximately $250 million);

2. Support a strengthened Republic of Korea military establishment as outlined in Appendix B, including the development of a reserve system, in accordance with arrangements to be worked out by appropriate military representatives of the two Governments.

3. Consult fully with appropriate military representatives of the Republic of Korea in the implementation of the program for support of the Republic of Korea military establishment.

4. In the event of an unprovoked attack upon the Republic of Korea to employ, in accordance with its constitutional processes, its military power against the aggressor;

5. Subject to the necessary Congressional authorizations, continue to press forward with the economic program for the rehabilitation of Korea.

Appendix A: Measures for an Effective Economic Program

The Republic of Korea will undertake the necessary measures to make the economic program effective, including:

1. with respect to exchange rates, the official rate of the Republic of Korea Government and the counterpart rate being 180 to 1, agreement to procedures as proposed by the United States for the conversion of dollars at a different and realistic exchange rate to cover hwan drawings of United States forces by sale of dollars through the Bank of Korea, and generally to price aid goods into the Korean economy at a similar rate, thereby providing for the maximum contribution to the Korean economy and to the Korean budget from the use of these resources. The operation of existing agreements with respect to hwan drawings by the United States will be suspended so long as the foregoing arrangements work out in practice to the mutual satisfaction of both Governments;

2. agreement that material for the aid program—not furnished from the United States in kind—will be procured wherever in non-Communist countries goods of the required quality can be obtained at the best price (it being the objective to perform the maximum possible procurement in Korea at competitive world prices);

3. provision of adequate information to the appropriate United States representatives concerning Korean plans for the use of their own foreign exchange; and

4. a realistic effort to balance its budget and continue to resist inflation (it will be the objective of both Governments to develop the budget of the Republic of Korea in a manner that will resist inflation).

116. TERMINATION OF COMBATANT ACTIVITIES IN THE AREA OF KOREA AS OF FEBRUARY 1, 1955: Executive Order 10585, January 1, 1955¹

DESIGNATING THE DATE OF TERMINATION OF COMBATANT ACTIVITIES IN KOREA AND WATERS ADJACENT THERETO

By virtue of the authority vested in me by section 112 (c) (3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954,² January 31, 1955, as of midnight thereof, is hereby designated as the date of termination of combatant activities in the zone comprised of the area described in Executive Order No. 10195 of December 20, 1950³ (15 F. R. 9177).

117. ECONOMIC AND MILITARY DISCUSSIONS: Joint Communiqué Issued at Washington by the Governments of the United States and the Republic of Korea, August 15, 1955⁴

Economic and military discussions between the Government of the Republic of Korea and the Government of the United States which have taken place in Washington for the last several weeks have been concluded.

The military discussions covered a wide range of aid and supply matters. On the economic side the talks focused on exchange rate problems and related subjects, including discussion of the steps each government should take to speed up the reconstruction and rehabilitation program which is designed to enable Korea to become self-supporting with a stabilized economy as rapidly as possible. There was an extensive exchange of information and a fruitful joint appraisal of those aspects of the Korean economy which affect its future stability.

As an outgrowth of these discussions between the two governments, the Republic of Korea announced its intention to establish the rate of exchange between the Korean hwan and the U.S. dollar at 500 hwan to one U.S. dollar. This rate will be applicable to the foreign exchange transactions of the Government of the Republic of Korea, to purchases of hwan by the U.S. Forces in Korea, and with certain limited exceptions to U.S. aid furnished in the form of imports into Korea. The Government of the United States will cooperate with the Government of Korea in its efforts to prevent further inflation and to develop a stabilized economic situation within the limits of resources made available for this purpose.

As with other questions related to the United States aid program to Korea, further consideration will be given in Seoul to those matters that have been discussed here which have continuing interest.

The two Governments have welcomed this opportunity to exchange views and reach understandings in a spirit of friendly cooperation on a wide range of topics important to the achievement of mutual objectives.

118. MONETARY STABILIZATION: Amendment to Appendix A of Agreed Minute of November 14, 1954, Between the United States and the Republic of Korea, August 15, 1955¹

Effective August 15, 1955, paragraph 1 of Appendix A of the Agreed Minute between the Governments of the United States of America and the Republic of Korea signed November 17, 1954,² is amended as follows:

The official exchange rate of 500 hwan to 1 United States dollar which is to be established by the Republic of Korea on August 15, 1955 as the rate for all foreign exchange transactions of the Government of the Republic of Korea and its agencies, will be applicable to United States aid furnished for the importation of goods and services into Korea except the following: (a) coal of United States origin which will be priced during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1956 at a rate not less than 40 percent of the official rate; (b) fertilizer which will be priced immediately at a rate not less than 50 percent of the official rate, to be increased to the official rate not later than January 1, 1956; (c) investment type commodities for non-revenue producing projects; and (d) relief supplies. Investment type commodities for revenue producing projects will be priced at the official rate unless the Combined Economic Board recommends a reduction either through differential exchange rates or subsidies.

The official rate will apply to purchases of hwan by the United States Forces in Korea.

The Government of the United States of America will cooperate with the Government of the Republic of Korea in its efforts to develop a stabilized economic situation in Korea within the limits of resources made available for this purpose. In this regard both Governments will pay particular attention to the objectives of expeditious action leading to the speedy implementation of the aid program.

Arrangements existing prior to the effective date of this amendment to Appendix A of the Agreed Minute of November 17, 1954 with respect to acquisition of hwan by the United States including those arrangements authorized by the original paragraph 1 of Appendix A of the said Agreed Minute will be suspended as long as the foregoing arrangements work out in practice to the mutual satisfaction of both Governments.

Part XVI

DISARMAMENT AND THE CONTROL OF ATOMIC ENERGY

A. THE PROBLEM OF CONVENTIONAL ARMAMENTS, 1950

1. BASIC PRINCIPLES OF INTERNATIONAL SAFEGUARDS: Paper Submitted by the United States Delegation to the Working Committee of the United Nations Commission for Conventional Armaments, May 13, 1950¹

Item 3 of the Plan of Work² of the Commission for Conventional Armaments provides for: "Consideration of practical and effective safeguards by means of an international system of control operating through special organs (and by other means) to protect complying States against the hazards of violations and evasions." The following is a general outline of the views of the United States which will be elaborated as the Working Committee proceeds with its consideration of this subject.

I. The Objective of Safeguards

- A. To ensure that nations fulfil their responsibilities and obligations as prescribed in the treaty for the regulation and reduction of conventional armaments and armed forces, and so to protect complying States against the hazards of violations and evasions;

II. The Nature of Safeguards

- A. The system of safeguards should be so devised that its operations will be effective, technically feasible and practicable, and will:
 - (a) give warning of the likelihood of violations,

¹ U.N. doc. S/C.3/SC.3/23, May 13, 1950. The Commission for Conventional Armaments, responsible to the Security Council, was established by Security Council resolution of Feb. 13, 1947. For text of this resolution and earlier documents on the reduction of conventional armaments, see A Decade of American Foreign Policy, pp. 1136-1143.

² U.N. doc. S/387/Annex A.

- (b) detect promptly the occurrence of violations,
- (c) minimize interference with and impose minimum burdens on the economic and industrial life of the signatory States.

III. The Basic Elements Constituting Safeguards

- A. Accurate and regular reports by all signatory States of such information related to conventional armaments and armed forces as may be required by the treaty,
- B. Verification of the above-mentioned reports by thorough international inspection procedures,
- C. Remedial action in the case of violation of the treaty;

IV. The International Agency Responsible for Safeguards

- A. An international agency should be established within the framework of the United Nations, deriving its powers and status from the treaty under which it is established, to supervise and administer the agreed system of safeguards in connection with the regulation and reduction of conventional armaments,
- B. The international agency should consist of a governing board, an inspection corps and secretariat,
- C. The governing board should be composed of representatives from each of the States which are members of the Security Council, the nonpermanent membership changing in conformity with elections to and retirement from the Security Council,
- D. The inspection corps should be composed of members drawn from panels nominated by each participating State. The size and composition of the inspecting teams drawn from this corps and utilized in particular instances should be determined by the governing board,
- E. Such secretariat as may be needed should be selected by the governing board,
- F. The decisions made by the international agency should not require unanimity;

V. Rights and Duties of the Agency

- A. Receiving from each signatory State the reports specified in the treaty,
- B. Verification of this information through direct inspections,
- C. Review and interpretation of data derived from reports and inspections,
- D. Preparation and publication of periodic and special reports to organs of the United Nations and to the signatory States,
- E. The inspection and verification process as applied to each State should be made by nationals of States other than the State being inspected. However, the State being inspected should be obliged to appoint a liaison officer to assist and accompany the inspection group representing the international agency,

- F. Individual members and national composition of the inspection teams should be varied periodically,
- G. The international agency and its representatives should have no authority to issue directions to signatory States except as may be provided in the treaty under which it is established,
- H. Inspection and verification should be conducted on a regular basis with reasonable advance notice which should be set forth in the treaty. However, special inspections may take place under such circumstances as may be specified in the treaty,
- I. Certification to the Security Council and to signatory States of violations or evasions;

VI. Rights and Duties of Signatory States

- A. Each signatory State should afford duly accredited representatives of the agency unimpeded rights of ingress to and egress from, and movement within its territories necessary to the performance of their duties; should aid and assist them in the performance of their duties, should provide access to the activities subject to inspection, and should arrange for the full co-operation of national or local authorities or private individuals,
- B. The treaty should set forth the nature and scope of the inspection and verification processes to be followed by the international agency in order that all participating States may be aware of their rights and obligations;

VII. Action to be Taken upon the Determination of a Violation

- A. The international agency should be responsible for the prompt referral with certification of facts to the Security Council and to the signatory States of the agency's findings in respect to violations or evasions of the treaty,
- B. Such certification may be accompanied by such recommendations in respect of any violations or evasions cited as the international agency may deem appropriate,
- C. Action in respect of any violation or evasion should be primarily the responsibility of the Security Council. The treaty should provide that, since the purpose of the system of safeguards is to protect complying States against the hazards of violations, failure by the Security Council to correct violations or otherwise enforce the treaty should relieve participating States from their obligations thereunder and permit them such freedom of unilateral or collective action as is consistent with the Charter of the United Nations.

2. PROPOSED CONVENTIONAL ARMAMENTS ADMINISTRATION: Paper Submitted by the United States Delegation to the Working Committee of the United Nations Commission for Conventional Armaments, June 22, 1950¹

I. Conventional Armaments Administration (CAA)

Establishment. A United Nations Conventional Armaments Administration should be created at the seat of the United Nations to supervise and administer the general system for the regulation and reduction of conventional armaments and armed forces. The Administration should derive its powers and status from the treaty or convention setting up the international system for the regulation and reduction of conventional armaments and armed forces.

Composition. In order that the Conventional Armaments Administration will be broadly representative of the States participating in the system, but limited in size in the interest of efficient operations, it should be composed of a representative from each of the States which are members of the Security Council, the non-permanent membership changing in conformity with elections to and retirement from the Security Council.

To facilitate its operations, the Administration should be authorized, in the treaty or convention which creates it, to establish regional branches. Each participating State should be obliged by the treaty or convention to designate a national agency to supervise the execution of its obligations with respect to conventional armaments and to assist the Conventional Armaments Administration in its work.

The Administration should be empowered to employ the personnel requisite to carrying out its functions. This personnel should be recruited on the basis of character and technical competence, due allowance being made for equitable geographical distribution.

Functions. The Conventional Armaments Administration should be responsible for:

- (1) Receiving from each participating State the reports specified in the treaty or convention establishing the system;
- (2) Verification of this information through investigation and direct inspections;
- (3) Review and interpretation of data derived from reports and inspections;
- (4) Preparation of periodic and special reports on conventional armaments and armed forces to organs of the United Nations and to the participating States;
- (5) Immediate certification to the Security Council and to participating States of violations or evasions.

Procedure. The treaty or convention which establishes the system for the regulation of armaments should stipulate that decisions made by the Administration within its defined functions do not require unanimity. Except for this provision and others which may be adopted in the treaty or convention, the Administration should adopt its own rules of procedure. It should also be authorized to issue administrative regulations and to enter into ad hoc agreements necessary to the discharge of its responsibilities.

Inspections. The Conventional Armaments Administration should be required to conduct such inspections as are necessary to the fulfillment of its functions.

The treaty or convention setting up the system should stipulate the objectives to be achieved by the inspections. There should then be stipulated the types of inspections to be conducted as a matter of routine.

It is further considered most desirable that practically all inspections will be scheduled in advance, and that they will be identical in character for Powers of similar strength.

Each individual inspection should be conducted by an inspection team the size and composition of which should be determined by the Conventional Armaments Administration with due regard to the following:

- (1) Each member of the Administration should be entitled, but not required, to have a representative on each inspecting team, except where a member of the Administration is itself being inspected. The State being inspected should be obliged to appoint a liaison officer to accompany the inspection team;
- (2) Each participating State should nominate as many inspectors as the Administration may require it to furnish, and these nominees should form a permanent roster from which inspection teams should be selected as needed;

Each inspection team should have at its disposal a staff composed of personnel of the international secretariat of the Conventional Armaments Administration.

II. Relationships of the Conventional Armaments Administration to Organs of the United Nations

To the Security Council. Since every aspect of the regulation and reduction of armaments is associated with the maintenance of international peace and security, every aspect of the work of the Conventional Armaments Administration is to some extent related to the Security Council. However, in order to provide the Security Council with a basis for taking appropriate action, the following specific relationships should be established in the treaty or convention for the regulation and reduction of armaments:

- (a) Violations or evasions should be immediately certified to the Security Council by the Conventional Armaments Administration;
- (b) The Conventional Armaments Administration should submit to the Security Council regular reports at stated intervals and special reports as required.

The relation of the Conventional Armaments Administration to the Military Staff Committee should be defined by the Security Council as circumstances require.

To the General Assembly. Under the Charter (Articles 10-12) the General Assembly has broad authority to consider and make recommendations concerning the principles governing disarmament and the regulation of armaments. In order to assist the Assembly in the exercise of this function, the treaty or convention for the regulation and reduction of armaments should require the Conventional Armaments Administration to submit to the General Assembly annual reports and such special reports as the Assembly may from time to time request.

To the International Court of Justice. Under the Statute of the Court, cases between States arising out of the treaty or convention for the regulation and reduction of conventional armaments and armed forces would fall within the jurisdiction of the Court when referred to it by the parties or through the operation of a compulsory jurisdiction declaration.¹ In addition, the Conventional Armaments Administration should be empowered, in accordance with the procedure specified in Article 96 of the Charter,² to request advisory opinions on legal questions arising within the scope of the Administration's activities. Proceedings before the Court should not delay the taking of measures necessary to conserve international peace and security.

To the Secretariat. The Conventional Armaments Administration might have an independent secretariat separate from the United Nations Secretariat. It might, however, utilize the services of the United Nations Secretariat to the extent mutually agreed upon. Reports and other communications from the Administration to organs of the United Nations should be transmitted through the Secretary-General.

To the Economic and Social Council. Such relationships as may be necessary should be established between the Conventional Armaments Administration and the Economic and Social Council, its commissions and sub-commissions, and related specialized agencies.

To the Trusteeship Council. Such relationships as may be necessary should be established between the Conventional Armaments Administration and the Trusteeship Council.

With Individual States. The question of the relationship of the Conventional Armaments Administration to each participating State will require careful treaty definition, particularly as regards the extent to which the privileges and immunities accorded to the Administration will exempt it from the operation of national laws and the means by which individual rights and liberties will be protected against possible infringement stemming from inspections. The grant of privileges and immunities to the Administration should be based on the principle of minimum interference with the national laws of a State consistent with adequate supervision of the regulation and reduction of armaments.

The Administration should have no authority to issue directions or instructions to any State. The Administration should, however, be authorized to negotiate with each participating State such administrative agreements as may be necessary to carry out the treaty or convention affecting such State's regulation and reduction of armaments.

The privileges and immunities of the Administration should include:

- (1) The possession of legal personality similar to that enjoyed by the United Nations;
- (2) The right of its accredited representatives to the privileges and facilities of ingress, egress and access into and from the territory of participating States, including rights of transit for persons and equipment across or through such territory;
- (3) The right to the use of communication facilities adequate to the discharge of its responsibilities;
- (4) Such exemption from customs and immigration regulations as may be necessary to effective operations;
- (5) Inviolability of premises, property and archives.

3. CONSOLIDATION OF THE APPROACH TO DISARMAMENT, 1951-1952

PROPOSED CONSOLIDATION OF THE TWO DISARMAMENT COMMISSIONS: Address by the President of the United States Before the United Nations General Assembly, October 24, 1950¹

PROPOSED COMMISSION FOR THE CONTROL OF ALL ARMAMENTS AND ARMED FORCES: Working Paper Submitted by the United States Delegation to the United Nations Committee of Twelve, May 17, 1951²

Introduction

The United States believes that comprehensive plans to include the international control of all armaments and armed forces should be developed by the United Nations, and, accordingly, that present United Nations efforts should be directed towards the preparation of

General Assembly, Official Records, Fifth Session, Supplement No. 20 (A/1775), p. 80), to report "on ways and means whereby the work of the Atomic Energy Commission and the Commission for Conventional Armaments may be co-ordinated and on the advisability of their functions being merged and placed under a new and consolidated disarmament commission."

co-ordinated plans of control which would make possible with appropriate safeguards the regulations, limitation and balanced reduction of all armaments and armed forces, including internal security and police forces. United Nations efforts in the field of armaments and armed forces have to date been assigned to two separate bodies, namely the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission and the Commission for Conventional Armaments. Much useful work has been accomplished by the two Commissions and, in the view of the United States, the appropriate time has now arrived for bringing the respective efforts of the two Commissions into closer co-ordination through the establishment of a single commission. In taking over the functions of the two present Commissions, the new commission would build upon the work already done by them. In particular, the United States believes that the United Nations plan for international control of atomic energy¹ must continue to serve as the basis for the work of the new commission in the atomic energy phases of its work. Nevertheless, the commission should be empowered to consider any other proposals that would be no less effective than the existing United Nations plan.

A. Organization

The United States believes that a new commission whose primary task would be the development of plans for the international control of all armaments and armed forces—to be called the Commission for the Control of Armaments and Armed Forces—should be established in place of the existing two Commissions in accordance with the following terms and provisions:

1. Status. The new commission should be established under and report to the Security Council, which in turn should submit periodic progress reports to the General Assembly.
2. Composition. Membership on the new commission should correspond to the membership of the Atomic Energy Commission and the Commission for Conventional Armaments, and hence would consist of the members of the Security Council, plus Canada when Canada is not a member of the Security Council.
3. Sub-committees. The new commission should be expressly authorized to establish such sub-committees as may be needed in order to carry out the tasks assigned to it, recognizing that the differences in the nature of atomic and non-atomic weapons, as well as in the nature of biological and other instrumentalities of warfare, require the development of varying, but co-ordinated, systems of regulation and control, specially adapted to meet the problems peculiar to the different types of weapons, or instrumentalities.

4. Technical advice. Technical advice should be provided as necessary by experts appointed by the member States to assist their representatives.

5. The Secretariat. The Secretariat of the new commission should be provided by the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

6. Relationship to other organs of the United Nations. As a subordinate organ of the Security Council, the new commission should have the normal relationship of such a body to other organs of the United Nations.

7. Rules of procedure. With appropriate modifications, the rules of procedure of the Atomic Energy Commission would appear to be adequate to serve as the rules of procedure of the new commission.

Functions

1. The primary task of the new commission should be to prepare comprehensive and co-ordinated plans for the international control of all armaments and armed forces, and accordingly, would provide for the regulation, limitation, and balanced reduction of all armaments and armed forces, including internal security and police forces.

2. The new commission should build upon the work already developed by the Atomic Energy Commission and the Commission for Conventional Armaments. The United Nations plan for the international control of atomic energy and the prohibition of atomic weapons should continue to serve as the basis for any plan for the control of atomic energy unless and until a better and no less effective system can be devised.

3. The new commission should take into account the inter-relationship of control systems and safeguards necessary to assure the regulation, limitation, and balanced reduction of all armaments and armed forces, including internal security and police forces, in order to assure that the respective systems of control complement each other.

4. The new commission should develop a comprehensive plan for hastening the implementation of the component systems of control and regulation of all armaments and armed forces.

5. The new commission should formulate a plan for the regulation of the international traffic in arms as part of the comprehensive plan for international control of all armaments and armed forces.

4. ESTABLISHMENT OF THE UNITED NATIONS DISARMAMENT COMMISSION: Resolution 502 (VI) of the United Nations General Assembly, January 11, 1952¹

The General Assembly,

Moved by anxiety at the general lack of confidence plaguing the world and leading to the burden of increasing armaments and the fear of war,

Desiring to lift from the peoples of the world this burden and this fear, and thus to liberate new energies and resources for positive programmes of reconstruction and development,

Reaffirming its desire that the United Nations develop an effective collective security system to maintain the peace and that the armed forces and armaments of the world be progressively reduced in accordance with the Purposes and Principles of the Charter,

Believing that a necessary means to this end is the development by the United Nations of comprehensive and co-ordinated plans, under international control, for the regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and all armaments, for the elimination of all major weapons adaptable to mass destruction, and for the effective international control of atomic energy to ensure the prohibition of atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only,

Recognizing that a genuine system for disarmament must include all kinds of armed forces and armaments, must be accepted by all nations whose military resources are such that their failure to accept would endanger the system, and must include safeguards that will ensure the compliance of all such nations,

Noting the recommendation² of the Committee of Twelve established by resolution 496 (V)³ that the General Assembly should establish a new commission to carry forward the tasks originally assigned to the Atomic Energy Commission and the Commission for Conventional Armaments,

1. Establishes under the Security Council a Disarmament Commission. This Commission shall have the same membership as the Atomic Energy Commission and the Commission for Conventional Armaments, and shall function under the rules of procedure of the Atomic Energy Commission with such modifications as the Commission shall deem necessary;

2. Dissolves the Atomic Energy Commission and recommends to the Security Council that it dissolve the Commission for Conventional Armaments;

3. Directs the Disarmament Commission to prepare proposals to be embodied in a draft treaty (or treaties) for the regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and all armaments, for the elimination of all major weapons adaptable to mass destruction, and for effective international control of atomic energy to ensure the prohibition of atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only. The Commission shall be guided by the following principles:

(a) In a system of guaranteed disarmament there must be progressive disclosure and verification on a continuing basis of all armed forces—including paramilitary, security and police forces—and all armaments including atomic;

(b) Such verification must be based on effective international inspection to ensure the adequacy and accuracy of the information disclosed; this inspection to be carried out in accordance with the decisions of the international control organ (or organs) to be established;

(c) The Commission shall be ready to consider any proposals or plans for control that may be put forward involving either conventional armaments or atomic energy. Unless a better or no less effective system is devised, the United Nations plan for the international control of atomic energy and the prohibition of atomic weapons should continue to serve as the basis for the international control of atomic energy to ensure the prohibition of atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only;

(d) There must be an adequate system of safeguards to ensure observance of the disarmament programme, so as to provide for the prompt detection of violations while at the same time causing the minimum degree of interference in the internal life of each country;

(e) The treaty (or treaties) shall specifically be open to all States for signature and ratification or adherence. The treaty (or treaties) shall provide what States must become parties thereto before the treaty (or treaties) shall enter into force;

4. Directs the Commission, when preparing the proposals referred to in the preceding paragraph, to formulate plans for the establishment, within the framework of the Security Council, of an international control organ (or organs) to ensure the implementation of the treaty (or treaties). The functions and powers of the control organ (or organs) shall be defined in the treaty which establishes it;

5. Directs the Commission, in preparing the proposals referred to in paragraph 3 above, to consider from the outset plans for progressive and continuing disclosure and verification, the implementation of which is recognized as a first and indispensable step in carrying out the disarmament programme envisaged in the present resolution;

6. Directs the Commission, in working out plans for the regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and all armaments:

(a) To determine how over-all limits and restrictions on all armed forces and all armaments can be calculated and fixed;

(b) To consider methods according to which States can agree by negotiation among themselves, under the auspices of the Commission, concerning the determination of the over-all limits and restrictions referred to in sub-paragraph (a) above and the allocation within their respective national military establishments of the permitted national armed forces and armaments;

7. Directs the Commission to commence its work not later than thirty days from the adoption of the present resolution and to report periodically, for information, to the Security Council and to the General Assembly, or to the Members of the United Nations when the General Assembly is not in session. The Commission shall submit its first report not later than 1 June 1952;

8. Declares that a conference of all States should be convened to consider the proposals for a draft treaty (or treaties) prepared by the Commission as soon as the work of the Commission shall have progressed to a point where in the judgment of the Commission any part of its programme is ready for submission to governments;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to convene such a conference when so advised by the Commission;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to furnish such experts, staff and facilities as the Commission may consider necessary for the effective accomplishment of the purposes of the present resolution.

C. WORK OF THE UNITED NATIONS DISARMAMENT COMMISSION, 1952-1953

5. DISCLOSURE, VERIFICATION, AND INSPECTION OF ARMAMENTS: Proposal Submitted by the United States Delegation to the United Nations Disarmament Commission, April 5, 1952¹

INTRODUCTION

General Assembly resolution 502 (VI)² calling for regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and armaments directs that the Disarmament Commission be guided by a number of principles, including the following (paragraph 3):

“(a) In a system of guaranteed disarmament there must be progressive disclosure and verification on a continuing basis of all armed forces—including para-military, security and police forces—and all armaments including atomic;

“(b) Such verification must be based on effective international inspection to ensure the adequacy and accuracy of the information disclosed; this inspection to be carried out in accordance with the decisions of the international control organ (or organs) to be established.”

Paragraph 5 of the resolution reads as follows:

"5. Directs the Commission, in preparing the proposals referred to in paragraph 3 above, to consider from the outset plans for progressive and continuing disclosure and verification, the implementation of which is recognized as a first and indispensable step in carrying out the disarmament programme envisaged in the present resolution".

It is therefore apparent that the General Assembly resolution contemplates that the newly created Disarmament Commission should as a matter of priority deal with the problem of progressive and continuing disclosure and verification of armed forces and armaments.

A. EXTENT OF DISCLOSURE AND VERIFICATION

The system of disclosure and verification must be on a continuing basis. Disclosure as of a particular date on a "one time basis" and subsequent verification of such disclosure would not meet the requirements of a continuing programme for regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces. Therefore it is contemplated that the machinery which will be set up should be on a permanent or at least a long-term basis, since the disclosure and verification of armed forces and armaments will be on a continuing basis.

The disclosure must cover all armed forces of every kind, including para-military, security and police forces, and all armaments, including atomic.

The verification of armed forces and armaments must likewise cover all armed forces of every kind, including para-military, security and police forces and all armaments, including atomic.

The permanent machinery to be established must provide adequate safeguards under a competent international authority having appropriate status, rights and powers.

B. STAGES OF DISCLOSURE AND VERIFICATION

Disclosure and verification must be carried out step by step with appropriate provisions for proceeding to the next step when, and only when, previous steps have been satisfactorily completed. The reasons for proceeding by stages are two:

(a) In the existing state of international tensions all States must be protected in the event of a serious violation or collapse of the system of regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of armaments. The existence of stages gives all States the opportunity over a period of time to test the good faith of all other States. The mere agreement to enter into a system for disclosure and verification would give no assurance that the parties thereto would actually carry it out in full at all. With disclosure and verification in several stages and with each step of one stage completed prior to the commencement of the next stage, all States have the opportunity at periodic intervals of checking the good faith of other States through review of the information theretofore disclosed.

(b) It is contemplated that the disclosure and verification would proceed from the less secret areas, which would be disclosed and verified in early stages, to the more secret areas. A phasing of this nature, in addition to furnishing the best test of the good faith of all States, would cause the minimum degree of interference in the internal life of each country, since the less sensitive information can in fact be more readily verified, and would, in cases of differences or delays, prevent premature disclosure of information which many States would like reserved until substantial co-operation and good faith have been demonstrated.

6. In considering the appropriate number of stages, the United States had as its objective the full implementation of the programme of disclosure and verification as rapidly as feasible in the light of the existing state of international tensions. An excessive number of stages, each of which must be completed prior to the commencement of the next stage, would unduly delay not only the programme of disclosure and verification but also the entire programme for regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of armed forces and armaments. With this in mind, the United States concluded and is proposing that the number of stages of disclosure and verification should be five—a figure which represents the minimum number consistent with the considerations set forth in the previous paragraph. In each stage, the disclosure and verification processes will go forward simultaneously on a wide variety of items in order to accelerate the successful completion of the programme.

7. Annex I sets forth in outline the extent of armed forces and armaments (excluding atomic) to be disclosed in the respective stages and the manner of verification of the information required to be disclosed. Annex II sets forth the same information with respect to atomic armaments. The proposals with respect to atomic weapons are presented in a separate annex solely in the interest of clarity of presentation. Both the problems involved and the appropriate terminology with respect to atomic weapons differ so greatly from the problems and terminology with respect to other weapons that a single annex comprehending both might be confusing. It is contemplated that all stages of disclosure and verification cover both atomic and non-atomic weapons. In other words, the first stage includes the items set forth both in annex I and in annex II for disclosure and verification in that stage, and the same is true as to all succeeding stages.

8. Without commenting in detail at this point on the specific items subject to disclosure and verification in the respective stages, it should be noted that the armed forces and armaments to be disclosed in the first stage have three general characteristics:

(a) They should prove to be the least secret items.

(b) In the main, they are most susceptible of verification by periodic visits of inspection and through reference of statistical ards—with the result that verification can take place with the minimum of interference in the internal life of the respective countries. The resort would nevertheless be required to “on-the-spot” inspection, and aerial reconnaissance would be required in all stages to assist in checking the adequacy of the disclosure.

(c) At the same time, these items reveal so vast a segment of the military potential of all States that their disclosure and verification, provided in this stage, in and of itself would act as an indication of good faith and would thus greatly facilitate progress towards the ultimate goals of the entire programme of regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and armaments.

The armed forces and armaments to be disclosed in the second, third, fourth and fifth stages are progressively more secret and more difficult to verify except through “on-the-spot” investigations in conjunction with extensive aerial reconnaissance.

The character of the items to be disclosed and verified in the five stages as outlined in annexes I and II can in general be summarized as follows:

Stage I. A quantitative count in the nature of a report on existing strength levels of all armed forces and of the location of installations and facilities concerned with armaments of all types, including atomic.

Stage II. Detailed disclosure of organization of armed forces and of installations and facilities concerned with the basic materials required for production of all armaments, including atomic.

Stage III. Detailed disclosure of armaments (except novel armaments), fissionable material and installations and facilities utilized in their production.

Stage IV. Detailed disclosure of installations and facilities utilized in the production of novel armaments, including atomic (armaments not in general use by the end of the Second World War but in volume production today).

Stage V. Detailed disclosure of novel armaments, including atomic.

The information to be disclosed and verified in all stages—and particularly in the early stages—is so vast that there appear to be advantages in disclosing material only at the rate at which it can be processed. Therefore, in general within each stage, disclosure should proceed progressively step by step in accordance with an agreed plan in the less sensitive information to that which is more sensitive.

C. INSPECTION

The system of disclosure and verification is an integral part of a system of safeguards which must be established to ensure observance of the over-all programme of regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of armed forces and armaments, so as to provide for the prompt detection of violations while at the same time causing the minimum degree of interference in the internal life of each country. It will not be adequate to provide merely for the verification of disclosed information. In addition, provision must be made for determining the adequacy of the disclosed information, through broad general powers of "on-the-spot" inspection, through access to statistical data permitting independent confirmation of required reports and through aerial surveys.

13. Extensive aerial reconnaissance is obviously essential to the verification procedure in order completely to determine the adequacy of disclosed information. It will be obvious that aerial reconnaissance furnishes the easiest method of determining the existence of large undisclosed facilities and installations. Aerial survey will be essential in all stages of the disclosure and verification procedure.

14. It is contemplated that "on-the-spot" inspection will take place in all stages as a part of the verification procedure. Its use, however, will be less extensive in the first than in the later stages because of the greater ease of verification, through other methods, of the items disclosed in the first stage. It will of course be necessary at each stage to regulate inspection in such a way as to prevent disclosure of information which is to be withheld from disclosure and verification during the particular stage. Certain principles governing limitations on the right of "on-the-spot" inspections in early stages are set forth in annexes I and II.

15. Each State at the commencement of each stage should submit to the Commission a general description of the nature and location of facilities falling within the terms of reference for that stage. Access to such locations, reasonably sufficient to verify the information disclosed, should be granted to inspectors. Inspection in each stage should proceed in accordance with a previously accepted plan.

16. It is essential to an effective system of verification that the international inspectors, in addition to examining declared installations and facilities, be permitted in all stages to have access to the entire national territory in order that the Commission may determine within reasonable limits the accuracy and adequacy of the information disclosed. Accordingly, each State should be required during each stage of the process of disclosure and verification to permit the international inspectors such freedom of movement and to give them access to such installations and facilities, records and data as may reasonably be required, including the right to inspect physical dimensions of all facilities and installations wherever situated.

17. Each State should facilitate the activities of the international inspectors and furnish to them such assistance as they may reasonably require.

18. Procedure should be set up in order to permit a determination by the Commission of the necessity for inspection of any facilities or installations, access to which is denied to the inspectors and where in the judgment of the inspectors such inspection is required.

19. The inspectors should report to the Commission any information indicating a major violation of any provisions of the treaties or agreements respecting disclosure and verification. In the event of a Commission determination confirmed by the Security Council, by the affirmative vote of any seven members, of such a major violation during any stage and the failure of the State guilty of violation to repair the same within a reasonable specified period, other States should be free to suspend the operations of the disclosure and verification system.

20. The first stage of disclosure and verification should commence upon (a) the entry into force of the treaties dealing with the programme of disclosure and verification and referred to in paragraph 3 of the General Assembly resolution, and (b) the establishment, pursuant to such treaties, of international machinery responsible for carrying out the programme of disclosure and verification, including the portion of such machinery located within the territory of States adhering to the programme.

21. Disclosure and verification in all stages subsequent to the first stage could commence upon a Commission determination that the previous stage has been satisfactorily completed.

D. MISCELLANEOUS

22. The United Nations should establish concurrently with and at the time of the adoption of the general principles governing this programme the necessary inspection machinery to ensure effective verification of the armed forces and armaments, including those involving atomic energy, disclosed pursuant to the programme. In establishing this machinery, consideration should be given to its subsequent utilization to supervise the programme for the regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armaments and armed forces. The machinery recommended in the United Nations Atomic Energy Plan¹ would presumably be utilized in connexion with the disclosure and verification of armaments involving atomic energy. The problem of appropriate United Nations machinery both for purposes of the system of disclosure and verification and for the regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of armed forces and armaments is the subject of a separate study.

23. It is contemplated that the disclosure and verification processes with respect to all adhering States should begin simultaneously and should go forward at approximately the same tempo.

24. The draft treaties or agreements bringing into effect the disclosure and verification system should specifically provide for adherence of States in accordance with the principles set forth in the fifth paragraph of the preamble and sub-paragraph 3 (e) of General Assembly resolution 502 (VI) of 11 January 1952, the relevant portions of which are as follows:

"Recognizing that a genuine system for disarmament . . . must be accepted by all nations whose military resources are such that their failure to accept would endanger the system . . ."

"3 . . ."

"(e) The treaty (or treaties) shall specifically be open to all States for signature and ratification or adherence. The treaty (or treaties) shall provide what States must become parties thereto before the treaty (or treaties) shall enter into force."

ANNEX I

Proposed stages of disclosure and verification of Armed forces and non-atomic armaments

STAGE I

Disclose

- (a) Over-all manpower strength of regular and reserve military forces and para-military organizations, including training establishments and security and police forces, broken down into each category.
- (b) Location of all operational military installations.

Verify

- (a) By examination and cross-checks of central records to include personnel, disbursement, medical and procurement supplemented by access to and spot checks of records at selected installations.
 - (b) By direct examination, location, manpower used, power input and physical dimensions of installations.
- (a) and (b): Inspectors will have access to entire national territory to extent necessary to determine that all facilities and installations have been declared. Aerial surveys will be permitted for same purpose and to same extent.

STAGE II

Disclose

- (a) Organization, composition and disposition of units making up over-all strengths disclosed in stage I.
- (b) Over-all annual capacity of heavy industry relating to armaments to include coal, steel, aluminum and electricity.

Verify

- (a) By quantitative analysis of records pertaining to personnel, movement of units and administrative support supplemented by access to and spot checks of selected units and installations.
 - (b) By cross checks of pertinent statistics and employment records, access to plants, and analysis of operation with respect to materials used.
- (a) and (b): By aerial survey as stated in stage I.

STAGE III

Disclose

- (a) Equipment (including reserve equipment of units making up over-all strengths disclosed in stages I and II except units equipped with novel weapons).
- (b) Production facilities for manufacture of weapons and heavy equipment for units making up over-all strengths disclosed in stages I and II (excluding novel weapons), giving location, type and capacity.

erify

-) By quantitative analysis of records pertaining to table of organization and equipment, and repair and overhaul of equipment supplemented by access to and spot checks of selected units and installations.
 -) By inspection of physical dimensions of plants and examination of records pertaining to consumption of power and raw materials, available labour force, and finances, and by access to and spot checks of selected units and installations.
- (a) and (b): By aerial survey as stated in stage I.

STAGE IV

disclose

-) Information as to equipment of units equipped with novel weapons to include biological warfare, chemical warfare, radiological warfare and atomic weapons.
-) Installations and facilities devoted to manufacture of novel weapons.

erify

-) By cross checks with stages I and II and quantitative inspection of units disclosed.
 -) By inspection of physical dimensions of plants and examination of records pertaining to consumption of power and raw materials, available labour force, and finances, and by access to and spot checks of selected units and installations.
- (a) and (b): By aerial survey as set forth in stage I.

STAGE V

disclose

-) Quantities of novel weapons on hand by types.

erify

-) By physical count of stockpiles of finished novel weapons cross checked with information disclosed in stages I, II, III and IV.

ANNEX II

proposed stages of disclosure and verification of Atomic armaments

disclose

-) Location of all installations directly concerned with production of atomic energy, or the product of which is primarily useful in the production of atomic energy. Also manpower employed, physical dimensions, and power input of each installation. (Excluding weapon storage sites.)
-) Uses or functions of these installations. This should be confined to a statement giving the input material, the produce material and the process used in each instance.

Verify

- (a) By direct examination, location, manpower used, power input and physical dimensions of installation. (Inspectors will have access to entire national territory to the extent necessary to determine through such means as aerial survey, inspection of water and railways and power lines, that all atomic energy installations have been declared.)
- (b) Uses and functions in so far as revealed by external examination of all structures and unhoused equipment. Detailed interior inspection shall take place in subsequent stages, the particular stage in which it will take place depending upon the function of the plant. (Verification of (a) above will be of value as partial verification of plant use or function.)

(a) and (b): By aerial survey in all stages for same purposes and to same extent as permitted with armed forces and non-atomic armaments. (See annex I.)

STAGE II

Disclose

- (a) Details of design and operation, including present and past output, of all those installations or parts of installations concerned with preparation of atomic energy raw or feed materials (and such auxiliary materials as graphite, heavy water and beryllium), from mines up to but not including reactors, isotope separation plants, and similar nuclear conversion devices used to produce fissionable or fusionable material.

Verify

- (a) By direct and detailed inspection of all aspects the installations and appropriate records. Cross checks with stage I.

STAGE III

Disclose

- (a) Details of design and operation, including present and past output of all those atomic energy installations, or parts of installations, concerned with the conversion of feed materials to fissionable or fusionable materials or with the preparation of radioactive materials in large quantities.
- (b) Amounts and types of fissionable or fusionable material on hand or in process; amounts and types of radioisotopes on hand or in process.
- (c) General design and operational characteristics of research laboratories involving reactors operating at a power level of 1 MW or more, including amounts of radioactive, or fissionable or fusionable materials produced.

Verify

- (a) By direct and detailed inspection of all aspects the installations and appropriate records. Cross checks with stages I and II.
- (b) By direct and detailed inspection of fissionable or fusionable material, or radioactive materials, installations for production thereof, and appropriate records.

- (c) By survey of facilities associated with reported reactors, by detailed inspection of reactors themselves.

STAGE IV

Disclose

- (a) Details of design and operation, including past and present output of all those atomic energy establishments and installations concerned with the fabrication of atomic or radioactive weapons from fissionable or other materials.

Verify

- (a) By direct and detailed inspection of installations and appropriate records. Cross checks with stages I, II and III.

STAGE V

Disclose

- (a) Location, numbers and types of atomic and radioactive weapons on hand. Weapon storage sites.

Verify

- (a) By direct inspection. Cross checks with stages I, II and III and (a) above.

6. ESSENTIAL PRINCIPLES OF A DISARMAMENT PROGRAM: Proposal Submitted by the United States Delegation to the United Nations Disarmament Commission, April 24, 1952¹

The Disarmament Commission accepts as a guide for its future work the following principles as the essentials of a disarmament programme:

1. The goal of disarmament is not to regulate but to prevent war by relaxing the tensions and fears created by armaments and by making war inherently, as it is constitutionally under the Charter, impossible as a means of settling disputes between nations.
2. To achieve this goal, all States must co-operate to establish an open and substantially disarmed world:

(a) In which armed forces and armaments will be reduced to such a point and in such a thorough fashion that no State will be in a condition of armed preparedness to start a war, and

(b) In which no State will be in a position to undertake preparations for war without other States having knowledge of such preparations long before an offending State could start a war.

3. To reach and keep this goal, international agreements must be entered into by which all States would reduce their armed forces to levels, and restrict their armaments to types and quantities, necessary for:

- (a) The maintenance of internal security,
- (b) Fulfillment of obligations of States to maintain peace and security in accordance with the United Nations Charter.

4. Such international agreements must ensure by a comprehensive and co-ordinated programme both:

- (a) The progressive reduction of armed forces and permitted armaments to fixed maximum levels, radically less than present levels and balanced throughout the process of reduction, thereby eliminating mass armies and preventing any disequilibrium of power dangerous to peace, and
- (b) The elimination of all instruments adaptable to mass destruction.

5. Such international agreements must provide effective safeguards to ensure that all phases of the disarmament programme are carried out. In particular, the elimination of atomic weapons must be accomplished by an effective system of international control of atomic energy to ensure that atomic energy is used for peaceful purposes only.

6. Such international agreements must provide an effective system of progressive and continuing disclosure and verification of all armed forces and armaments, including atomic, to achieve the open world in which alone there can be effective disarmament.

7. NUMERICAL LIMITATION OF ARMED FORCES: Working Paper Submitted by the Delegations of the United States, the United Kingdom, and France to the United Nations Disarmament Commission, May 28, 1952¹

The delegations of France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America, which sponsored the resolution of the General Assembly establishing the Disarmament Commission,² are today submitting the attached working proposals for the determination of over-all numerical limitations on all armed forces.

In fixing numerical limitations on the armed forces of States a number of factors, demographic, geographic, political and economic, have to be considered. The Charter responsibilities of States and the need of balanced power-relationships among States must also be taken into account. There is no one automatic formula which can inflexibly be applied in all cases. The objective must be to reduce the possibility and the fear of successful aggression and to avoid a disequilibrium of power dangerous to international peace and security.

The proposals suggest that there should be fixed numerical ceilings for China, France, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom and the United States of America. A ceiling between 1 million and 1.5 million is suggested for the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United States of America and China, while a ceiling between 700,000 and 800,000 is suggested for the United Kingdom and France.

The proposals call for agreed maximum ceilings for all other States having substantial armed forces to be fixed in relation to the ceilings agreed upon for the five powers. Such ceilings should be fixed with a view to avoiding a disequilibrium of power dangerous to international peace and security in any area of the world, thus reducing the danger of war. The ceilings would normally be less than one per cent of the population and should be less than current levels, except in very special circumstances.

The proposals envisage substantial and balanced reductions in armed forces. Agreement on such reductions should greatly lessen the likelihood and the fear of successful aggression and should facilitate agreement on other essential parts of a comprehensive disarmament programme, including the elimination of all major weapons adaptable to mass destruction and the effective international control of atomic energy to ensure the prohibition of atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only.

PROPOSALS FOR FIXING NUMERICAL LIMITATIONS OF ALL ARMED FORCES

A. Introduction

1. Paragraph 3 of General Assembly resolution 502 (VI) of 11 January 1952:

"Directs the Disarmament Commission to prepare proposals to be embodied in a draft treaty (or treaties) for the regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and all armaments, for the elimination of all major weapons adaptable to mass destruction, and for the effective international control of atomic energy to ensure the prohibition of atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only".

2. Paragraph 6 of the resolution:

"Directs the Commission, in working out plans for the regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and all armaments:

"(a) To determine how over-all limits and restrictions on all armed forces and all armaments can be calculated and fixed;

"(b) To consider methods according to which States can agree by negotiation among themselves, under the auspices of the Commission concerning the determination of the over-all limits and restrictions referred to in sub-paragraph (a) above and the allocation within their respective national military establishments of the permitted national armed forces and armaments".

3. The present working paper presents a plan for the determination of over-all numerical limitations on the size of the armed forces of States. Obviously some over-all limitations on the size of the armed forces of States are an essential part of any comprehensive plan for the regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of armed forces and armaments. The working paper is not intended to exclude, but to facilitate the development of other essential components which must be included in what the preamble of the General Assembly resolution refers to as "comprehensive and co-ordinated plans, under international control, for the regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and armaments, for the elimination of all major weapons adaptable to mass destruction, and for the effective control of atomic energy to ensure the prohibition of atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes" including "safeguards that will ensure the compliance of all . . . nations [whose military resources are such that their failure to accept would endanger the system]". Proposals have already been submitted on certain other essential components, i. e., the control of atomic energy and disclosure and verification of all armed forces and armaments. By submitting this working paper and focusing attention on another component we hope to facilitate progress toward an agreed comprehensive programme.

B. Standards for determining numerical limitations of all armed forces

4. In fixing numerical limitations on the armed forces of States a number of factors, demographic, geographic, political and economic, have to be considered. The Charter responsibilities of States and the need of balanced power-relationships among States must also be taken into account. There is no one automatic formula which can inflexibly be applied in all cases. The objective must be to reduce the possibility and the fear of successful aggression and to avoid a disequilibrium of power dangerous to international peace and security.

5. The following working formula is suggested as a basis of discussion:

(a) There should be fixed numerical ceilings for China, France, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom, and the United States of America which should be worked out with a view of avoiding a disequilibrium of power dangerous to international peace and security among themselves or with other States and thus reducing the danger of war. It is tentatively suggested that the maximum ceilings for the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United States of America and China should be the same and fixed at, say, between 1 million and 1.5 million, and the maximum ceilings for the United Kingdom and France should be the same and fixed at, say, between 700,000 and 800,000.

(b) For all other States having substantial armed forces there should be agreed maximum ceilings fixed in relation to the ceilings agreed upon for the five Powers. Such ceilings should be fixed with a view to avoiding a disequilibrium of power dangerous to international peace and security in any area of the world and thus reducing the danger of war. The ceilings would normally be less than one per cent of the population. Moreover, they should be less than current levels except in very special circumstances.

C. Significance of over-all numerical limitations

6. While a nation's armed forces are not the only measure of its armed strength, and other elements of armed strength will have to be considered in any comprehensive programme for the balanced reduction of armed forces and armaments, nevertheless a numerical limitation on armed forces is a major element in any such programme for the following reasons:

(a) All armaments programmes depend upon manpower and therefore must to a greater or less degree be affected by limitations on permitted armed forces.

(b) A substantial reduction of armed forces as here suggested in itself would tend to reduce the likelihood of successful aggression.

(c) Agreement on a substantial and balanced reduction of armed forces, minimizing the likelihood and fear of successful aggression, should greatly facilitate agreement reducing and restricting the armaments supporting these armed forces.

D. Implementation of proposals for numerical limitations of all armed forces

7. In determining the numbers in the armed forces, all kinds of armed forces, including para-military and security forces, must be included.

8. Adequate provision must be made to ensure that the maximum limitation on armed forces is not circumvented through building up large forces of trained reserves or militarily trained police.

9. This system must be accepted by all States, whether or not Members of the United Nations, whose military resources are such that their failure to accept would endanger the system.

10. There should be adequate safeguards throughout the process of reduction to ensure that limitations are put into effect and observed as agreed and that violations can be promptly detected.

11. The implementation of the reductions should be closely related to progress in connexion with other phases of the programme for regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of armed forces and armaments, such as the control of atomic energy and the system of progressive and continuing disclosure and verification.

12. The reduction should be carried through in a manner and in accordance with a time schedule prescribed by the international control organ and should be completed within the shortest feasible time after its commencement.

13. In the future, further numerical limitation of permitted armed forces would be contemplated as substantial progress is achieved toward the easing of international tensions, and the agreed ceilings would be subject to review at stated intervals.

14. The proposed limitations—including their relationship to other components of the programme for regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of armed forces and armaments and the elimination of weapons adaptable to mass destruction—should be comprehended within the treaty or treaties required under paragraph 3 of General Assembly resolution 502 (VI) of 11 January 1952.

8. FIRST REPORT OF THE UNITED NATIONS DISARMAMENT COMMISSION, MAY 29, 1952¹

1. The General Assembly, by resolution 502 (VI) of 11 January 1952,² established the Disarmament Commission. In addition, the General Assembly, by resolution 504 (VI) of 19 January 1952,³ referred to the Commission certain proposals of the USSR, as contained in paragraphs 3 to 7 inclusive, of document A/C.1/698 [DC/2].

2. The Members of the Disarmament Commission for 1952 are: Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, France, Greece, Netherlands, Pakistan, Turkey, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and the United States of America.

3. The Commission has held twelve meetings to date, of which the first was held in Paris on 4 February 1952, and the subsequent ones have been held at United Nations Headquarters in New York.

4. At the 2nd meeting of the Commission on 14 March 1952, the representative of the United States submitted a "Proposal for a Plan of work for the Disarmament Commission" [DC/3].

5. At the 3rd meeting of the Commission on 19 March 1952, the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics submitted a "Proposal for a plan of work for the Disarmament Commission" [DC/4 and DC/4/Corr.1].

6. At the 7th meeting of the Commission on 26 March 1952, the representative of France submitted a "Proposed program of work for the Disarmament Commission" [DC/5]. This proposed programme was adopted by the Commission at its 8th meeting on 28 March 1952.

7. At the 9th meeting of the Commission on 2 April 1952, at the suggestion of the Chairman, the representative of Chile, the Commission established two working committees, each consisting of all the members of the Commission [DC/8]. Committee 1 was authorized to consider paragraph B of the programme of work, to wit, "Regulation of all armaments and armed forces". Committee 2 was authorized to consider paragraph A of the programme of work, to wit, "Disclosure and verification of all armaments, including atomic armaments, and of all armed forces".

8. At the first meeting of Committee 2, on 5 April 1952, the representative of the United States submitted a working paper entitled "Proposals for progressive and continuing disclosure and verification of armed forces and armaments" [DC/C.2/1].¹

9. At the 3rd meeting of Committee 1 on 24 April 1952, the representative of the United States submitted a proposal entitled "Essential principles for a disarmament programme" [DC/C.1/1].²

10. At the 12th meeting of the Commission on 28 May 1952, the representatives of France, the United Kingdom, and the United States submitted a "Working paper setting forth proposals for fixing numerical limitations of all armed forces" [DC/10].³

11. The Commission decided at its 12th meeting on 28 May 1952 to submit this first report, in accordance with paragraph 7 of resolution 502 (VI), to the Security Council and to the Members of the United Nations, and to transmit with this report the two resolutions of the General Assembly referred to above, and the records of the proceedings of the Commission and its Committees to date.

12. The discussions in the Commission and its two Committees are continuing and the Commission will, in accordance with paragraph 7 of resolution 502 (VI), submit further reports on its work.

13. The list of the relevant General Assembly resolutions and of the records of the proceedings of the Commission and its Committees is annexed hereto.⁴

9. NUMERICAL LIMITATION OF ARMED FORCES: Supplementary Working Paper Submitted by the Delegations of the United States, the United Kingdom, and France to the United Nations Disarmament Commission, August 12, 1952⁵

1. It is contemplated that any agreement for the numerical limitation of armed forces would necessarily comprehend:

(a) Provisions to ensure that production of armaments and quantities of armaments bear a direct relation to the amounts needed for permitted armed forces;

(b) Provisions for composition of permitted armed forces and armaments in order to prevent undue concentration of total permitted armed forces in a manner which might prejudice a balanced reduction;

(c) Procedures in conformity with the directive contained in paragraph 6 (b) of General Assembly resolution 502 (VI) of 11 January 1952,⁶ for the negotiation within over-all limitations of mutually agreed programmes of armed forces and armaments with a view to obtaining early agreement on these matters among States with substantial military resources.

Procedures should be worked out to facilitate the development, under the auspices of the Disarmament Commission, of mutually agreed programmes of armed forces and armaments to be comprehended within the treaty or treaties referred to in General Assembly resolution 502 (VI) of 11 January 1952.

2. One possible procedure, advanced for the purpose of initiating discussions, might be:

(a) Upon acceptance of the proposals set forth in Working Paper DC/10¹ with respect to fixing numerical limitation of all armed forces, arrangements might be made for a conference between China, France, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom and the United States of America with a view to reaching tentative agreement among themselves, by negotiation, on:

- (1) The distribution by principal categories of the armed forces that they would consider necessary and appropriate to maintain within the agreed numerical ceilings proposed for their armed forces;
- (2) The types and quantities of armaments which they would consider necessary and appropriate to support permitted armed forces within the proposed numerical ceilings;
- (3) The elimination of all armed forces and armaments other than those expressly permitted, it being understood that provision will be made for the elimination of all major weapons adaptable to mass destruction, and for the effective international control of atomic energy to ensure the prohibition of atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only.

The distribution of armed forces within stated categories and the types and volumes of armaments would not necessarily be identic, even for States with substantially equal aggregate military strength, inasmuch as their needs and responsibilities may be different. The objective of the agreements would be to reduce the possibility and fear of aggression and to avoid a disequilibrium of power dangerous to international peace and security. Such agreements would necessarily be tentative, as they would have to be reviewed in the light of further tentative agreements to be reached, as indicated in the following paragraph.

(b) When tentative agreement is attained at the conference referred to in paragraph 2 (a), regional conferences might be held, to be attended by all governments and authorities having substantial military forces in the respective regions, for the purpose of reaching similar tentative agreement on:

- (1) The over-all numerical ceilings for the armed forces of all such governments and authorities, as proposed in paragraph 5 (b) of the tripartite working paper on numerical limitations,
- (2) The distribution of the permitted armed forces within stated categories,

- (3) The type and volume of armaments necessary and appropriate to support the permitted armed forces, and
- (4) The elimination of all armed forces and armaments other than those expressly permitted, it being understood that provision will be made for the elimination of all major weapons adaptable to mass destruction, and for the effective international control of atomic energy to ensure the prohibition of atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only.

(c) Thereafter a draft treaty might be worked out, as contemplated in operative paragraph 3 of General Assembly resolution 502 (VI) of 11 January 1952, comprehending and bringing into a balanced relationship all essential components of the programme.

3. The timing and co-ordination of the reductions, prohibitions and eliminations should ensure the balanced reduction of over-all armed strength and should avoid creating or continuing any disequilibrium of power dangerous to international peace and security during the period that the reductions, prohibitions and eliminations are being put into effect. In particular, the initial limitations or reductions in armed forces and permitted armaments and the initial steps toward elimination of prohibited armaments should commence at the same time. Subsequent limitations and reductions should be synchronized with subsequent progress in elimination of prohibited armaments. An international control authority should be established at the commencement of the programme and it should be in a position to assume progressively its functions in order to ensure the carrying out of such limitations, reductions, curtailments and prohibitions. Thus, when the limitations and reductions in armed forces and permitted armaments provided by the treaty or treaties are completed, production of prohibited armaments will have ceased, existing stock-piles of prohibited armaments and facilities for their production will have been disposed of, atomic energy will be utilized for peaceful purposes only, and the international control authority will have assumed its full functions.

10. ELIMINATION OF BACTERIAL WEAPONS: Working Paper Submitted by the United States Delegation to the United Nations. Disarmament Commission, September 4, 1952¹

1. A comprehensive programme for the regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and armaments should provide for the elimination of all major weapons adaptable to mass destruction, including bacterial, and for the effective international control of atomic energy to ensure the prohibition of atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only.

2. Bearing in mind that all Members of the United Nations have agreed to refrain not only from the use of germ warfare but from the use of force of any kind contrary to the law of the Charter, the programme envisaged in paragraph 1 must be approached from the point of view of preventing war and not from the point of view of regulating the armaments used in war or of codifying the laws of war. The programme as a whole should ensure that armed forces and armaments are reduced to such a point and in such a thorough fashion that:

(a) No State will be in a position of armed preparedness to start a war;

(b) No State shall be in a position to undertake preparations for war without other States having knowledge of such preparations long before the offending State could start a war.

3. Safeguards must be devised to ensure the elimination of bacterial weapons and facilities and appliances for their production and use along with the elimination of all armed forces and armaments not expressly permitted to States to maintain public order and to meet their Charter responsibilities. The principal safeguards to ensure the elimination of bacterial weapons are to be found in an effective and continuous system of disclosure and verification of all armed forces and armaments such as that suggested in the working paper submitted by the representative of the United States on 5 April 1952, entitled "Proposals for progressive and continuing disclosure and verification of armed forces and armaments" (DC/C.2/1).¹ It is proposed that, at appropriate stages in an effective system of disclosure and verification, agreed measures should become effective providing for the progressive curtailment of production, the progressive dismantling of plants and the progressive destruction of stockpiles of bacterial weapons and related appliances. Under this programme, with co-operation in good faith by the principal States concerned, all bacterial weapons and all facilities and appliances connected therewith should be completely eliminated from national armaments and their use prohibited.

11. REGULATION, LIMITATION, AND BALANCED REDUCTION OF ALL ARMED FORCES AND ALL ARMAMENTS: Resolution 704 (VII) of the United Nations General Assembly, April 8, 1953²

The General Assembly, Recognizing that:

Under the Charter of the United Nations all States are bound to settle their international disputes by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security, and justice, are not endangered, and to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations,

The aim of a system of world-wide disarmament is to prevent war and release the world's human and economic resources for the purposes of peace,

1. Takes note of the report of the Disarmament Commission;¹
 2. Reaffirms General Assembly resolution 502 (VI) of 11 January 1952² and requests the Disarmament Commission to continue its work for the development by the United Nations of comprehensive and co-ordinated plans providing for:

- (a) The regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and armaments;
- (b) The elimination and prohibition of all major weapons, including bacteriological, adaptable to mass destruction;
- (c) The effective international control of atomic energy to ensure the prohibition of atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only;

The whole programme to be carried out under effective international control in such a way that no State would have cause to fear that its security was endangered;

3. Requests the Commission to report to the General Assembly and the Security Council no later than 1 September 1953, and hopes that all the members of the Commission will co-operate in efforts to produce constructive proposals likely to facilitate its task.

12. UNITED STATES EFFORTS TOWARD DISARMAMENT: Report to the President by the Deputy United States Representative on the United Nations Disarmament Commission,³ January 12, 1953⁴

In view of your deep and active interest in the development of an effective and comprehensive disarmament program I have thought it would be appropriate for me at this time to make a report to you on the work of the U.N. Disarmament Commission and in particular on the efforts of the United States in close cooperation with other members of the Commission to carry out the mandate of the General Assembly in accordance with the spirit and the principles of the Charter.

The statements and working proposals which have been made on behalf of the United States in the Commission⁵ are the product of the joint efforts of the State and Defense Departments, the Atomic Energy Commission, and the U.S. Mission to the United Nations.

The tripartite proposals submitted on behalf of the United States, France, and the United Kingdom represent the joint efforts of all three Governments.¹ The cooperation achieved within our Government and with friendly governments on the Commission has made it possible for us to supply the ideas and materials with which an effective and comprehensive disarmament program may in the future be wrought.

OUR RESPONSIBILITIES UNDER THE CHARTER

It may seem paradoxical to many that we should discuss disarmament in the United Nations in 1952, when the nations of the world are increasing their armaments at an accelerated pace.

But the United States has made it clear in the discussions of disarmament in the United Nations that the burden of armaments has been thrust upon us and is not of our choosing. We have learned that in an armed world we cannot safely rely on unarmed goodwill. But we have made it clear that we would infinitely prefer a world order in which the energies and resources now diverted to armaments could be used to advance human dignity and well-being.

On November 7, 1951, in an address explaining the proposals of the United States, the United Kingdom, and France for the establishment of the U.N. Disarmament Commission, you, Mr. President, stated:

"We are determined to win real peace—peace based on freedom and justice. We will do it the hard way if we must—by going forward, as we are doing now, to make the free world so strong that no would-be aggressor will dare to break the peace. But we will never give up trying for another way to peace—the way of reducing the armaments that make aggression possible."²

Five months later, on April 2, 1952, General Eisenhower, then Supreme Allied Commander in Europe, in his first report to the NATO countries declared:

"Visible and within grasp we have the capability of building such military, economic and moral strength as the Communist world would never dare to challenge. When that point is reached, the Iron Curtain rulers may finally be willing to participate seriously in disarmament negotiations. Then we may see fulfilled the universal hope expressed in the United Nations Charter to reduce 'the diversion for armaments of the world's human and economic resources.'"³

Our position is clear and unequivocal. Until all nations cooperate in good faith in putting into effect a balanced reduction in armed forces and armaments, we must build up and maintain the armed strength of the free world to guard and preserve the peace. But we have shown that we are ready, willing, and eager to work out a comprehensive disarmament program to reduce the danger of war and the fear of aggression. That is the duty of all member states under the Charter of the United Nations.

Under the Charter, all members have agreed to settle their international disputes by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security and justice are not endangered. Under the Charter all members have agreed to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

The maintenance of large armaments undermines confidence in the fulfillment of the solemn Charter obligations of member states not to use force or the threat of force as an instrument of national or ideological policy.

But the use of force or the threat of force in international relations cannot be eliminated by unilateral disarmament by any one state or group of states. All states must cooperate.

All members of the United Nations have a responsibility to see that force is used only in self-defense and in the service of the Charter and not as an instrument of national or ideological policy.

Disarmament must be viewed as a means of carrying out the obligations under the Charter not to use force or the threat of force for settling disputes among nations. The objective of a disarmament program must be to prevent war, not to regulate the armaments used in war. We have tried to make clear that the United States does not accept war as inevitable; that the job is to reduce the likelihood of war by insuring that no nation possesses the means to commit a successful act of armed aggression. The aim is to reduce the likelihood of war by reducing the possibility of war and armed aggression.

In its efforts towards disarmament, the United States has concentrated single-mindedly on the root problem, the prevention of war itself. When men fight to kill it is hard to regulate the manner of killing. True humanitarianism as well as realism supports the view that the only practical way to eliminate the horror of war is to eliminate war itself.

That of course does not mean that we are uninterested in examining the rules for the conduct of war or in finding better ways to protect civilians and prisoners should war occur. But in developing a disarmament program we must strive not to codify the rules of warfare but to reduce the possibility of war.

Responsible statesmen cannot rely upon paper promises which provide no assurances of their observance. We cannot make genuine progress toward disarmament by piecemeal attempts to forbid the use of individual weapons without safeguards designed to give assurance that such weapons will not be available for use. We have therefore urged in the United Nations that efforts be directed toward a comprehensive disarmament program which will insure that nations do not retain in their military establishment armed forces and armaments in types or in volume beyond those required for self-defense and to meet their Charter responsibilities. Forces and weapons not expressly permitted should be eliminated under effective international safeguards sufficient to remove the possibility and fear of prohibited forces or armaments being available for use.

The most solemn promise in the history of international relationships is that contained in the Charter against the threat or use of force of any kind in any way in international relations contrary to the purposes of the Charter. A disarmament program should provide the safeguards necessary to assure that no state will be in a position to break this solemn promise. No lesser promise can be relied upon if that most solemn promise is broken. A state which would flout the Charter to make war cannot be relied upon to honor any lesser promise as to how it will wage war.

This is the framework within which we have undertaken in the Disarmament Commission our Charter responsibility "for formulating . . . plans . . . for the establishment of a system for the regulation of armaments."

EARLY EFFORTS TOWARD DISARMAMENT

At the time the Charter was adopted, Nazi and Japanese aggression had been crushed. We looked forward to a peaceful world. We sought to cooperate to relieve the peoples of the world of the fear of war and the burden of armaments.

Relying on the good faith of the Soviet Union and its promises to fulfill its Charter and treaty obligations, we demobilized our armed forces.

We did even more. Less than a year after the momentous discovery by the United States of the war potential of the atom, we proposed that the United Nations undertake to develop an effective plan for the international control of atomic energy which would insure its use for peaceful purposes only. Within the same year the United States presented to the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission the basic principles of a constructive plan for the effective international control of this new force which would make possible and encourage its use by all nations for peaceful purposes.¹ These principles with minor modifications were accepted as a working basis by the General Assembly of the United Nations in the fall of 1946, and a plan based on these principles received the overwhelming endorsement of the Assembly in 1948.² The plan may not be perfect. Possibly it can be improved upon. But we can be very proud of the part we have played in working out the U.N. plan for the control of atomic energy. We are confident this plan could do the job of controlling effectively the atomic weapon and other related weapons as well, since its contemplated procedures actually encompass the entire field of atomic energy.

In 1946, when we first suggested the basic principles of the plan, we had hoped that if general agreement could first be reached on a plan for the effective international control of this new force of atomic energy, with its tremendous possibilities for good or for evil, then, in an atmosphere of mutual confidence and good will, agreement on the other essential parts of a comprehensive disarmament program would not be difficult of accomplishment. That was the reason why we thought in the early days of the disarmament discussions in the United Nations it would be better not to merge the discussions of conventional armaments with the discussions of atomic-energy control.

In the Commission for Conventional Armaments the United States, France, and the United Kingdom placed great stress on the development of a system for the disclosure and verification of armed forces and armaments.¹ We believed then, as we believe now, that such procedures generate mutual confidence necessary for any program of guaranteed disarmament. If disarmament is to be considered seriously and not merely as an instrument of propaganda, statesmen responsible for the peace and security of their countries cannot rely on paper promises to disarm, but must have assured means of knowing that promises made are kept.

Unfortunately our hope that progress in the field of atomic energy would stimulate progress in the field of conventional arms proved unfounded. Progress was stalled at a dead center in both commissions. In the Atomic Energy Commission the Soviet Union rejected the control features of the plan which had been developed on the basis of the U.S. proposals and itself presented no acceptable alternative. In the Conventional Armaments Commission the Soviet Union rejected the proposals for a system for the disclosure and verification of armed forces and armaments because it did not include atomic armaments. In an effort to break this deadlock, at the fifth session of the General Assembly you, Mr. President, suggested a new approach to the task of disarmament by merging the work of the Atomic Energy Commission and the Commission for Conventional Armaments.² As you recall, our hope was that the valuable preliminary work done in both fields could be preserved and that the new framework might be helpful in meeting the objections of the Soviet Union.

DISARMAMENT RESOLUTION OF JANUARY 11, 1952

At the sixth session of the General Assembly, the United Kingdom, France, and the United States joined in proposals to set up a new commission with a broad mandate to develop comprehensive and coordinated plans for the regulation, limitation, and balanced reduction of all armed forces and armaments including atomic. To pave the way for fresh efforts to reach realistic agreements, the proposals stressed the fact that a genuine system for disarmament must include all kinds of armed forces and armaments, must be accepted by all nations whose military resources are such that their failure to accept would endanger the system, and must include safeguards which will insure compliance by all nations.

By an overwhelming vote on January 11, 1952, the sixth General Assembly passed a resolution³ based on the proposals of the three Governments. The resolutions established a Disarmament Commission, composed of the members of the Security Council plus Canada, and directed the Commission to prepare draft proposals to be embodied in a treaty or treaties for submission to a conference of all states, concerning—

Regulation, limitation, and balanced reduction of all armed forces and all armaments;

Elimination of all major weapons adaptable to mass destruction;

Effective international control of atomic energy to insure the prohibition of atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only, with the present U.N. plan being used as the basis for the Commission's considerations until a better or no less effective plan is devised;

Progressive and continuing disclosure and verification of all armed forces and all armaments, including atomic, the implementation of such a scheme being recognized as a first and indispensable step in carrying out the disarmament program;

Methods for fixing over-all limits and restrictions on all armed forces and armaments, and for determining the allocation within their respective military establishments of the permitted national armed forces and armaments;

The establishment of an international control organ (or organs) to insure the implementation of the treaty or treaties; and

An adequate system of safeguards to insure observance of the disarmament program.

THE DISARMAMENT COMMISSION

As a member of the Disarmament Commission, the United States has put forward every effort to carry out the mandate of the General Assembly. The United States, individually and in collaboration with France and the United Kingdom, has placed before the Disarmament Commission working papers and proposals which we believe provide a working basis and broad outline for a practical and comprehensive disarmament program. In the development and consideration of these proposals we had constructive assistance and cooperation from all members of the Commission with the exception of the Soviet Union. It might be illuminating to review the principal suggestions we made in the Disarmament Commission.

Essential Principles for a Disarmament Program

On April 24, 1952, the United States introduced a paper setting forth what we considered "Essential Principles for a Disarmament Program"¹ (DC/20, pp. 83-84). It represented an attempt to clarify and agree on objectives and principles which we believed should guide the Disarmament Commission in developing the details of a comprehensive disarmament program.

We were influenced to present these principles and objectives at the outset because of the insistence of the Soviet Union that we could make no progress until we took certain decisions on principles. The Soviet representatives had argued in the Commission, as they have argued in past General Assemblies, that the United States was opposed to any general reduction in armed forces and armaments because the United States was unwilling to accept the Soviet proposals that immediate decisions should be taken to reduce by one-third the armed strength of the great powers and to prohibit the use of atomic weapons and other weapons of mass destruction.

The record is clear that the United States is dedicated to the goal of significantly reducing armaments and effectively eliminating atomic weapons from the world's arsenals. The United States rejected the Soviet proposals for the same reasons which caused the General Assembly repeatedly to reject them, because they are not contrived to achieve a balanced reduction in armed strength or to provide safeguards which would insure their observance. In fact, they would clearly result in a dangerous imbalance of strength in favor of the Soviet Union and other states having mass armed forces. We were confident that our statement of principles would clearly demonstrate that the United States actively favors a truly balanced reduction in over-all armed strength, which would include the elimination of mass armed forces as well as all weapons of mass destruction. That we are opposed to is paper agreements or paper decisions which provide no tangible safeguards or assurances of their observance.

Responsible nations cannot morally or legally bind themselves to arm on the basis of a decision in principle—on the basis of paper promises and without adequate and unequivocal safeguards to protect them from the hazards of violations and evasions. But if there could be agreement in advance on the objectives and principles which could govern a comprehensive and coordinated disarmament program, such agreement should greatly simplify the main and primary task of agreeing on specific and practical measures for arms reductions and eliminations, and concrete and workable safeguards to carry out these principles and objectives.

With this hope of facilitating the work of the Commission, the United States submitted its paper on "Essential Principles for a Disarmament Program."

For the most part these principles, summarized below, derive from the Charter and the resolutions of the General Assembly.

1. The goal of disarmament is not to regulate the armaments to be used in war, but to prevent war by relaxing the tensions and fears created by armaments and by making war inherently, as it is constitutionally under the Charter, impossible as a means of settling disputes between nations.

2. To achieve this goal, all states must cooperate to establish an open and substantially disarmed world

- (a) in which armed forces and armaments will be reduced to such a point and in such a thorough fashion that no state will be in a condition of armed preparedness to start a war, and

(b) in which no state will be in a position to undertake preparations for war without other states having knowledge of such preparations long before an offending state could start a war.

This principle of an open and substantially disarmed world stems from the fourth freedom, freedom from fear, which President Roosevelt proclaimed in 1941.¹ It was President Roosevelt himself who translated freedom from fear in world terms to mean "a world-wide reduction of armaments to such a point and in such a thorough fashion that no nation will be in a position to commit an act of physical aggression against any neighbor—anywhere in the world."

If we want a disarmed world, we must insist that all states refrain from the use of force or the threat of force as an instrument of national or ideological policy. An effective disarmament program must be conceived with a determination to strengthen the peace and reduce the possibility of war, not as a haggling process to determine the kinds of arms which may be used in the next war or to gain a strategic advantage at the start of the next war or to reduce the costs of preparing for war. If we want to make progress towards disarmament, states must come to rely for their strength, as for their welfare, not on the number of battalions or weapons they have ready to unleash on a moment's notice, but on the health, happiness, and economic efficiency of their people in peacetime.

The other four principles which we enumerated in our paper refer to the nature of the international agreements necessary to progress toward the disarmament goals mentioned in our first two principles.

3. These international agreements must bind all states to reduce their armed forces to levels and restrict their armaments to types and quantities no more or greater than may be necessary for the maintenance of internal order and the fulfillment of their obligations to maintain peace and security in accordance with the Charter.

4. These international agreements must provide a comprehensive and coordinate disarmament program, balanced throughout the process of reduction so as to avoid any disequilibrium of power dangerous to the peace and envisaging the progressive and concurrent elimination of mass armed forces and all instruments adaptable to mass destruction, including atomic and bacteriological.

5. These international agreements must provide effective safeguards to insure that all phases of the disarmament program are carried out. In particular, the elimination of atomic weapons must be accomplished by an effective system of international control of atomic energy to insure that atomic energy is used for peaceful purposes only.

6. The safeguards provided in these international agreements must include an effective system of progressive and continuing disclosure and verification of all armed forces and armaments including atomic, to achieve the open world in which alone there can be effective disarmament.

We not only outlined the principles and objectives of a comprehensive disarmament program. We submitted a number of working papers making concrete suggestions as to how they could be carried out in practice.

System of Disclosure and Verification of All Armed Forces and Armaments

The General Assembly resolution had directed the Disarmament Commission to consider from the outset plans for progressive disclosure and verification, the implementation of which was recognized as a first and indispensable step in carrying out the disarmament program envisaged by the resolution. In order to assist the Commission in complying with this directive, the United States submitted to the Commission on April 5, 1952, a working paper containing "Proposals for Progressive and Continuing Disclosure and Verification of Armed Forces and Armaments"¹ (DC/20, pp. 30-42).

A system of progressive and continuing disclosure and verification is, as the General Assembly has declared, an essential part of any plan for "guaranteed disarmament." Such a system is necessary to provide the basis for effective safeguards and realistic controls to insure that agreed disarmament becomes actual disarmament.

The system of disclosure and verification suggested in the U. S. working paper is continuing, progressive, and complete, and would, under competent international control, provide advance warning against violations. The system covers all armed forces and all armaments, including atomic from the very start.

We suggested that disclosure and verification should be carried out progressively, step by step. We suggested the system should proceed by stages not because we wanted to proceed at a snail's pace but because we know that in the present state of world tension no state would tear the veil of secrecy from its most carefully guarded security arrangements unless it could be satisfied that all states are proceeding with the same good faith and the same understanding and at the same pace. The concept of stages is introduced not to delay and obstruct, but to facilitate and expedite progress and to establish confidence.

Our paper suggested five stages in all, each stage to follow when the previous stage has been satisfactorily completed. This concept of stages was intended to protect all states in the event of a serious violation or collapse of the program by providing a check on the good faith of other states. The disclosure and verification system, we believe, should proceed from the less secret to the more secret information, both to prevent premature disclosure of more secret information until substantial cooperation and good faith had been demonstrated through the working of the previous stage, and also because the less secret information can be more readily verified. We sought to provide that the information disclosed in the atomic field at successive stages should be approximately parallel to the information disclosed in the nonatomic field.

We have tried to make the first step in both fields a meaningful stride toward the goal of confidence. The first stage would disclose in breadth, although not in depth, the general contours of the military establishments of all nations. And the first stage includes so much information of a quantitative nature that the disclosures in the atomic field, for example, would give a clear indication of existing atomic strength—our own and that of other countries. That first stage calls for a verified report on the existing strength of all armed forces as well as on the location of installations and facilities required for the production of armaments of all types, including atomic. The successful completion of this first stage would do more to inspire international confidence and reduce tensions than any amount of words could ever accomplish.

The second stage would provide detailed information on the organization of armed forces and on the installations and facilities supplying the basic materials required to produce all armaments, including atomic. The third stage would give detailed information on armaments (except novel armaments which were not in general use by the end of World War II but are in volume production today), as well as detailed disclosure of kinds and amounts of fissionable material, and full data on the operation of installations and facilities which produce armaments and fissionable material. The fourth stage would give information in detail concerning the installations and facilities used to produce novel armaments, including atomic weapons. And the fifth stage would provide detailed disclosure of the novel armaments themselves and of atomic weapons.

The Soviet representative in the Disarmament Commission refused to give serious attention to our working paper on disclosure and verification and at the same time failed to submit any alternative proposals of his own to carry out the directions of the General Assembly that plans for disclosure and verification be considered from the outset. The Soviet representative characterized our effort to develop a workable system of disclosure and verification as a gigantic intelligence and espionage operation bearing no relation to disarmament. It is true, of course, that states have become so accustomed to living in the dark that they have become suspicious of the light. But it is truly impossible to see how, in our imperfect world, we can make real progress toward disarmament so long as the Soviet Union is unwilling even to consider means of moving toward agreement on a workable, continuing, progressive process of disclosure and verification. Responsible governments cannot be expected to agree to cut down their own defenses unless through an effective disclosure and verification process they are reliably informed as to where such cuts will in fact leave them in relation to the armed forces of other countries.

The Soviet representative on the Commission also criticized our proposals on the ground that the atomic disclosures were relegated to a remote and indefinite stage. Actually there is a considerable amount of atomic disclosure in the very first stage. But the Soviet representative seemed more concerned to find reasons for rejecting our proposals than to open up any avenues for possible agreement.

We recognized that there might be differences as to the stages and the speed with which the program passes from one stage to another. We contemplated that as soon as one stage was finished the next would begin. We believed that with genuine cooperation on the part of all states, all the stages could be completed within 2 years. The purpose of providing stages was to facilitate the process by creating confidence. In order that there be mutual confidence, there must be disclosure by degrees so that all nations are free of the fear that one nation is getting more knowledge than another or that the process is in any way inequitable.

We tried, in submitting the plan, to make clear that it was a working paper, that we were open to suggestion, and that we wanted to find out what sort of safeguards we could collectively devise. We tried to make it clear that the proposed system of disclosure and verification was not intended to exclude or delay reductions in armed forces and armaments or eliminations of weapons adaptable to mass destruction, but on the contrary was intended to provide the necessary ground work for such reductions and eliminations.

Ceilings on All Armed Forces

On May 28, 1952, the United States, the United Kingdom, and France submitted to the Disarmament Commission proposals suggesting the fixing of numerical limits on all armed forces of all states¹ (DC/20, pp. 125-130).

The tripartite working paper of May 28 made clear that we are prepared to grapple earnestly and sincerely not only with the problems of safeguards but with substantive measures to secure drastic and balanced reductions in armed strength.

The tripartite working paper of May 28 dealt with one of the essential parts, in some ways the most important part, of a comprehensive disarmament program: the manpower strength of the armed forces.

A nation's armed forces are not the only measure of its armed strength. Other elements must be dealt with in any comprehensive disarmament program. But aggressors are not likely to go to war without the armed forces necessary to insure the successful accomplishment of their aggressive purposes. All armaments depend upon manpower, and their effectiveness in varying degrees is affected by the armed forces available to use them. A substantial and balanced reduction of armed forces should greatly lessen the likelihood and fear of war. If even tentative agreement could be reached on the ceilings to be placed on permitted armed forces, we felt that would greatly facilitate efforts to agree on reducing and restricting the quantities and types of permitted armaments.

Our tripartite working paper suggested fixed numerical ceilings on the armed forces of the United States, the U.S.S.R., China, the United Kingdom, and France. As a basis for discussion, it proposed equal maximum ceilings of between 1,000,000 and 1,500,000 for the United States, the U.S.S.R., and China, and equal maximum ceilings of between 700,000 and 800,000 for the United Kingdom and France. The reductions proposed were substantial and balanced. They sought to avoid a disequilibrium of power dangerous to international peace in the relations of the great powers among themselves or with other states, and thus to reduce the danger of war. The reductions for the United States and, we assumed, for the U.S.S.R. and China would be well over 50 percent. We felt if that could be secured there would be less likelihood of any powerful country being in a position where others would fear its readiness for war or its capability for a surprise attack.

The tripartite working paper also suggested that there should be agreed maximum ceilings for all other states having substantial armed forces which should be fixed in relation to the ceilings agreed upon for the Five Powers. The ceilings would be fixed in these cases also with a view to avoiding a disequilibrium of power dangerous to international peace and security in any area of the world, and thus reducing the danger of war. We contemplated that the ceilings would normally be less than 1 percent of the population and would normally be less than the current levels. But we recognized that there would be special cases requiring different treatment and that there is no one automatic formula which can be rigidly applied in all cases. The basic objective must be the avoidance of any imbalance of power dangerous to the peace.

Many of the present difficulties both in Europe and in Asia spring from an imbalance of armed strength which causes some nations to feel that they live only by leave or grace of their more powerful and none too friendly neighbors. If a balanced reduction of arms is to reduce both the fear and danger of aggression it must take into account the balance of armed strength of the most powerful states not only in relation to one another but also in relation to their neighbors.

The numerical limitations proposed were flexible and were not intended to be final or exhaustive. They were offered not as fixed limitations but as tentative standards to serve as a basis for discussion and negotiation.

These proposals stressed one of our fundamental objectives in the disarmament field. We would eliminate as far as possible the danger of resort to war by reducing the practicability of successful aggression. Genuine enforcement of agreed levels of armaments would prevent excessive concentrations of military power which endanger peace and security.

We believed our proposals to be eminently fair and deserving of study. It was a great disappointment to us that the Soviet representative in the Disarmament Commission gave them scant consideration and denounced them as cynical and hypocritical. The Soviet representative also criticized and misrepresented them on the ground that they did not deal with the distribution of the permitted armed forces among the various services nor provide for the limitation of armaments and the prohibition of weapons of mass destruction. He ignored the fact that our working paper and our statements in the Commission made clear that our paper was intended to deal with only one aspect of a comprehensive disarmament program and that the other essential components which he mentioned were to be dealt with before we concluded our work. But unfortunately the Soviet representative again showed more concern to find reasons for rejecting our proposals than to find possible avenues toward agreement.

Distribution of Armed Forces and Limitations on Types and Quantities of Armaments

On August 12, 1952, the United States again joined with France and the United Kingdom in submitting a tripartite supplement to the tripartite working paper on ceilings for the armed forces¹ (DC/20, pp. 162-164).

In this supplement we proposed to prevent undue concentration of the permitted armed forces in particular categories of service and to limit armaments in types and quantities to those necessary and appropriate to support permitted armed forces. We suggested practical procedures to facilitate the development of mutually agreed programs to accomplish these purposes and to bring all essential components of these programs into balanced relationship.

We specifically suggested that if our proposals for fixing numerical limitations on all armed forces were accepted and the powers principally concerned were prepared to undertake in good faith serious negotiations looking towards their implementation, arrangements might be made for a conference of the Five Great Powers which are permanent members of the Security Council with a view to reaching tentative agreement among themselves by negotiation on—

The distribution by principal categories of the armed forces that they would consider necessary and appropriate to maintain within the agreed ceilings proposed for their armed forces;

The types and quantities of armaments which they would consider necessary and appropriate to support permitted armed forces within the proposed numerical ceilings;

The elimination of all armed forces and armaments other than those expressly permitted, it being understood that all major weapons adaptable to mass destruction should be eliminated and atomic energy should be placed under effective international control to insure its use for peaceful purposes only.

We further proposed that following a Five Power conference, regional conferences might be held attended by all governments and authorities having substantial military forces in the respective regions. In light of the tentative agreement reached by the Five Great Powers, the regional conference would endeavor to reach similar tentative agreement on the above-mentioned subjects, including agreement on the over-all numerical ceilings for the armed forces of all governments and authorities in the region.

We proposed that all these agreements should be incorporated in a draft treaty comprehending and bringing into balanced relationship all essential components of the disarmament program.

In our paper we recognized that the needs and responsibilities of states are different. Considerable flexibility in negotiation would be necessary to obtain concrete and satisfactory results. The important thing is to obtain the greatest practicable reduction in armed forces and armaments in order to reduce the danger and fear of war, bearing in mind the necessity of avoiding throughout the process of reduction any serious imbalance or disequilibrium of power dangerous to international peace and security in any part of the world.

In order to clarify the concept of balanced relationship between the essential components of a comprehensive disarmament program, the tripartite supplement suggested that the timing and coordination of the reductions, prohibitions, and eliminations should insure that there would be balanced reductions of over-all armed strength at all stages throughout the disarmament process until the agreed limits are reached. In particular, the initial limitations or reductions in armed forces and in permitted armaments should commence at the same time as the first steps toward the elimination of prohibited armaments, with synchronization throughout the process. The elimination of prohibited armaments would cover the elimination of all major weapons adaptable to mass destruction, whatever their nature, including the elimination of atomic weapons as the result of an effective system of international control of atomic energy. In order to oversee the job, the tripartite supplement proposed that an international control authority should be established at the commencement of the program, assuming progressively its functions to insure the carrying out of these limitations, reductions, curtailments, and prohibitions.

This concept of synchronization throughout the disarmament process is necessarily stated in general terms, for the details depend upon working out the specific reduction process in each field. Of course the United States, France, and the United Kingdom do not seek to gain any advantage, imagined or real, which might give the preponderance of military power to the West at the expense of other powers.

The synchronization of the disarmament process must be designed to further the concept of balanced reduction which avoids a disequilibrium of power. It applies to atomic weapons, to artillery, to bacteriological weapons, to mass armies.

In this context, as throughout the entire program, effective and balanced disarmament must be viewed as a means of reducing the danger and fear of war, not as a bargaining process to obtain strategic advantages in event of war.

Unfortunately, the Soviet representative on the Disarmament Commission refused to accept the tripartite working paper with the supplement, even as a basis of discussion.

International Control of Atomic Energy

The United States has always considered that a system for the effective international control of atomic energy is an indispensable component of any disarmament program.

The United States took a leading part in developing the U.N. plan for the control of atomic energy.¹ That plan was the product of a thorough study in the U.N. Atomic Energy Commission. It was approved by an overwhelming vote in the General Assembly.² It should be reiterated that the U.N. plan would provide for elimination and prohibition, through effective international control procedures of all the various types of weapons based on the release of atomic energy, and the plan's references to control of atomic energy should be read throughout in that light.

The General Assembly at its last session directed the Disarmament Commission to use the U.N. plan as the basis of the Commission's deliberations until a better or no less effective plan is devised. The General Assembly further directed the Commission to consider any proposals regarding atomic-energy control which might be submitted to it.³

The United States has continued to support the U.N. atomic-energy plan as the best plan presently available. But we made it clear in the Disarmament Commission that in no sense do we regard the plan as immutable and incapable of change and improvement. The United States reaffirmed its willingness to examine seriously and with an open mind any proposals for atomic control which might be presented.

We did more. In our working paper proposing a continuing and progressive system of disclosure and verification of armed forces and armaments, the United States expressly included atomic armaments.⁴ The system of disclosure and verification proposed lays the ground work for continuing inspection. Other elements of control are of course very important and necessary in the field, but any plan must include a process of continuing inspection. Any international system for the control of atomic energy, whatever its nature, must involve extensive disclosure and verification as part of a process of continuing inspection.

The Soviet Union has rejected the U.N. atomic-energy plan, but has proposed no acceptable alternative. It has objected particularly to the ownership and other control features of the U.N. plan, contending that control should involve only continuing inspection. But in the Disarmament Commission the Soviet Union has refused to explain in any detail the kind of continuing inspection plan which would be acceptable to it, and it was unwilling even to consider our suggestions for continuing disclosure and verification in the atomic field or any other field.

The concept of disclosure and verification which includes continuing inspection provides an indispensable first step in laying the ground work for any control plan in the atomic field. Until the Soviet Union is willing to consider this concept little progress can be made toward determining what other elements of control, those contained in the U.N. plan or others, may be necessary. We are interested in controls not for the sake of controls nor as an end in itself. We are interested in controls as a necessary means for effectively eliminating atomic weapons from national arsenals.

Elimination of Weapons Adaptable to Mass Destruction, Including Bacteriological Weapons

The United States made clear in the Disarmament Commission that in its view a comprehensive disarmament program should include not only the effective international control of atomic energy to insure the elimination of atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only but the elimination of all major weapons adaptable to mass destruction, including bacteriological weapons. This position we reiterated in our proposal on essential principles and in both the tripartite proposal and supplement.¹

Beginning with the very first meeting of the Disarmament Commission in New York the Soviet Union sought to poison the atmosphere of the Commission and obscure the clear and unequivocal position of the United States on this subject by making false and sensational charges that U.S. troops were conducting germ warfare in Korea and China. The Soviet Union sought to leave the false impression that the United States was opposing any effort in the United Nations to devise ways and means of eliminating bacteriological weapons as a part of a disarmament program.

The monstrously false charges regarding the use of germ warfare in Korea and China, which were completely irrelevant to the disarmament discussions, were categorically denied by the Unified Command and by the highest U.S. officials. The United States invited the International Committee of the Red Cross to investigate the charges. But the North Korean authorities and the Chinese Communist authorities ignored the offer of the International Committee of the Red Cross to make an investigation. When the United States sought to have the Security Council request the Red Cross to make such investigation, the Soviet Union vetoed the proposal.²

On August 15, 1952, I made in the Disarmament Commission a statement³ fully explaining the position of the United States on bacteriological disarmament and in particular on the adequacy of the

Geneva protocol¹ as a means of securing bacteriological disarmament. I tried to make clear our conviction that the objectives of the protocol could not be more worthy or laudable, but—and this cannot be repeated too often—that the protocol does not provide security against the manufacture, the stockpiling, and the use of bacteriological weapons. The Soviet representative placed great stress on the Geneva protocol in the Disarmament Commission and it was brought to the attention of the Seventh General Assembly in the item introduced by the Polish representative which as of this writing has not yet been considered. It might be useful to repeat here certain portions of my statement of August 15 to the Disarmament Commission:

“It would be a grave mistake to assume that, because the United States has not ratified the Geneva protocol, the United States is opposed to the general objective of the treaty, the effective outlawing of poisonous gas and biological weapons directed against human beings. . . .

“Our sympathy with the general objective of the Geneva protocol should not blind us to the fact that intervening events have demonstrated the protocol to be inadequate and ineffective to achieve its objective. The hope entertained at the end of World War I that states could rely upon treaty promises and treaty declarations without safeguards to insure their observance has turned out to be illusory. Mussolini was no more deterred from using poisonous gas in Ethiopia in the 1930's by the Geneva protocol, which Italy had accepted, than was Germany deterred from using poisonous gas in World War I by the Hague conventions,² which Germany had accepted.

“It was shocking to hear the Soviet representative in the Security Council suggest that Hitler was deterred from using poisonous gas and bacteriological warfare in World War II by the Geneva protocol, when we know that Hitler and his henchmen adhered to no treaty or law of God or of man which they believed they could successfully ignore. Would the Soviet representative have us believe that the men who consigned defenseless women, old men, and little children to the gas chambers would have respected the Geneva protocol, save for their fears of reprisals? Winston Churchill did not think so. Marshal Voroshilov did not think so when he stated on February 22, 1938:

“Ten years ago or more the Soviet Union signed a convention abolishing the use of poison gas and bacteriological weapons. To that we still adhere but if our enemies use such methods against us I tell you we are prepared and fully prepared to use them also and to use them against aggressors on their own soil.’ . . .

¹ Protocol for the Prohibition of the Use in War of Asphyxiating, Poisonous, or Other Gases, and of Bacteriological Methods of Warfare, June 17, 1925; League of Nations Treaty Series, vol. 94, pp. 65-74. The United States did not ratify this protocol.

² Article XIII of the Annex to the Hague Convention of July 29, 1899, forbade belligerents to employ “poison or poisoned arms”. This provision was also incorporated in article XXIII of the Hague Convention of Oct. 18, 1907; Treaties, Conventions, International Acts, Protocols and Agreements Between the United States of America and Other Powers, 1776-1909, vol. II, William M. Malloy, ed. (Washington, 1910), pp. 2052 and 2285.

those promises stands in the way of their accomplishing their aggressive designs.

"If men fight to kill, it is not easy to regulate how they shall kill. Moreover, there is the danger that if we prohibit the use of some weapons, even more hideous weapons may be discovered and used. We want to eliminate, and we have submitted proposals for the elimination of, all weapons which are not expressly permitted as necessary and appropriate to support the limited number of armed forces which may be permitted to states to maintain public order and to meet their Charter obligations.

"In civilized communities the deliberate and unprovoked killing of man by man is murder regardless of the kind of weapon used to kill. In a civilized world, deliberate and unprovoked aggression which causes the killing of masses of men should be regarded as mass murder regardless of the kinds of weapons used. That is the theory of the Charter of the United Nations and that is the rule of law which we here in the Disarmament Commission should seek to implement. That is the way we can best attain the unrealized objective of the Geneva protocol.

"All members of the United Nations have agreed to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations. The United States as a member of the United Nations has committed itself, as have all other members, to refrain from not only the use of poisonous gas and the use of germ warfare but the use of force of any kind contrary to the law of the Charter. And by that commitment the United States intends to abide and has a right to expect other members to abide. The United States condemns not only the use of germ and gas warfare but the use of force of any kind contrary to the law of the Charter.

"Let it not be said that there is no way to determine when force is being used contrary to the law of the Charter. If the Security Council does not act, the sentiments of the civilized world can be recorded in the General Assembly as the Uniting for Peace resolution¹ provides.

"We hope here in this Disarmament Commission to agree upon measures of disarmament to reduce the possibility of aggression and make war inherently, as it is constitutionally under the Charter, impossible as a means of settling disputes between nations. That is why throughout our discussions, as representative of the United States, I have insisted that we must approach the problem of disarmament from the point of view of preventing war and not from the point of view of regulating the armaments to be used in war. . . .

"My Government hopes we are going to work out here measures of disarmament as a means of preventing war. My Government does not believe that we should interrupt this work to inform any would-be aggressor state, which may contemplate using force contrary to its Charter commitments, what kind of force law-abiding states will or will not use to suppress aggression.

"We have pointed out that the Soviet Union and other states which ratified the Geneva protocol reserved the right to employ poisonous gas and germ warfare in reprisal. We have pointed out that the Soviet Union and other states which have ratified the Geneva protocol have conducted research work and made other preparations for the use of poisonous gas and bacteriological warfare. In view of the proved inadequacies of the Geneva protocol we do not criticize the Soviet Union or other states parties to the protocol for these precautionary measures.

"But we do criticize the . . . Soviet Union for attacking the United States for taking the same precautionary measures. We do criticize and condemn the . . . Soviet Union for making false charges that the United States is using bacteriological warfare in Korea. We do criticize and condemn the . . . Soviet Union for conducting a hate-mongering campaign against the United States, which is, as I have previously stated, sadly reminiscent of Hitler's hate-mongering campaign against the Czechs before Munich.

"We do not criticize the humane and worthy objective of the Geneva protocol. But we do not trust the promises of those who forswear on paper the use of germ warfare save in reprisal and then make deliberate and false charges that others are using germ warfare. We do not trust the paper promises of those who bear false witnesses [sic] against their neighbors. We do not trust the paper promises of those who do not hesitate to break their treaty promises when it serves their ideological ends. We have no reason to believe that those who have made deliberately false charges against us would have been loath to make the same false charges against us if we had ratified the Geneva protocol. And that is particularly true when their false charges provide false excuses for breaking their own promises on alleged grounds of reprisals.

"Our purpose is not to discredit the worthy objective of the Geneva protocol but to find means adequate and effective to attain its objective. The United States has never used germ warfare. The United States has never used gas warfare save in retaliation in the First World War when it was first used by Germany. In the last World War, President Roosevelt condemned the use of poisonous gas and issued strict orders that it should not be used except in retaliation. The United States has not used gas or germ warfare in Korea. The charges that it has are monstrous falsehoods and those that make them are unwilling to have them investigated by an impartial body. The record of the United States is clear and clean, and no state that keeps its Charter obligations has anything to fear from the United States in this regard.

"It is not without significance that in both of the two wars in the Twentieth Century in which poison gas was used, its use was inaugurated by states which had bound themselves on paper not to use it. If the history of the last half century teaches us anything, it teaches us that aggressor states which start wars in violation of their treaty obligations cannot be trusted to keep their paper promises regarding the methods of waging wars if they find that the keeping of

"I hope my remarks will not be misunderstood. We are issuing no ultimatums. We are making no threats. We will support effective proposals to eliminate all weapons adaptable to mass destruction, including atomic, chemical, and biological weapons from national armaments. We believe, as the Soviet delegation maintained in 1932, that paramount importance should be attached, 'not to the prohibition of chemical weapons in war time, but to the prohibition of chemical warfare in peace time' and that 'efforts should be directed not so much to the framing of laws and usages of war as to the prohibition of as many lethal substances and appliances as possible.' . . .

"Certainly there is no assurance that aggressors, which break their Charter obligations not to go to war, will keep their paper promises not to fight with certain weapons if they have them and need them to achieve their evil designs.

"The task of the Disarmament Commission is, as the United States points out in its proposals setting forth the Essential Principles of a Disarmament Program,¹ to devise measures to insure that 'armed forces and armaments will be reduced to such a point and in such a thorough fashion that no state will be in a condition of armed preparedness to start a war' and that 'no state will be in a position to undertake preparations for war without other states having knowledge of such preparations long before the offending state could start a war.' We do not believe that it is the function of the Disarmament Commission to attempt to codify the laws of war. But obviously if it attempted to do so it would have to deal with the whole range of weapons and methods of warfare to be prescribed, the machinery necessary to secure the observance of the rules, and the matter of sanctions, reprisals, and retaliation in case of violation."

It should be emphasized that it was the Soviet Union which in 1928 proposed an additional protocol which would outlaw the methods and appliances utilized to wage poison-gas and bacteriological warfare and the industrial undertakings engaged in the production of the weapons, as well as the use of such weapons. It was the Soviet Union itself which observed, in the Disarmament Conferences in 1932, that mere legal prohibitions are "inadequate and of merely secondary importance." The Soviet delegate said, at that time, "Consequently efforts should be directed not so much to the framing of laws and usages of war as to the prohibition of as many lethal substances and appliances as possible. This is the point of view which the Soviet Union will continue to represent. . . ."

In the U.S. statement of August 15 we outlined a proposal for the elimination of bacteriological weapons and facilities for their production which could be made effective as part of a comprehensive program, a plan which would not merely prohibit the use of bacteriological weapons but would provide assurance and safeguards that such weapons would not be available for use. On September 4, 1952, the United States presented a summary of these proposals as a working paper to the Commission¹ (DC/20, pp. 191-192).

The plan we suggested for the elimination of bacteriological weapons and facilities for their production is inseparably connected with an effective and continuous system of disclosure and verification of all armed forces and armaments such as we have proposed. Such a comprehensive system of disclosure and verification would lay the necessary ground work for the elimination of germ weapons and facilities for their use and production, within the framework of a comprehensive disarmament program. It may be true that there are no theoretically foolproof safeguards which would prevent the concoction of some deadly germs in an apothecary's shop in the dark hours of night. But when the United States proposed the establishment of safeguards to insure the elimination of germ warfare along with the elimination of mass armed forces and all weapons adaptable to mass destruction, we sought what is possible and practical, not the impossible. Bacteriological weapons to be effective in modern warfare would require more than the dropping at random of a few infected spiders, flies, or fleas. They would require industrial establishments, facilities for maintaining agents, transport containers, and disseminating appliances. Such arrangements and facilities will not readily escape detection under an effective, comprehensive, and continuous system of disclosure and verification which the General Assembly has declared to be a necessary prerequisite of any comprehensive disarmament program.

We therefore proposed in our working paper of September 4 that at appropriate stages in an effective system of disclosure and verification agreed measures should become effective providing for the progressive curtailment of production, the progressive dismantling of plants, and the progressive destruction of stockpiles of bacteriological weapons and related appliances. Under this program, with cooperation in good faith by the principal states concerned, all bacteriological weapons and all facilities connected therewith could be eliminated from national armaments and thus not only their use but their very existence prohibited.

If we wish to achieve effective disarmament and to reduce the danger and fear of war we must not be content with paper promises not to use weapons of mass destruction. Such promises would only give to treaty-breaking aggressors their choice of weapons. We must see to it that prohibited weapons are not available for use.

The "Phantom" Proposals of the Soviet Union

At the seventh session of the General Assembly the Polish delegation reintroduced the proposals which the Soviet delegation presented to the sixth General Assembly and which that Assembly referred to the Disarmament Commission. These same proposals had been submitted by the Soviet Union to previous assemblies, which refused to accept them, and in the Disarmament Commission the Soviet Union failed to elaborate their proposals or to offer any new arguments in support of them.

The Soviet proposals may be described as "phantom" or "ghost" proposals because like ghosts they constantly appear and reappear, but one can never catch hold of them. They are shadowy and elusive, and it is impossible to state precisely just what they are or are intended to be. They call upon the Five Great Powers to reduce their armed forces within 1 year by one-third and to submit full data on their armaments. They call for immediate adoption of a decision on the unconditional prohibition of atomic weapons and other weapons of mass destruction and the establishment of strict international control over the observance of that decision by all states, with the right of the international control organ to conduct inspection on a continuing basis but not to interfere in the domestic affairs of states.

Now inasmuch as no data whatsoever are forthcoming until these decisions are taken, states cannot determine in advance how the reductions which are supposed to be made will leave them in relation to the armed strength of other states. Nor has the Soviet Union ever sought to explain how the simple one-third reduction would be applied to all the complicated components which make up the armed strength of a nation. On their face, the proposals would perpetuate and not remove any imbalance of power which now exists and no machinery is provided for the implementation of even the vague promises called for in the proposals.

Since the proposals call for the prohibition of the atomic weapons and other weapons of mass destruction and only a one-third reduction in conventional armaments, the proposals would in fact enormously increase the relative armed strength of states with large mass armies. The proposals run counter to the basic principles of a balanced reduction in armaments. Certainly the Soviet Union would object if we reversed their proposals and called upon the Soviet Union and all other states to abolish immediately all armed forces and nonatomic armaments, and to reduce existing stocks of atomic weapons by one-third.

While the proposals profess to recognize the necessity of an international control organ having some control over their observance, the Soviet Union has refused not only in the Assembly but in the Disarmament Commission to discuss any concrete measures of international control. While insisting that a U.N. control organ must not interfere in domestic affairs, the Soviet Union has refused to explain what it means by interference in domestic affairs. It has branded any effort on our part to work out a system of disclosure and verification as an intelligence and espionage operation, despite the fact that the General Assembly has declared that such a system is a prerequisite to any program of guaranteed disarmament. It was impossible in the Disarmament Commission to prevail upon the Soviet representative to explain what the Soviet proposals for strict international control meant.

A few instances from the record of the proceedings in the Disarmament Commission will serve to illustrate the evasiveness of the Soviet representative in giving any explanation of the "phantom" Soviet proposals.

On April 4, the representative of France requested the Soviet reprenative to clarify two points. First, the meaning of the proposal at prohibition and establishment of control should come into effect simultaneously—did it mean that prohibition began the day agreements were signed, or when the control organ was actually in a position to operate? And, second, the precise implications of the proposal at the international control organ undertake “continuous inspection” without interference in the domestic affairs of States—in other words, what constitutes continuous control, and how is it to be limited as not to interfere in domestic affairs?

The Soviet representative replied that the purpose of the questions was to obscure these concrete proposals, since they are abundantly clear to any objective person who has long been acquainted with them and since there is nothing obscure about them. They can only be obscure to someone who does not wish to understand them, is opposing the reduction of armaments and the prohibition of atomic weapons, and for this purpose is still, as before, finding various pretexts.”

The Soviet representative then stated that noninterference was self-explanatory—he termed it “a very clear and precise formulation”—and that simultaneous prohibition and control was also self-explanatory, meaning that the two would be introduced simultaneously (DC/C.1/V.1, pp. 4, 5, 24, 25, 26).

At the meeting on April 9, the representative of the United Kingdom asked if the “decision to announce the prohibition of atomic weapons and the establishment of controls” meant a broad agreement that an organ would be set up, or that a detailed plan for operations, specifying rights and duties of the organ and of states, will have been at that stage accepted by the governments and written into the decision. Regarding the question of interference in domestic affairs, he cited the uniquely restrictive attitude of the U.S.S.R. toward what free societies consider normal practices and asked for a precise understanding of the Soviet proviso. He asked for an unequivocal statement of the Soviet Union’s attitude on this point which we could then discuss dispassionately and objectively.

At the same meeting the representative of Canada repeated the questions his delegation had asked the Soviet representative at the sixth General Assembly, in order to secure the clarification of the Soviet proposals which had not been furnished at that time.

In answering these questions, the Soviet representative repeated in substance Mr. Vyshinsky’s reply at the sixth Assembly to the same questions. He said the questions showed “some conspiracy among delegations not willing to discuss the question of the prohibition of atomic weapons and the question of control.” He went on to say, “The raising of these questions was in itself a device to avoid discussion of the substance of the U.S.S.R. proposals . . . in order to obscure the issue, they bombarded the Soviet Union delegation with questions. That same device is being repeated now. Instead of a definite discussion of the clear-cut U.S.S.R. proposals, artificial questions are being asked . . .” He called it playing at questions and answers.

And at the same meeting, we ourselves asked the Soviet representative to state clearly his conception of international control. We asked if the Soviet control proposal contemplated national or international ownership of fissionable material, and national or international ownership, operation, and management of facilities producing dangerous quantities of fissionable material. Would the international control organ have the right to station inspectors continuously at any particular installation? Could inspectors be sent wherever and whenever the control organ considered it necessary? Could the control organ "interfere" with the freedom of a state so far as might be necessary to insure that there was no possible evasion or violation?

In reply, the Soviet representative stated it was necessary to agree on principles before replying to our questions. As long as we did not abandon the U.N. plan, there was no point in discussing a system of inspection on a continuing basis. As he said, "This is the fundamental issue, and until we get beyond it there is no point in discussing details of the how, why, and wherefore. . . . Until we clear up this basic question, until we reach agreement on it, there is no point in considering the details."

Similarly, he insisted there must be agreement on a "decision" to prohibit atomic weapons before "discussing details and particular points." (DC/C.1/PV.2, pp. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 30, 31, 35, 36.)

On May 8 the representative of France made one more attempt. He asked for a yes or no answer to the question of whether by "continuing inspection" the Soviet representative actually meant that international inspectors could be stationed day and night in all atomic-energy establishments, at all stages of production, so that we are assured that at no stage of production can any quantity of fissionable material, however small, be diverted for the clandestine manufacture of bombs.

The Soviet representative replied, "When the United States and France . . . are prepared to withdraw this obsolete, unacceptable and worthless proposal," meaning the U.N. plan, "then I shall be prepared to give a concrete explanation of how we think control and continuing inspection should be carried out. As long as our approach to the question remains so utterly different, there is no need for me to give any details" (DC/C.1/PV.4, pp. 28, 33).

At the meeting on May 14, the representative of the United Kingdom tried again, asking the same questions, hoping, as he said, to convince the Soviet delegation that its position was genuinely obscure. The Soviet representative replied as before. "The details," he said, "can and should only be discussed when we have reached agreement on the system to be adopted." Until such time as the U.N. plan is abandoned, he said, "it is futile to discuss the details of a system of control on a permanent basis. It would be so much idle talk. That is how the matter stands on this question" (DC/C.1/PV.6, pp. 6, 12).

There were other attempts by members of the Commission to elicit some reasoned explanation of the Soviet proposals. They were all met the same way. The vague and unexplained slogans which constitute the Soviet proposals must be accepted before any details could be given.

The Soviet proposals remain, as they have always been, "phantom" proposals, elusive shadows without substance.

CONCLUSION

Despite the lack of progress toward agreement among the Great Powers on disarmament, we must not be discouraged.

The United States and other members of the Disarmament Commission worked hard to secure a better understanding of the problems which must be met if we are to move toward a disarmed world free from the danger and fear of war. The constructive proposals submitted to the Disarmament Commission during the past year make a significant contribution to the better understanding of these problems.

We do not contend that the constructive proposals thus far presented to the Commission would solve all the problems. They were not intended to be final and definitive in terms or complete and exhaustive in details. They were intended only to provide the basis for discussion and to open up avenues by which we might approach understanding and agreement. To keep the road to understanding and agreement open to new approaches, we sought to avoid freezing our positions or taking inflexible stands.

As the Secretary of State of the United States stated in his opening address in the general debate:

"... disarmament cannot be achieved unilaterally. It cannot be achieved by denunciation in a battle of epithets. It can be achieved only by international agreements under effective safeguards which will protect law-abiding states from the hazards of violations and evasions."¹

The Disarmament Commission cannot force disarmament agreements upon recalcitrant states. It cannot bridge deep and fundamental differences by linguistic sleight of hand. Excessive zeal to obtain agreements which gloss over rather than resolve these differences may even increase the tensions and fears which stand in the way of necessary understanding.

In the interest of world peace it is important to continue, through the Disarmament Commission and in every other way open to us, efforts to develop a better understanding of the problems of armaments, and the significance of disarmament as a means of reducing the danger and fears of war. There is reason to believe that, with the development of better understanding of these problems, the overwhelming common interest of all peoples in peace and the instinct of self-preservation will induce the statesmen of all nations to save their peoples from the horrors of war in the twentieth century. For as new instruments of warfare may be developed which would far surpass previous weapons in terms of sheer destructiveness, it becomes imperative that all nations reexamine their self-interest in these problems. All nations have an equal stake in their solution. For at stake is the survival of our common humanity.

13. NEW IMPETUS FOR DISARMAMENT: Address by the President of the United States, April 16, 1953 (Excerpt)¹

As progress in all these areas strengthens world trust, we could then proceed concurrently with the next great work—the reduction of the burden of armaments now weighing upon the world. To this end we would welcome and enter into the most solemn agreements. These could properly include:

1. The limitation, by absolute numbers or by an agreed international ratio, of the sizes of the military and security forces of all nations.

2. A commitment by all nations to set an agreed limit upon that proportion of total production of certain strategic materials to be devoted to military purposes.

3. International control of atomic energy to promote its use for peaceful purposes only and to insure the prohibition of atomic weapons.

4. A limitation or prohibition of other categories of weapons of great destructiveness.

5. The enforcement of all these agreed limitations and prohibitions by adequate safeguards, including a practical system of inspection under the United Nations.

The details of such disarmament programs are manifestly critical and complex. Neither the United States nor any other nation can properly claim to possess a perfect, immutable formula. But the formula matters less than the faith—the good faith without which no formula can work justly and effectively.

14. ENDORSEMENT OF THE PRESIDENT'S DISARMAMENT PROPOSALS: Resolution of the United States Senate, July 29, 1953²

Whereas the peoples of the earth are plunged into vast armament expenditures which divert much of their effort into the creation of means of mass destruction; and

Whereas the American people and the Congress ardently desire peace and the achievement of a system under which armaments, except for the maintenance of domestic and international order, will become unnecessary while at the same time the national security of our own and other nations will be protected; and

Whereas it is the policy of the Government of the United States to seek the honorable termination of present armed conflicts, and the correction of oppression and injustice and other conditions which breed war; and

Whereas progress in these respects would strengthen world trust so that the nations could proceed with the next great work, the reduction of the burden of armaments now weighing upon the world: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it continues to be the declared purpose of the United States to seek by all peaceful means the conditions for durable peace and concurrently with progress in this respect to seek, within the United Nations, agreements by all nations for enforceable limitation of armament in accordance with the principles set out in the President's address of April 16, 1953,¹ namely—

(1) the limitation, by absolute numbers or by an agreed international ratio, of the sizes of the military and security forces of all nations;

(2) a commitment by all nations to set an agreed limit upon that proportion of total production of certain strategic materials to be devoted to military purposes;

Also, the Department of State sent the resolution to all U. S. diplomatic posts directing them to present copies to the Foreign Offices of the Governments to which they were accredited, and to explain that the resolution was demonstrative of the abiding interest of the Congress and the Executive Branch of the U. S. Government in achieving an agreed disarmament program as an inherent part of a durable peace. See also Department of State Bulletin, Aug. 31, 1953, pp. 299-300.

15. THIRD REPORT OF THE UNITED NATIONS DISARMAMENT COMMISSION, AUGUST 20, 1953¹

1. By General Assembly resolution 704 (VII),² the Disarmament Commission was requested to report to the General Assembly and Security Council not later than 1 September 1953.

2. The Disarmament Commission has held no meetings since the adoption of the General Assembly resolution mentioned in the preceding paragraph, except for a meeting on 20 August 1953.

3. It is hoped that recent international events will create a more propitious atmosphere for the reconsideration of the disarmament question, whose capital importance in conjunction with other questions affecting the maintenance of peace is recognized by all. The Disarmament Commission therefore expects to continue its work and suggests that it present a report to the ninth session of the General Assembly and to the Security Council.

16. REGULATION, LIMITATION, AND BALANCED REDUCTION OF ALL ARMED FORCES AND ALL ARMAMENTS: Resolution 715 (VIII) of the United Nations General Assembly, November 28, 1953³

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming the responsibility of the United Nations for considering the problem of disarmament and affirming the need for providing for:

(a) The regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and all armaments,

(b) The elimination and prohibition of atomic, hydrogen and other types of weapons of mass destruction,

(c) The effective international control of atomic energy to ensure the prohibition of atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only, the whole programme to be carried out under effective international control and in such a way that no State would have cause to fear that its security was endangered,

Believing that the continued development of weapons of mass destruction such as atomic and hydrogen bombs has given additional urgency to efforts to bring about effectively controlled disarmament throughout the world, as the existence of civilization itself may be at stake,

Mindful that progress in the settlement of existing international disputes and the resulting re-establishment of confidence are vital to the attainment of peace and disarmament and that efforts to reach agreement on a comprehensive and co-ordinated disarmament pro-armament with adequate safeguards should be made concurrently with progress in the settlement of international disputes, Believing that progress in either field would contribute to progress in the other,

Realizing that competition in the development of armaments and armed forces beyond what is necessary for the individual or collective security of Member States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations is not only economically unsound but is in itself a grave danger to peace,
Conscious of the continuing desire of all nations, by lightening the burden of armaments, to release more of the world's human and economic resources for peace,
Having received the third report of the Disarmament Commission 20 August 1953,¹ submitted in accordance with General Assembly resolution 704 (VII) of 8 April 1953,²
Endorsing the Commission's hope that recent international events will create a more propitious atmosphere for reconsideration of the disarmament question, the capital importance of which, in conjunction with other questions affecting the maintenance of peace, is recognized by all,

1. Recognizes the general wish and affirms its earnest desire to reach agreement as early as possible on a comprehensive and coordinated plan, under international control, for the regulation, limitation and reduction of all armed forces and all armaments, for the elimination and prohibition of atomic, hydrogen, bacterial, chemical and all such other weapons of war and mass destruction, and for the attainment of these ends through effective measures;
2. Recognizes that, whatever the weapons used, aggression is contrary to the conscience and honour of the peoples and incompatible with membership in the United Nations and is the gravest of all crimes against peace and security throughout the world;
3. Takes note of the third report of the Disarmament Commission;
4. Requests the Commission to continue its efforts to reach agreement on the problems with which it is concerned, taking into consideration proposals made at the eighth session of the General Assembly,³ and to report again to the General Assembly and to the Security Council not later than 1 September 1954;⁴
5. Calls on all Member States, and particularly the major Powers, to intensify their efforts to assist the Disarmament Commission in its tasks and to submit to the Commission any proposals which they have made in the field of disarmament;
6. Suggests that the Disarmament Commission study the desirability of establishing a sub-committee consisting of representatives of

D. ATOMS FOR PEACE, 1953

17. ATOMS FOR PEACE: Address by the President of the United States Before the United Nations General Assembly, December 8, 1953¹

MADAME PRESIDENT, MEMBERS OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY:

When Secretary General Hammarskjöld's invitation to address this General Assembly reached me in Bermuda, I was just beginning a series of conferences with the Prime Ministers and Foreign Ministers of Great Britain and of France. Our subject was some of the problems that beset our world.²

During the remainder of the Bermuda Conference, I had constantly in mind that ahead of me lay a great honor. That honor is mine today as I stand here, privileged to address the General Assembly of the United Nations.

At the same time that I appreciate the distinction of addressing you, I have a sense of exhilaration as I look upon this Assembly.

Never before in history has so much hope for so many people been gathered together in a single organization. Your deliberations and decisions during these somber years have already realized part of those hopes.

But the great tests and the great accomplishments still lie ahead. And in the confident expectation of those accomplishments, I would use the office which, for the time being, I hold, to assure you that the Government of the United States will remain steadfast in its support of this body. This we shall do in the conviction that you will provide a great share of the wisdom, the courage, and the faith which can bring to this world lasting peace for all nations, and happiness and well-being for all men.

Clearly, it would not be fitting for me to take this occasion to present to you a unilateral American report on Bermuda. Nevertheless, I assure you that in our deliberations on that lovely island we sought to invoke those same great concepts of universal peace and human dignity which are so cleanly etched in your Charter.

Neither would it be a measure of this great opportunity merely to recite, however hopefully, pious platitudes.

A DANGER SHARED BY ALL

I therefore decided that this occasion warranted my saying to you some of the things that have been on the minds and hearts of my legislative and executive associates and on mine for a great many months—thoughts I had originally planned to say primarily to the American people.

I know that the American people share my deep belief that if a danger exists in the world, it is a danger shared by all—and equally, that if hope exists in the mind of one nation, that hope should be shared by all.

Finally, if there is to be advanced any proposal designed to ease even by the smallest measure the tensions of today's world, what more appropriate audience could there be than the members of the General Assembly of the United Nations?

I feel impelled to speak today in a language that in a sense is new—one which I, who have spent so much of my life in the military profession, would have preferred never to use.

That new language is the language of atomic warfare.

The atomic age has moved forward at such a pace that every citizen of the world should have some comprehension, at least in comparative terms, of the extent of this development, of the utmost significance to every one of us. Clearly, if the peoples of the world are to conduct an intelligent search for peace, they must be armed with the significant facts of today's existence.

My recital of atomic danger and power is necessarily stated in United States terms, for these are the only incontrovertible facts that I know. I need hardly point out to this Assembly, however, that this subject is global, not merely national in character.

THE FEARFUL POTENTIALS

On July 16, 1945, the United States set off the world's first atomic explosion.

Since that date in 1945, the United States of America has conducted 42 test explosions.

Atomic bombs today are more than 25 times as powerful as the weapons with which the atomic age dawned, while hydrogen weapons are in the ranges of millions of tons of TNT equivalent.

Today, the United States stockpile of atomic weapons, which, of course, increases daily, exceeds by many times the explosive equivalent of the total of all bombs and all shells that came from every plane and every gun in every theatre of war in all of the years of World War II.

A single air group, whether afloat or land-based, can now deliver to any reachable target a destructive cargo exceeding in power all the bombs that fell on Britain in all of World War II.

In size and variety, the development of atomic weapons has been no less remarkable. The development has been such that atomic weapons have virtually achieved conventional status within our armed services. In the United States, the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, and the Marine Corps are all capable of putting this weapon to military use.

But the dread secret, and the fearful engines of atomic might, are not ours alone.

In the first place, the secret is possessed by our friends and allies, Great Britain and Canada, whose scientific genius made a tremendous contribution to our original discoveries, and the designs of atomic bombs.

The secret is also known by the Soviet Union.

The Soviet Union has informed us that, over recent years, it has devoted extensive resources to atomic weapons. During this period, the Soviet Union has exploded a series of atomic devices, including at least one involving thermo-nuclear reactions.

NO MONOPOLY OF ATOMIC POWER

If at one time the United States possessed what might have been called a monopoly of atomic power, that monopoly ceased to exist several years ago. Therefore, although our earlier start has permitted us to accumulate what is today a great quantitative advantage, the atomic realities of today comprehend two facts of even greater significance.

First, the knowledge now possessed by several nations will eventually be shared by others—possibly all others.

Second, even a vast superiority in numbers of weapons, and a consequent capability of devastating retaliation, is no preventive, of itself, against the fearful material damage and toll of human lives that would be inflicted by surprise aggression.

The free world, at least dimly aware of these facts, has naturally embarked on a large program of warning and defense systems. That program will be accelerated and expanded.

But let no one think that the expenditure of vast sums for weapons and systems of defense can guarantee absolute safety for the cities and citizens of any nation. The awful arithmetic of the atomic bomb does not permit of any such easy solution. Even against the most powerful defense, an aggressor in possession of the effective minimum number of atomic bombs for a surprise attack could probably place a sufficient number of his bombs on the chosen targets to cause hideous damage.

Should such an atomic attack be launched against the United States, our reactions would be swift and resolute. But for me to say that the defense capabilities of the United States are such that they ould inflict terrible losses upon an aggressor—for me to say that the retaliation capabilities of the United States are so great that such an aggressor's land would be laid waste—all this, while fact, is not the true expression of the purpose and the hope of the United States. To pause there would be to confirm the hopeless finality of a belief that two atomic colossi are doomed malevolently to eye each other definitely across a trembling world. To stop there would be to accept helplessly the probability of civilization destroyed—the annihilation of the irreplaceable heritage of mankind handed down to us generation from generation—and the condemnation of mankind to begin all over again the age-old struggle upward from savagery toward decency, and right, and justice.

Surely no sane member of the human race could discover victory in such desolation. Could anyone wish his name to be coupled by history with such human degradation and destruction.

Occasional pages of history do record the faces of the "Great Destroyers" but the whole book of history reveals mankind's never-ending quest for peace, and mankind's God-given capacity to build.

It is with the book of history, and not with isolated pages, that the United States will ever wish to be identified. My country wants to be constructive, not destructive. It wants agreements, not wars, among nations. It wants itself to live in freedom, and in the confidence that the people of every other nation enjoy equally the right of choosing their own way of life.

NO IDLE WORDS OR SHALLOW VISIONS

So my country's purpose is to help us move out of the dark chamber of horrors into the light, to find a way by which the minds of men, the hopes of men, the souls of men everywhere, can move forward toward peace and happiness and well being.

In this quest, I know that we must not lack patience.

I know that in a world divided, such as ours today, salvation cannot be attained by one dramatic act.

I know that many steps will have to be taken over many months before the world can look at itself one day and truly realize that a new climate of mutually peaceful confidence is abroad in the world.

But I know, above all else, that we must start to take these steps—NOW.

The United States and its allies, Great Britain and France, have over the past months tried to take some of these steps. Let no one say that we shun the conference table.

On the record has long stood the request of the United States, Great Britain, and France to negotiate with the Soviet Union the problems of a divided Germany.

On that record has long stood the request of the same three nations to negotiate an Austrian State Treaty.

On the same record still stands the request of the United Nations to negotiate the problems of Korea.

Most recently, we have received from the Soviet Union what is in effect an expression of willingness to hold a Four Power Meeting.¹ Along with our allies, Great Britain and France, we were pleased to see that this note did not contain the unacceptable pre-conditions previously put forward.

As you already know from our joint Bermuda communiqué,² the United States, Great Britain, and France have agreed promptly to meet with the Soviet Union.

The Government of the United States approaches this conference with hopeful sincerity. We will bend every effort of our minds to the single purpose of emerging from that conference with tangible results toward peace—the only true way of lessening international tension.

We never have, we never will, propose or suggest that the Soviet Union surrender what is rightfully theirs.

We will never say that the peoples of Russia are an enemy with whom we have no desire ever to deal or mingle in friendly and fruitful relationship.

On the contrary, we hope that this Conference may initiate a relationship with the Soviet Union which will eventually bring about a free intermingling of the peoples of the East and of the West—the one sure, human way of developing the understanding required for confident and peaceful relations.

Instead of the discontent which is now settling upon Eastern Germany, occupied Austria, and the countries of Eastern Europe, we seek a harmonious family of free European nations, with none a threat to the other, and least of all a threat to the peoples of Russia.

Beyond the turmoil and strife and misery of Asia, we seek peaceful opportunity for these peoples to develop their natural resources and to elevate their lives.

These are not idle words or shallow visions. Behind them lies a story of nations lately come to independence, not as a result of war, but through free grant or peaceful negotiation. There is a record, already written, of assistance gladly given by nations of the West to needy peoples, and to those suffering the temporary effects of famine, drought, and natural disaster.

These are deeds of peace. They speak more loudly than promises or protestations of peaceful intent.

FOR THE BENEFIT OF MANKIND

But I do not wish to rest either upon the reiteration of past proposals or the restatement of past deeds. The gravity of the time is such that every new avenue of peace, no matter how dimly discernible, should be explored.

There is at least one new avenue of peace which has not yet been well explored—an avenue now laid out by the General Assembly of the United Nations.

In its resolution of November 18th [28th], 1953, this General Assembly suggested—and I quote—"that the Disarmament Commission study the desirability of establishing a sub-committee consisting of representatives of the Powers principally involved, which should seek in private an acceptable solution . . . and report on such a solution to the General Assembly and to the Security Council not later than 1 September 1954."¹

The United States, heeding the suggestion of the General Assembly of the United Nations, is instantly prepared to meet privately with such other countries as may be "principally involved", to seek "an acceptable solution" to the atomic armaments race which overhangs not only the peace, but the very life, of the world.

We shall carry into these private or diplomatic talks a new conception.

The United States would seek more than the mere reduction or elimination of atomic materials for military purposes.

It is not enough to take this weapon out of the hands of the soldiers. It must be put into the hands of those who will know how to strip its military casing and adapt it to the arts of peace.

The United States knows that if the fearful trend of atomic military buildup can be reversed, this greatest of destructive forces can be developed into a great boon, for the benefit of all mankind.

The United States knows that peaceful power from atomic energy is no dream of the future. That capability, already proved, is here—now—today. Who can doubt, if the entire body of the world's scientists and engineers had adequate amounts of fissionable material with which to test and develop their ideas, that this capability would rapidly be transformed into universal, efficient, and economic usage. To hasten the day when fear of the atom will begin to disappear from the minds of people, and the governments of the East and West, there are certain steps that can be taken now.

PROPOSAL FOR JOINT ATOMIC CONTRIBUTIONS

I therefore make the following proposals:

The Governments principally involved, to the extent permitted by elementary prudence, to begin now and continue to make joint contributions from their stockpiles of normal uranium and fissionable materials to an International Atomic Energy Agency. We would expect that such an agency would be set up under the aegis of the United Nations.

The ratios of contributions, the procedures and other details would properly be within the scope of the "private conversations" I have referred to earlier.

The United States is prepared to undertake these explorations in good faith. Any partner of the United States acting in the same good faith will find the United States a not unreasonable or ungenerous associate.

Undoubtedly initial and early contributions to this plan would be small in quantity. However, the proposal has the great virtue that it can be undertaken without the irritations and mutual suspicions incident to any attempt to set up a completely acceptable system of world-wide inspection and control.

The Atomic Energy Agency could be made responsible for the impounding, storage, and protection of the contributed fissionable and other materials. The ingenuity of our scientists will provide special safe conditions under which such a bank of fissionable material can be made essentially immune to surprise seizure.

The more important responsibility of this Atomic Energy Agency would be to devise methods whereby this fissionable material would be allocated to serve the peaceful pursuits of mankind. Experts would be mobilized to apply atomic energy to the needs of agriculture, medicine, and other peaceful activities. A special purpose would be to provide abundant electrical energy in the power-starved areas of the world. Thus the contributing powers would be dedicating some of their strength to serve the needs rather than the fears of mankind.

The United States would be more than willing—it would be proud to take up with others “principally involved” the development of plans whereby such peaceful use of atomic energy would be expedited.

Of those “principally involved” the Soviet Union must, of course, be one.

OUT OF FEAR AND INTO PEACE

I would be prepared to submit to the Congress of the United States, and with every expectation of approval, any such plan that would:

First—encourage world-wide investigation into the most effective peacetime uses of fissionable material, and with the certainty that they had all the material needed for the conduct of all experiments that were appropriate;

Second—begin to diminish the potential destructive power of the world's atomic stockpiles;

Third—allow all peoples of all nations to see that, in this enlightened age, the great powers of the earth, both of the East and of the West, are interested in human aspirations first, rather than in building up the armaments of war;

Fourth—open up a new channel for peaceful discussion, and initiate at least a new approach to the many difficult problems that must be solved in both private and public conversations, if the world is to shake off the inertia imposed by fear, and is to make positive progress toward peace.

Against the dark background of the atomic bomb, the United States does not wish merely to present strength, but also the desire and the hope for peace.

The coming months will be fraught with fateful decisions. In this Assembly; in the capitals and military headquarters of the world; in the hearts of men everywhere, be they governors or governed, may they be the decisions which will lead this world out of fear and into peace.

To the making of these fateful decisions, the United States pledges before you—and therefore before the world—its determination to help solve the fearful atomic dilemma—to devote its entire heart and mind to find the way by which the miraculous inventiveness of man shall not be dedicated to his death, but consecrated to his life.

I again thank the delegates for the great honor they have done me, in inviting me to appear before them, and in listening to me so courteously. Thank you.

E. NEGOTIATIONS FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A UNITED NATIONS DISARMAMENT AND ATOMIC DEVELOPMENT AUTHORITY, 1954

8. PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY: Memorandum From the Secretary of State to the Soviet Ambassador at Washington, March 19, 1954¹

OUTLINE OF AN INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

The United States Government wishes to submit additional tentative views amplifying the proposals for an International Atomic Energy Agency as presented by the President of the United States to the United Nations General Assembly on December 8, 1953;²

A. The Objectives of the U.S. Proposals

The U.S. proposes that there should be established under the aegis of the United Nations an International Atomic Energy Agency to receive supplies of nuclear materials from those member nations having stocks of such materials to be used for the following objectives:

- A. to encourage world wide research and development of peaceful uses of atomic energy by assuring that engineers and scientists of the world have sufficient materials to conduct such activities and by fostering the interchange of information.
- B. to furnish nuclear materials to meet the needs of agriculture, medicine, and other peaceful activities including the eventual production of power.

1. The International Atomic Energy Agency

- A. The Agency would be created by and derive its authority under the terms of a treaty among the participating nations. To the greatest extent practicable, the treaty should define standards and principles which would govern the Agency in the discharge of its functions.

² Supra.

B. Membership—all signatory states would be members of the Agency.

C. Governing Body

1. The highest executive authority in the Agency should be exercised by a Board of Governors, of limited membership representing governments. In determining the composition of the Board of Governors, it might be desirable to take account of geographic distribution and membership by prospective beneficiaries. It is expected that the principal contributors would be on the Board of Governors.
2. It is suggested that decisions of the Board of Governors generally should be taken by some form of majority vote. Arrangements could be worked out to give the principal contributing countries special voting privileges on certain matters, such as allocations of fissionable material.

D. Staff—The Staff of the Agency should be headed by an administrative head or general manager, appointed for a fixed term by the Board of Governors and subject to its control, and, of course, include highly qualified scientific and technical personnel. Under the general supervision of the Board, the administrative head should be responsible for the appointment, organization and functioning of the Staff.

E. Financing

1. Funds for the central facilities and fixed plant of the Agency and its research projects should be provided through appropriation by the participating states in accordance with a scale of contributions to be agreed upon. It is suggested that it might be possible to utilize the general principles governing the scale of contributions by individual members to the UN.
2. Funds for specific projects submitted by member nations to utilize the materials or services of the Agency should be provided by the recipient country concerned through specific arrangements in each case.

F. The administrative headquarters of the Agency could be located at a place mutually agreed upon.

G. Relationship to the United Nations and Other International Bodies—The Agency should submit reports to the UN Security Council and General Assembly when requested by either of these organs. The Agency should also consult and cooperate with other UN bodies whose work may be related to that of the Agency.

H. The facilities of the Agency would include:

1. Plant, equipment, and facilities for the receipt, storage, and issuance of nuclear materials.

2. Physical safeguards.
3. Control laboratories for analysis and verification of receipts and inventory control of nuclear materials.
4. Necessary housing for administrative and other activities of the Agency not included in the preceding categories.
5. Those facilities, as might in time be necessary, for such purposes as education and training, research and development, fuel fabrication and chemical processing.

III. Functions of the Agency

A. Receipt and Storage of Materials

1. All member nations possessing stocks of normal and enriched uranium, thorium metal, U-233, U-235, U-238, plutonium and alloys of the foregoing would be expected to make contributions of such material to the Agency.
2. The United States would be prepared to make as a donation, a substantial initial contribution of nuclear materials towards the needs of the Agency. The USSR would make an equivalent donation towards these needs.
3. The Agency would specify the place, method of delivery, and, when appropriate, the form and composition of materials it will receive. The Agency would also verify stated quantities of materials received and would report to the members these amounts. The Agency would be responsible for storing and protecting materials in a way to minimize the likelihood of surprise seizure.

B. Allocation of Materials by the Agency

1. The Agency would review proposals submitted by participating members desiring to receive allocations of Agency stocks in the light of uniform and equitable criteria, including:
 - a. The use to which material would be put, including scientific and technical feasibility.
 - b. The adequacy of plans, funds, technical personnel, etc., to assure effective use of the material.
 - c. Adequacy of proposed health and safety measures for handling and storing materials and for operating facilities.
 - d. Equitable distribution of available materials.
2. Title to nuclear materials would initially remain with the Agency, which would determine fair payment to be made for use of materials.
3. In order to insure that adequate health and safety standards were being followed, and in order to assure that allocated fissionable material is being used for the purposes for which it was allocated, the Agency would have the continuing authority to prescribe certain design and operating conditions, health and safety regulations, require accountability and operating records, specify disposition of byproduct fissionable materials and wastes, retain the right of monitoring and require progress reports. The Agency would also have authority to verify status of allocated material inventories and to verify compliance with the terms of issuance.

4. Information about all transactions entered into by the Agency would be available to all members.

C. Information and Service Activities of the Agency

1. All member nations possessing information relevant to the activities of the Agency would be expected to make contributions from that information to the Agency.
2. In addition to data developed as a result of its own activities, the Agency would have available:
 - a. Data developed by participating countries as a result of the utilization of the materials, information, services, and other assistance of the Agency.
 - b. Data already publicly available in some of the countries.
 - c. Data developed and previously held by principals or other members and voluntarily contributed to the Agency.
3. The Agency would encourage the exchange of scientific and technical information among nations, and be responsible for making wide dissemination of the data in its possession.
4. The Agency would serve as an intermediary securing the performance of services by one participating country for another. Among the specific activities the Agency might provide would be the following:
 - a. Training and education.
 - b. Services concerned with developing codes for public health and safety in connection with the utilization of fissionable materials.
 - c. Consultative technical services in connection with the establishment and carrying on of programs.
 - d. Processing of nuclear materials (i. e., chemical separation and purification, fabrication of fuel elements, etc.).
 - e. Supply of special materials, such as heavy water.
 - f. Design and supply of specialized equipment.
 - g. Special laboratory services such as conduct of experiments and tests.
 - h. Aid in making financial arrangements for the support of appropriate projects.

19. ESTABLISHMENT OF THE UNITED NATIONS DISARMAMENT COMMISSION SUBCOMMITTEE: Resolution of the United Nations Disarmament Commission, April 19, 1954¹

The Disarmament Commission,

Noting General Assembly resolution 715 (VIII)² and the resolution on disarmament agreed by the Four Foreign Ministers at Berlin on 18 February 1954,³

1. Decides, pursuant to General Assembly resolution 715 (VIII), to establish a Sub-Committee consisting of representatives of Canada, France, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America;

2. Recommends that the Sub-Committee should hold its first meeting on 23 April, and should arrange its own meetings and method of work;

3. Recommends that the Sub-Committee should present a report on the results of its work to the Disarmament Commission not later than 15 July.

20. PURPOSE OF THE INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY: Note Submitted by the Secretary of State to the Soviet Minister for Foreign Affairs at the Geneva Conference on Korea and Indochina, May 1, 1954⁴

1. I have now read the aide-memoire of the Soviet Union of April 27⁵ re the proposal for "an international atomic energy agency" submitted to the Soviet Ambassador in Washington on March 19.⁶ This aide-memoire criticizes the proposal on the grounds that it would not substantially reduce atomic material stockpiles, or control the making or use of atomic weapons or remove the threat of atomic war.

2. These criticisms misconstrue the purpose of the US proposal of March 19. By its terms this proposal was not intended as a measure for the control of atomic weapons or for solving itself the various other problems mentioned in the Soviet note. Its purpose was the more limited one of initiating international cooperation in the field of atomic energy on a basis which would avoid many of the obstacles which have heretofore blocked any agreement. In this way the proposal could contribute to improving relations among the cooperating nations and thereby to facilitating solution of the more difficult problem of effective control of atomic energy for military purposes.

3. Accordingly, the US cannot concur in the view of the Soviet Union that creation of an international agency to foster the use of atomic materials for peaceful purposes would not be useful in itself. On the contrary, it believes that such an agency could have valuable results both in encouraging closer cooperation among the participating nations and in expediting more extensive use of atomic energy for purposes beneficial to mankind. The US therefore regrets that the Soviet Union is not willing to explore this matter further at this time.

4. In view of the lack of interest now of the Soviet Union in pursuing this proposal, the US will feel free to examine the creation of such an agency with other nations which might be interested. If the Soviet Union should later decide that it wishes to take part in any such discussions, the US will, of course, welcome its participation.

5. The US proposal of March 19 was, of course, not intended as a substitute for an effective system of control of atomic energy for military purposes. The US will continue, as heretofore, to seek means of achieving such control under reliable and adequate safeguards. It is prepared to continue exchanges of views with the Soviet Union for that purpose, and will shortly submit to the Soviet Union comments¹ on its proposal referred to in its aide-memoire of April 27.

21. PROPOSED UNITED NATIONS DISARMAMENT AND ATOMIC DEVELOPMENT AUTHORITY: Working Paper Submitted by the United States Delegation to the United Nations Disarmament Commission Subcommittee, May 25, 1954²

INTRODUCTION

1. The General Assembly resolution 502 (VI) of 11 January 1952³ directs the Disarmament Commission to formulate plans for the establishment within the framework of the Security Council of an international control organ (or organs) to ensure the implementation of the treaty (or treaties). Such major aspects of the disarmament programmes as disclosure and verification, limitation and balanced reduction of armed forces and armaments, and the control of atomic energy cannot be implemented until an international control organization with appropriate rights, powers and functions has been established.

2. The broad objectives in establishing control organs are: (i) to provide international control of atomic energy so as to enforce observance of prohibition and elimination of atomic and hydrogen weapons and to ensure use of nuclear materials for peaceful purposes, (ii) to supervise programmes for limitation and balanced reduction of armed forces and armaments, and prohibition and elimination of major mass destruction weapons; (iii) to supervise the various safeguards necessary for enforcement of the programme, including disclosure and verification, and (iv) to help develop an open world by assuring each participating State that other States are observing the various agreements and by providing knowledge upon which States can take rapid action to provide for their security in the event of serious violations of the disarmament agreement.

UNITED STATES SUGGESTIONS

3. The United States suggests the establishment of a United Nations Disarmament and Atomic Development Authority (hereafter referred to as the Authority).

4. Under the Authority there would be a Disarmament Division to carry out the responsibilities of the Authority with respect to the safeguards to ensure enforcement of the programme and the reduction and limitation of all armed forces and non-atomic armaments. (See article 42.)

5. Also under the Authority there would be an Atomic Development Division to carry out the responsibilities of the Authority with respect to the international development and control of atomic energy.

I. ORGANIZATION AND COMPOSITION

6. The Authority should be composed in the same manner as the Disarmament Commission. While it is necessary to keep the Authority to a reasonably small size for the sake of over-all efficiency, it may prove desirable also to include as members a limited number of additional States.

7. Any State not a member of the Authority would have an automatic right to participate, without vote, in Authority discussions of charges of violations by that State of provisions of the disarmament programme treaty. Any State not a member of the Authority would have the right to participate, without vote, in Authority discussions of any question brought before the Authority whenever the latter considers that the interests of that State are specially affected.

A. Disarmament Division

Director-General

8. The Disarmament Division would be under the supervision and control of a Director-General, who might be appointed for a fixed term, by the Authority.

9. While the Director-General would be subject to control by the Authority, he should be allowed sufficient discretion in carrying out the terms of the disarmament programme treaty and the instructions of the Authority to ensure effective operation of the Disarmament Division. The Director-General would be required to refer to the Authority charges of violations and other important developments but not routine day-to-day decisions concerning the operations of the Disarmament Division.

10. The Director-General would be assisted in the performance of his duties by assistant directors-general in charge of the principal departments of the Disarmament Division.

Secretariat

11. The Secretariat of the Disarmament Division would be organized into departments, each charged with responsibility for administering a principal function of the Division. The Secretariat would also furnish the personnel to perform the necessary staff functions for the Authority.

12. The Secretariat would furnish the staffs of the inspection groups in each country.

13. The Secretariat should be staffed with international civil servants appointed by the Director-General. The principles governing appointment and the international obligation of the persons appointed should be similar to those contained in the United Nations Charter.

Corps of Inspectors

14. The Disarmament Division would include among its personnel, but separate from the Secretariat, a corps of inspectors. The corps would be composed of persons technically qualified for various types of inspections and nominated by the States that are signatories of the disarmament programme treaty.

15. Individuals would be selected by the Director-General from the corps of inspectors to form the necessary inspection groups, both resident and transient. The inspection groups would be responsible to the Director-General in their work, and would be given authority to take specified emergency action upon discovery of violations or infractions of the treaty, such action to be subject to review by the Authority.

16. Each inspection group would include a national of each of the permanent members of the Authority except where the member itself is being inspected, plus nationals of other signatory States. In general the latter would be selected, subject to their possessing the requisite technical qualifications, on a basis of rotation.

17. Each State being inspected should appoint a liaison officer to accompany each inspection team.

18. In conducting individual inspections, each inspection group would be permitted to divide into such sub-groups as might be necessary and to assign responsibilities to members of its staff in order to best complete the functions assigned to it.

B. Atomic Development DivisionBoard of Governors

19. The Atomic Development Division would be under the supervision and control of a board of governors.

20. Each permanent member of the Authority would appoint a member of the board.

21. Not less than six nor more than eight additional members of the board would be appointed by the Authority.

22. Appointees would be expected to possess outstanding technical qualifications and would be appointed for a term of five years.

23. While the board of governors would be subject to control by the Authority, it should be allowed sufficient discretion in carrying out the terms of the disarmament programme treaty and the instructions of the Authority to ensure effective operation of the Atomic Development Division.

Staff

24. Operations of the Atomic Development Division would be carried out by an international staff, the international character of which would be similar to that of the Secretariat of the Disarmament Division, except that, to the greatest extent consistent with the requirements of efficiency, inspection, accounting and control, positions in any country would be filled by nationals of that country.

25. The staff would be headed by a manager, appointed by the board subject to the approval of the Authority. The Authority would have the power to remove the manager at any time.

C. Finance

26. It would be desirable to consider the finances of the Authority and its subordinate agencies under three subdivisions: (i) the budget of the Disarmament Division, (ii) that part of the budget of the Atomic Development Division directly concerned with establishing and operating atomic facilities (cost of raw materials and plant construction, operational costs, etc.), and (iii) that part of the budget of the Atomic Development Division dealing with the necessary international co-ordination and with the administrative costs above the operational level as well as with research necessary to the discharge of its duties and ensuring security.

27. The cost of the budget of the Disarmament Division ((i) above) and that part of the budget of the Atomic Development Division covered in (iii) above would be borne by the participating States in accordance with a scale of contributions based upon principles of cost-sharing to be agreed upon.

28. The cost of establishing and operating the various atomic facilities (26 (ii) above) should be met by the benefiting nations and not by general assessments upon the States participating in the disarmament programme. In carrying out its prescribed functions, however, the international control agency should interfere as little as necessary with the economic plans and the private, corporate, and State relationships in the several countries.

29. The budget of each division would be prepared by the division and submitted to the Authority for final approval.

II. RIGHTS, POWERS AND FUNCTIONS OF THE AUTHORITY

30. The Authority would derive its rights and powers from the disarmament programme treaty. The General Assembly would take appropriate action, in anticipation of the signing of this treaty, to ensure the establishment and activation of the Authority immediately upon the coming into effect of the treaty and the progressive assumption of its functions as required.

31. The Authority would be empowered to supervise and control progressive and continuous disclosure and verification of all armed forces, including para-military, security and police forces and all armaments, including atomic.

32. Within the limits of the programmes and phasing as laid down in the disarmament treaty, the Authority would be empowered to determine the details of the time and the manner of the reduction of armed forces and armaments and to supervise such reduction in so far as such details are not fixed by the treaty. The disposition of existing stocks of nuclear fuel would be made by the Authority in accordance with the treaty on international control.

33. The Authority would be empowered to function in accordance with whatever plan may be agreed upon for the control of atomic energy to the extent necessary to ensure effective prohibition of nuclear weapons and use of nuclear materials for peaceful purposes only.

34. Except for the rule of procedure that decisions made by the Authority within its defined functions would require a determined majority, the Authority would have the right to adopt its own rules of procedure, including the method of selecting its president.

35. The Authority would be authorized to hold meetings at such places other than the seat of the Authority as in its judgment would best facilitate its work.

36. The Authority would be empowered to issue administrative regulations within its field of competence.

37. The Authority would carry out an agreed programme of safeguards to ensure the observance of the agreements for the regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and all armaments. This programme of safeguards would include provision for whatever programme of effective disclosure and verification of all armed forces and all armaments may be agreed upon. This function would include, among others, the following tasks:

(a) Provide guidance and instructions, within the framework of the treaty, for the disclosure programme;

(b) Control the receipt of and process the information from each State and, within the framework of the disarmament programme treaty, prescribe the particulars of the information desired from the States;

(c) Organize and conduct field inspections and aerial surveys to verify information on reported installations and to determine whether all installations and facilities have been disclosed;

(d) Station personnel permanently in countries adhering to the programme for the purpose of ensuring continuous verification;

(e) Prepare reports of disclosure and verification for the United Nations and for the signatory States;

(f) In the event of a finding by the Authority of violations, obstructions, discrepancies, or pertinent omissions by a State, call upon such State to remedy forthwith the violation or other infraction; in the event of failure within a reasonable time of the offending State to comply fully, report the violation or other infraction to the Security Council, to the General Assembly, and to all States in order to permit appropriate action by the United Nations or by individual States in accordance with the treaty establishing the control organ;

(g) Submit such special reports to the Security Council as may be requested by any seven members thereof;

(h) Submit such special reports to the General Assembly as may be requested by that body;

(i) Determine when each provision of the treaty relating to the timing of disclosure and verification and of reductions of armed forces and non-atomic armaments has been completed.

38. The powers of the Authority relating to disclosure and verification, of course, would not be limited to the initial disclosure and verification but would continue as permanent powers of the Authority.

(a) The Authority would carry out the agreed programme for safeguards other than disclosure and verification;

(b) The Authority should have positive research and developmental responsibilities in order to remain in the forefront of atomic knowledge so as to render the Authority more effective in promoting the beneficial uses of atomic energy and in eliminating its destructive ones.

39. Authorized personnel of the Secretariat of the Disarmament Division would have the right, in accordance with the terms of the disarmament treaty, to conduct on-the-spot inspections preparatory to and in aid of inspections by formal inspection teams.

40. The Atomic Development Division should have the responsibility to determine and report to the Authority any violations in connexion with the execution of the provisions of the treaty establishing the system for the control of atomic energy.

41. The Authority should be empowered to take action as appropriate short of the imposition of sanctions as provided in Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, to remedy any violations or infractions in connexion with the enforcement of the provisions of the treaty establishing the system for the control of atomic energy. Such action would include:

(a) Calling upon the offending State to remedy within a reasonable time the violations or other infraction;

(b) Bringing about the suspension of the supply of nuclear materials to the offending State;

(c) Closing of plants utilizing nuclear materials in the offending State;

(d) Reporting to the Security Council, to the General Assembly and to all States the violation or other infraction in order to permit appropriate action by the United Nations or by individual States in accordance with the international convention establishing the control organ.

42. In connexion with the inspection of items critical to the system of safeguards for both atomic development and non-atomic armaments, in contrast to the items critical primarily to atomic development, the responsibilities of the Authority would in general be exercised by the Disarmament Division, subject to appropriate arrangements for coordination. The responsibilities of the Authority for such control as might be established over such items would, in general, also be exercised by the Disarmament Division.

43. Any jurisdictional questions arising between the Disarmament Division and the Atomic Development Division would be settled by the Authority.

III. RELATIONS TO OTHER UNITED NATIONS ORGANS

The relations of the Authority to the several organs of the United Nations should be clearly established and defined by the treaty creating the Authority.

To the Security Council

44. The Authority would be required to submit such reports as might be requested by any seven members of the Security Council.

45. The Authority's findings in respect to violations, evasions, discrepancies or pertinent omissions should be referred, as appropriate with certification of facts, to the Security Council.

46. Findings would be accompanied by such recommendations as the Authority might deem appropriate. In this regard, provision would have to be made for specific steps to be taken by the Security Council and/or the General Assembly to bring about rectification of violations of the disarmament programme treaty.

To the General Assembly

47. The Authority would transmit to the General Assembly periodic reports and any findings in respect to violations, evasions, discrepancies or pertinent omissions which are submitted to the Security Council.

48. The Authority would be required to submit such reports as might be requested by the General Assembly.

To the International Court of Justice

49. The Authority would be authorized by the General Assembly to request of the International Court of Justice advisory opinions on legal questions arising within the scope of the Authority's activities. Proceedings before the Court, however, would not be permitted to delay the taking of measures necessary to maintain international peace and security.

To the United Nations Secretariat

50. The Authority would use the services of the United Nations Secretariat to the extent mutually agreed upon.

51. Reports and other communications from the Authority to other organs of the United Nations would be transmitted through the Secretary-General.

IV. RELATIONSHIP TO INDIVIDUAL STATES

52. The question of the relationship of the Authority to the participating States will require careful treaty definition particularly regarding the extent to which the privileges and immunities accorded to the Authority will exempt it and its personnel from the operation of national laws and the means by which individual rights and liberties of citizens of each State will be protected against possible infringement stemming from inspections. The grant of privileges and immunities to the Authority should be based on the principle of minimum interferences with the national laws of a State consistent with adequate and expeditious carrying out of the Authority's responsibilities and activities.

53. The privileges and immunities accorded the Authority should include:

(a) The right of its accredited representatives to the privileges and facilities of ingress, egress and access into and from the territory of participating States including rights of transit for persons and equipment over, across and through such territory;

(b) The right to use communication facilities to the extent adequate to the discharge of its responsibilities;

(c) Such exemption from customs and immigration regulations as may be necessary to effective operations;

(d) Inviolability of premises, property and archives.

54. Any findings in respect to violations, evasions, discrepancies or pertinent omissions which are submitted to the Security Council and to the General Assembly would be transmitted also to the participating States.

55. Provision must be made in a treaty to permit individual States to take necessary steps to protect themselves in conformity with the provisions of the United Nations Charter in the event of serious violations determined by the Authority and not remedied within a reasonable time. Such provision would include the right of any State under such circumstances to terminate its obligations under the treaty, to take steps for individual and collective self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter, and to take such other action as might be decided or recommended by the United Nations Security Council or by the United Nations General Assembly.

56. The Authority would be empowered to negotiate with each participating State such administrative agreements as may be desirable to facilitate the operation of the disarmament programme.

57. Each participating State would designate and maintain a national agency to supervise the execution of its obligations and to assist the Authority in its work.

22. BASIS FOR AN EFFECTIVE DISARMAMENT PLAN: Memorandum From the Department of State to the Soviet Embassy at Washington, July 9, 1954 ¹

The United States has further considered the draft declaration of January 30 ² and Aide-Memoire of April 27 ³ delivered by the Soviet Union to the United States. The United States wishes to make the following comments:

I.

1. The President's speech of December 8, 1953 ⁴ to the United Nations General Assembly pointed out the dangers of the atomic armaments race and stressed the desire of the United States to remove these dangers by any effective method which includes adequate safeguards against violations and evasions. The United States would welcome any system of disarmament which would serve to protect the peoples of the world from the threat of war and relieve them of the heavy burden of military defense in a manner consistent with their security.

2. The United States is also aware of the difficulties which have been experienced since 1946 in trying to negotiate a disarmament plan. From that date until the present, the United States has persistently sought, alone and in concert with other nations, to find ways of easing the burden of armaments and of lessening the threat of war. In the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission from 1946 through 1948, in the Commission for Conventional Armaments from 1947 through 1950, in the special meetings of the Six Permanent Members of the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission in 1949 and 1950, and in the United Nations Disarmament Commission since 1951, the overwhelming majority of nations was able to reach agreement—the Soviet Union alone prevented progress.

3. Despite this discouraging record, the President, in his address on December 8, stated that the United States, heeding the resolution of November 28, 1953 ⁵ of the General Assembly of the United Nations, was "prepared to meet privately with such other countries as may be 'principally involved' to seek 'an acceptable solution' to the atomic armaments race which overshadows not only the peace but the very life of the world."

II.

4. In his address, the President also stated that the United States would carry into these talks a new proposal for an international atomic energy agency to expedite the use of atomic energy to serve the peaceful pursuits of mankind. In its memorandum of March 19, ⁶

¹ Department of State Bulletin, Oct. 4, 1954, pp. 485-486.

the United States explained in more detail its views on the method for converting this conception into a practical reality. The Aide-Memoire of April 27 of the Soviet Union appears to misconstrue completely the purpose of this specific proposal.

5. This proposal was intended to make a beginning toward bringing to the peoples of the world the peaceful benefits of atomic energy. This offer by the United States to join with other nations having atomic facilities to furnish fissionable material and atomic energy technology for the common benefit, would provide a new opportunity for international cooperation. Successful cooperation in the implementation of the President's proposal would surely result in an improved atmosphere, which, in turn, could significantly improve the prospects for genuine, safeguarded international disarmament. The proposal itself was not put forward as a disarmament plan.

6. The Soviet Aide-Memoire of April 27 states in effect that the USSR will not cooperate in steps to achieve peaceful benefits of atomic power for the world until the United States agrees to a ban on the use of atomic weapons. The primary reason given for this position is that under the President's United Nations proposal, stockpiles of weapon grade material could continue to increase after the international agency had been established. Yet the Soviet proposal for a ban on weapons' use would not in any way prevent such increases in stockpiles. Accordingly, the United States cannot agree that the Soviet position provides a valid objection to proceeding at this time with steps for promoting the peaceful uses of atomic energy.

7. The Soviet Union also appears to assume that any form of peaceful utilization of atomic energy must necessarily increase stocks of materials available for military purposes. In reality, however, ways can be devised to safeguard against diversion of materials from power producing reactors. And there are forms of peaceful utilization in which no question of weapon grade material arises.

8. The United States believes that the nations most advanced in knowledge regarding the constructive uses of atomic energy have an obligation to make it available, under appropriate conditions, for promoting the welfare of peoples generally. At the present stage of nuclear technology, the United States believes that it is now possible to make a beginning in this direction. Accordingly, the United States will feel free to go ahead with its proposal with other interested nations, even though the Soviet Union does not wish to pursue it at this time. If at a later time the Soviet Union should decide to take part in any such discussions, the United States will continue to welcome such participation.

III.

9. The Soviet Union refers to its proposal of January 30 for an international agreement calling for unconditional renunciation of the use of atomic, hydrogen and other forms of weapons of mass destruction. The United States has thoroughly and earnestly considered this proposal in accordance with its oft-declared policy to examine with an open mind all suggested approaches to the problem of disarmament.

10. In the opinion of the United States, any effective plan for disarmament must provide satisfactory answers to two fundamental questions:

a. First, will the plan result in an actual reduction or elimination of national armaments in a manner consistent with the security of each nation? A paper promise not to use weapons will not enable the nations safely to reduce their armaments. The very existence of any weapon poses the possibility of its use, despite promises not to do so, which can be broken without notice.

b. Second, will the plan materially reduce or eliminate the danger of aggression and warfare? If any plan would, in fact, tend to increase the danger of resort to war by a potential aggressor, it would not accomplish the basic purpose of disarmament.

11. The Soviet Union's proposal of January 30 fails to meet either of these basic tests, or to offer any hope for beneficial results in the disarmament field:

a. It would leave unimpaired existing armaments and continued armament production. This is clear from the terms of the Soviet proposal itself. There would be only an exchange of promises not to make use of weapons which are still retained. There could be no certainty that these assurances would be observed. The maintenance of stocks of weapons and the continued manufacture of weapons would bear ominous witness to the danger that the assurances might be disregarded.

b. The danger of aggression and war would not be lessened if the Soviet proposal were put in effect. Indeed, it could be increased, since the deterrent effect upon a potential aggressor of the existence of nuclear weapons would doubtless be lessened if his possible victims had undertaken an obligation not to use them. Such an aggressor might be tempted to initiate an attack in the hope that the ban would prevent or delay the use of such weapons in the defense of his victims. Yet, the aggressor with nuclear weapons would be in a position to repudiate his past assurances and employ nuclear weapons whenever it suited his interests. Thus, such a plan might merely serve to induce aggression and weaken its victims.

12. Not only does the Soviet proposal fail to meet the necessary tests of any effective plan to prevent atomic warfare, but it would in fact harm the chances of adoption of any such effective plan. For surely the Soviet proposal, if it were accepted, would tend to create the deceptive impression that the danger of atomic warfare had somehow been limited and weaken the vigilance of the people regarding a threat which had, if anything, increased. This false sense of security could discourage further efforts to achieve genuine disarmament under effective safeguards, which would actually enhance the security of all, reduce the danger of war, and lighten the heavy burden of armaments.

IV.

13. The United States reaffirms, as it did in the resolution adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on November 17, 1950,¹ that, whatever the method used, aggression itself is the gravest of all dangers. Only if there is aggression will the world be exposed to the horrors of modern war.

14. The signatories of the United Nations Charter have undertaken solemn assurances not to commit aggression. In conformity with its historic traditions, the United States will never violate that pledge. But, as indicated, the United States is convinced that the only truly effective way to ensure that aggression will not take place and that nuclear weapons will not be used in war is to adopt a safeguarded, balanced system of disarmament. Such a system could materially reduce the chance of successful aggression, and thereby minimize the risk of any aggression at all.

15. The United States continues to believe that a solution of the armaments problem is essential. Despite its inability to accept the Soviet proposal, the United States is ready at all times to discuss acceptable measures for effective disarmament under proper safeguards. It is prepared to do so either in the continuation of private exchanges or in the United Nations Disarmament Commission. In view of the urgency of disarmament, the United States will welcome such a continuation if the Soviet Union considers it a useful means for seeking a common approach to this problem.

16. The United States also hopes that, in the light of the foregoing, the Soviet Union will wish to comment further on the concrete proposal submitted by the United States on March 19, 1954. In any event the United States is prepared to renew with the Soviet Union at any time the talks on the President's proposal.

23. FOURTH REPORT OF THE UNITED NATIONS DISARMAMENT COMMISSION, JULY 29, 1954²

1. Following requests to the Chairman dated 3 April 1954 from the representatives of France (DC/41), the United Kingdom (DC/42) and the United States (DC/43), the Disarmament Commission resumed its meetings on 9 April 1954 for the consideration of the tasks of the Commission in accordance with General Assembly resolution 715 (VIII).³

2. At the 32nd meeting the representative of the United Kingdom proposed that, as had been suggested in resolution 715 (VIII), the Commission should establish a Sub-Committee which should seek in private an acceptable solution. He proposed that the Sub-Committee should consist of representatives of Canada, France, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom and the United States. Following the meeting the representative of the United Kingdom submitted a draft resolution (DC/47/Rev.1) embodying his proposal.

3. At the 33rd meeting the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics submitted an amendment (DC/48) which would have added to the membership of the Sub-Committee the People's Republic of China, Czechoslovakia and India.

4. At the 35th meeting the USSR amendment was rejected by 10 votes to one, with one abstention, and the United Kingdom draft resolution was adopted by 9 votes to one, with 2 abstentions. The adopted resolution (DC/49) read as follows:

"The Disarmament Commission,

"Noting General Assembly resolution 715 (VIII) and the resolution on disarmament agreed by the four Foreign Ministers at Berlin on 18 February 1954,

"1. Decides, pursuant to General Assembly resolution 715 (VIII), to establish a Sub-Committee consisting of representatives of Canada, France, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America;

"2. Recommends that the Sub-Committee should hold its first meeting on 23 April, and should arrange its own meetings and method of work;

"3. Recommends that the Sub-Committee should present a report on the results of its work to the Disarmament Commission not later than 15 July."

5. Pursuant to the above decision, the Sub-Committee held its first meeting at United Nations Headquarters in New York on 23 April, considered administrative and procedural arrangements and agreed to continue its discussions in London on or about 13 May.

6. The Sub-Committee continued its discussions in Lancaster House in London at nineteen meetings between 13 May and 22 June. On the latter date the Sub-Committee approved its report to the Commission (DC/53).

7. The Disarmament Commission considered the report of the Sub-Committee at its 36th to 43rd meetings between 20 and 29 July 1954, the verbatim records of which are contained in DC/PV.36-DC/PV.43.

8. By letter dated 22 July to the Chairman (DC/54), the representative of India requested that the proposals of the Government of India contained in document DC/44 and Corr. 1 be incorporated in the Commission's report. At its 43rd meeting the Commission decided to annex document DC/44 and Corr. 1 to this report.¹

9. The Commission expresses the hope that circumstances will facilitate the continued and fruitful consideration of the question of disarmament, the capital importance of which, in conjunction with other questions affecting the maintenance of international peace, is recognized by all.

10. This report was approved by the Commission on 29 July 1954 and is hereby submitted to the General Assembly and to the Security Council in accordance with paragraphs 4 and 6 of resolution 715 (VIII).

II. EFFORTS TOWARD THE PEACEFUL APPLICATION OF ATOMIC ENERGY AND TOWARD THE ESTABLISHMENT OF AN INTERNATIONAL CONTROL AGENCY, 1954-1955

4. PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY AND INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON THE PEACEFUL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY: Resolution 810 (IX) of the United Nations General Assembly, December 4, 1954¹

The General Assembly,

Believing that the benefits arising from the momentous discovery of atomic energy should be placed at the service of mankind,

Desiring to promote energetically the use of atomic energy to the end that it will serve only the peaceful pursuits of mankind and ameliorate their living conditions,

Recognizing the importance and the urgency of international co-operation in developing and expanding the peaceful uses of atomic energy to assist in lifting the burdens of hunger, poverty and disease,

Believing also that all nations should co-operate in promoting the dissemination of knowledge in the realm of nuclear technology for peaceful ends,

A

CONCERNING AN INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC AGENCY

Recalling the initiative of the President of the United States of America, embodied in his address of 8 December 1953,²

Noting that negotiations are in progress, and the intention that they should continue, for the establishment as quickly as possible of an International Atomic Energy Agency to facilitate the use by the entire world of atomic energy for peaceful purposes, and to encourage international co-operation in the further development and practical application of atomic energy for the benefit of mankind,

1. Expresses the hope that the International Atomic Energy Agency will be established without delay;

2. Suggests that, once the Agency is established, it negotiate an appropriate form of agreement with the United Nations;

¹ U.N. General Assembly, Official Records, Ninth Session, Supplement No. 21 A/2890, pp. 4-5; see also Department of State Bulletin, Mar. 14, 1955, pp. 444 ff.

² Supra, doc. 17.

3. Transmits to the States participating in the creation of the Agency, for their careful consideration, the record of the discussion of this item at the present session of the General Assembly;

4. Suggests that Members of the United Nations be informed as progress is achieved in the establishment of the Agency and that the views of Members which have manifested their interest be fully considered;

B

CONCERNING THE INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON THE PEACEFUL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

1. Declares the interest and concern of the General Assembly in helping in every feasible way to promote the peaceful applications of atomic energy;

2. Decides that an international technical conference of Governments should be held, under the auspices of the United Nations, to explore means of developing the peaceful uses of atomic energy through international co-operation and, in particular, to study the development of atomic power and to consider other technical areas—such as biology, medicine, radiation protection, and fundamental science—in which international co-operation might most effectively be accomplished;

3. Invites all States Members of the United Nations or of the specialized agencies to participate in the conference and to include among their representatives individual experts competent in the atomic energy field;

4. Suggests that the international conference should be held no later than August 1955 at a place to be determined by the Secretary-General and by the Advisory Committee provided for in paragraph 5 below;

5. Requests the Secretary-General, acting upon the advice of a small committee composed of representatives of Brazil, Canada, France, India, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America, to issue invitations to this conference, to prepare and circulate to all invitees a detailed agenda, and to provide the necessary staff and services;

6. Suggests to the Secretary-General and the above-mentioned Advisory Committee that, in making plans for the international conference, they consult with competent specialized agencies, in particular the Food and Agriculture Organization, the World Health Organization, and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization;

7. Invites the interested specialized agencies to designate persons to represent them at the conference;

8. Requests that the Secretary-General circulate for information a report on the conference to all Members of the United Nations, and to other Governments and specialized agencies participating in the conference.

PLANS FOR UNITED STATES PARTICIPATION IN THE INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON THE PEACEFUL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY: Joint Announcement by the Department of State and the United States Atomic Energy Commission, February 23, 1955¹

Preliminary plans for participation by the United States in the International Conference on the Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy at Geneva, Switzerland, August 8-20, 1955, were announced today.

The U.S. Government has accepted the invitation to participate in the Conference,² which was extended by the United Nations to 84 nations, including 9 from the Soviet bloc. Enclosed with the invitations were several documents, including the Topical Agenda for the Conference and the Conference Rules of Procedure.

Primary responsibility for the technical planning and preparation of U.S. participation in the Conference has been assigned to the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission. The Commission has named Dr. George L. Weil, former Assistant Director of its Reactor Development Division and now a consultant to the Commission, as Technical Director for U.S. participation in the international Conference.

President Eisenhower's proposal for a worldwide conference to promote the dissemination of new information on peaceful uses of atomic energy was first announced by Chairman Lewis L. Strauss of the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission on April 19, 1954.³ It will be held under the auspices of the United Nations, which authorized the meeting by formal resolution of the U.N. General Assembly on December 4, 1954.⁴

The Conference is an outgrowth of the atoms-for-peace proposals adopted before the United Nations on December 8, 1953, by President Eisenhower⁵ when he urged that the atomic resources of the world be mobilized to apply the benefits of atomic energy to the cause of peace.

The Conference will be devoted to the presentation of information on reactor technology; atomic power; radiation protection; applications of atomic energy to biology, medicine, and agriculture; and the industrial uses of radioisotopes.

The Atomic Energy Commission is assembling through key U.S. educational institutions, industrial establishments, and research centers (government and private) technical information in the fields appropriate to the Conference agenda. It is believed that papers presented by U.S. scientists and engineers will make substantial contributions to all segments of the topical agenda.

The Commission also is planning a technical exhibit at the Conference site at Geneva. More than 60 institutions and firms already have signified interest in participating in this U.S. Government exhibit.

Res. 810 (IX), supra.

See supra, doc. 17.

In addition to heading the Commission staff assigned to the planning and preparation of the meeting, Dr. Weil will undertake to coordinate the technical participation in the meeting by other interested agencies.

Invitations are being issued requesting that abstracts of papers be submitted prior to March 11 for consideration for the U.S. program, which in turn will be submitted to the U.N. Secretary-General. Interested individuals should contact their organizations for copies of the Conference topical agenda and rules of procedure.

26. REPORT ON THE INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON THE PEACEFUL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY: Address by the Chairman of the United States Atomic Energy Commission,¹ September 28, 1955²

The posture of a nation is a composite of the words of its leaders and the deeds of its people. The Atomic Energy Conference had its origin in President Eisenhower's unforgettable words to the United Nations in December of 1953 when he told of the great promise in store for peoples everywhere if the world's scientists and engineers could be free to devote themselves fully to the benign uses of the atom.³

Four months later we moved to translate the President's vision into deeds. We proposed a world conference to compare notes on the peaceful atom, for we were convinced that such a conference would give to the peoples of the world a clearer understanding of the paramount problem of this age—a realization of the blessings denied to all of us by reason of the fact that atomic armament must have first call upon the resources, intellectual and material, of a world precariously at peace.

The problem is not a new one. As children, we all grew up with the Arabian Nights story of the fisherman who found a bottle in his nets, uncorked it, and released a great cloud which rapidly transformed itself into the monstrous and threatening Djinn. The story ended happily, as you recall, by the fisherman's artifice in inducing that unwelcome apparition to return to the bottle and become captive once more.

This fable, even to the illustrations of the great mushroom cloud from which the Djinn materialized, is like the situation we face today—how to render atomic energy harmless, how to get it back into its bottle, under control, so we may make it fulfill our wishes for good purposes only.

The Geneva conference⁴ was a step toward that goal, but only a step. The press of the world, which sent some 800 reporters to Geneva, was enthusiastic and generous in its appraisal of the proceedings. They were described as a resounding triumph of "atoms for peace." But this should not conceal for us the fact that the conference was only a preliminary move in a right direction and that succeeding steps will have to be taken if any permanent good is to result.

But it was a truly gratifying beginning. The enthusiasm and cooperation which it inspired among the nations, great and small, surpassed the expectations of those whose task it was to set up the conference machinery. They had anticipated that the conference might attract some 400 scientists and that perhaps 300 papers would be submitted. Actually we found that 72 nations were eager to participate and that, not 400 scientists and engineers, but 1,400 would attend. The number of reports and papers submitted was not 300, but nearly four times as many—so many in fact that only a fraction could be presented orally. But most of them, brilliant works, will be published.

The day is not yet here for a precise evaluation of these more than 1,100 papers and discussion sessions. However, enough time has perhaps elapsed for a reminiscent look at the conference, to appraise its more obvious and immediate effects and some of the initial benefits gained from it. Within those limits I would like to give you my impressions, admittedly from the viewpoint of a prejudiced observer.

First, I might say something about our own participation. Our United States delegation was selected with great care and numbered 384 persons, of whom 239 were scientists and engineers, the remainder being the necessary staff to operate the exhibits, the reactor, and other services.¹

Of the 1,110 papers presented to the conference by all the participating countries, either orally or for inclusion in the published proceedings, approximately one-half—to be precise, 48.2 percent—were submitted by the United States. All our papers had been prepared months in advance and carefully reviewed to make certain that no matters of military significance were compromised.

The nations having atomic energy programs of any magnitude had impressive technical exhibits at the conference, but incontestably the star attraction was our operating research reactor, built at our Oak Ridge Laboratory, flown to Geneva, and erected on the grounds of the Palace of Nations. The attractive redwood structure we put up to house the reactor quickly acquired the nickname of "The Tennessee Chalet," and it was visited by more than 63,000 persons during the 2 weeks of the conference. Incidentally, for most of the delegates from other countries, including scientists and engineers come to deliver learned papers on atomic energy, it was their first opportunity to see an actual atomic reactor of any kind, much less to operate its controls as very many of them did. We also had in our main exhibit an outstanding demonstration of what Americans are doing in pure science, industry, medicine, and biology, and more about power development. Many of you here tonight contributed to this exhibit and are familiar with it. Some of those exhibits, brought from Geneva, are included in the Trade Fair on exhibition here.

At a trade exposition in another section of Geneva, industrial firms of several countries—the Soviets excepted—showed their products to good effect, but we made it clear that we had not come to Geneva to boast of our scientific prowess or, in other words, that we had not entered with the spirit of carrying off all the laurels in a sort of atomic Olympic Games.

The Soviet had a large technical exhibit which was chiefly remarkable, from my point of view, for the fact that it was there at all. We have had "atoms for peace" exhibits circulating around the world for more than a year. But, until this conference, we had seen nothing of Russian progress in this field. Therefore, great interest and conjecture attached itself to anything they proposed to show. Because the rest of the world knew so little of what the Russians were doing with the peaceful atom, it was clear that whatever they exhibited, or even reported, would be in the nature of a revelation.

Let me at this point say that they did come up with a great deal. There was no evidence, however—photographic or otherwise—to support the statement made by Soviet official spokesmen a few years back to the effect that, whereas the United States was engrossed with atomic energy to make bombs, they, the Soviets, were using atomic energy to change the courses of rivers and to remove mountains. On the other hand, their exhibits in areas of biology, in certain industrial applications, and in general instrumentation were not unimpressive and occasionally not greatly dissimilar from our own.

However, it was electrical power generation from atomic energy that attracted particular interest in the Soviet exhibit. They demonstrated a scale model of their 5,000-kilowatt reactor and a motion picture of the reactor itself, well photographed and accompanied by a narration in English. They also indicated that larger power reactors of a different design were planned. We, of course, have had units substantially larger than the Soviet plant operating for a considerable time, and far larger ones are building.

Soviet written reports to the conference showed careful preparation and a considerable amount of detail. But it became apparent early in the proceedings that, in answering the questions of delegates, they were not prepared to engage in the same degree of frankness as other delegations.

The Russian delegation, of whom some 79 were technicians, impressed our people as generally competent and, in some instances, as exceptional men. We have no way of knowing whether it was their first team, but as one of our people said, "They were good enough to be a first team."

It is the general impression among the members of our delegation that, on the basis of Geneva, we are well ahead of other nations—all other nations—in both the scope and the state of our technology in using atomic energy for peaceful purposes. This, however, was to be expected since we appear to have a considerably larger program than any other country and we have been engaged upon it for a longer time.

In this connection it is interesting to note, however, that at least one of the Russian papers presented at the conference bore the date of 1943, indicating that they had been seriously concerned with the subject for a longer time than many of us realize.

While what the Russians revealed at Geneva did not contain anything new or startling, it did give some insight into their working methods and into the caliber of their research. On the basis of their role at Geneva, they appeared stronger in basic research than in its practical applications.

The fact that we appear to be ahead in the peaceful applications of atomic energy—perhaps by a scant few years—certainly offers no justification for complacency. To the contrary, the situation must be regarded as a serious challenge. The Soviets have not outstripped nor equaled us in any peaceful application, but at the same time—and this is important—we did not show anything at Geneva which they cannot have in a few years, given the talent and zeal which we believe them to possess.

Too many of us have been thinking of the Russians, either by education or temperament, as not quite equal to us in the technological sense. Despite the many things wrong with their political system from our point of view, let us not fall into the easy attitude of assuming that they cannot compete with us in mastering atomic energy. The early date at which they produced nuclear weapons should be a constant reminder of the fallacy and danger of such an attitude on our part. We can never let down our research without letting down our guard at the same moment.

Also, the belief that science cannot thrive under conditions designed solely to protect the security of data already in hand and deemed important to national defense would seem to be brought into question by the degree of Soviet progress. This progress was achieved under security provisions which are part of a complete tyranny where communication is rigidly controlled and the individual has no rights. Since we proceed under the policy of removing information from classification as rapidly as possible, the Soviet results present something of a paradox.

With respect to power from atomic energy, the Geneva conference made it evident that, while others are engaged in extensive undertakings, our program is presently substantially ahead in extent and in the versatility of its approach. As you know, we are relatively close in the United States to the production of economic, electrical energy. Even today, the kilowatts we are producing in our reactors would be economic in some parts of the world.

But different countries are taking different paths to power development, depending upon varying economic factors. England, for example, foresees the end of her increasingly expensive coal. For England, therefore, time is of the essence; she cannot afford to wait for development of the ultimate reactor of maximum efficiency.

Soviet Russia has no private industry interested in developing the peacetime uses of atomic energy and no spirit of competitive free enterprise. In Russia the whole show is a government monopoly. It will be interesting to see how this will affect the search for a more economic and efficient power system than the one they exhibited.

We, in the United States, are fortunate in that we face no urgent shortage of conventional fuels. We have time and the opportunity to attack the problem from every side and to experiment simultaneously with a whole variety of atomic power systems. That is exactly what we are doing. Last week the Commission took another step forward and invited proposals from industry and other groups for the design and construction of small atomic power plants. This marks the second round of a partnership program designed to speed the development of efficient, economic nuclear power. Our first power demonstration reactor program began, as you know, earlier this year and produced proposals for large plants. American industry is dedicating risk capital in a conservative race to produce the best and most efficient means of atomic power—knowing full well that the first plants will not be economic.

To sum up, we did not go to this conference in an effort to carry away all the honors. If there was some semblance of a contest, in the technical exhibits and in the papers presented, no one lost in this competition. All the nations gained, and the winner was mankind.

From the viewpoint of our national self-interest, however, the conference was certainly a victory for fundamental American policy. We achieved new understanding abroad of our earnest effort to promote a decent and enduring peace.

As a people, knowing full well the sincerity of our own desire for peace, we have not always appreciated how the rest of the world regarded us. Sometimes even nations whose safety from aggression has depended upon our possession of nuclear weapons have shown a tendency to view us with suspicion. Too often, in the past, Communist propaganda has had some success in depicting us as warmongers interested in the atom only to make bombs and ready to use them to gain our supposed imperialist aims. This myth was effectively demolished at Geneva and without our having to brand it as a myth. Our scientists and engineers who went to Geneva and who unfolded there a factual account of our purpose and efforts to use the atom for man's benefit were ambassadors of peace, plenipotentiary and extraordinary.

The conference was convened without any political objective. Nor did it, in its 162 hours of sessions, encounter any political complications. Under its "ground rules" any discussion of political topics or of atomic weapons was out of bounds by common consent, in advance. The fact that no violations of either the letter or the spirit of the conference occurred is one of the principal explanations for its success. But notwithstanding the absence of politics from the conference, it is bound to have a profound international political impact.

What were its chief results? It would appear that there were several, both immediate and for the not-distant future:

First, the free world—perhaps even the Soviet—has a new understanding of the absolute sincerity of our desire to strip the atom of its “military casing” and “adapt it to the arts of peace.” The conference substantially advanced the President’s program of “atoms for peace.” Any suspicion of our motives, imported to the conference, could not have survived the 2 weeks of Geneva, and many delegates volunteered that statement to me in similar words.

Second, communication was reestablished between men of science who for many years had experienced the isolation of finding those lines down. As a result, much cross-fertilization of ideas will occur and that, inevitably, will stimulate new inventions in many phases of the atomic art during the next year or two.

Third, there can no longer be any talk of nations which, from the point of view of possessing information for the peaceful applications of atomic energy, are “have not” nations. The smaller nations were impressed by the fact that the development of atomic power is a very complex and expensive undertaking—an undertaking which requires, first of all, a grounding in the basic technology and then a substantial body of trained scientists and engineers. The notion that all they have to do is place an order for a reactor out of a catalog and be immediately in business to provide electrical energy from atomic power—if such a notion existed—was, or should have been, dispelled at Geneva.

Fourth, we gained much information of value to ourselves from the conference. One byproduct, I believe, was a rebirth of humility. We learned not to underrate the competence of others and to cease to think of ourselves—those of us, that is, who were so inclined—as especially and exclusively gifted with imagination and ability in exploring the possibilities of the new worlds that lie ahead. This realization could save us in the future from some grievous error of judgment.

Fifth, all of us were impressed by the disturbing fact that Russia appears to be training scientists and engineers at a faster rate than we are. Mr. Allen Dulles, the distinguished Director of our Central Intelligence Agency, has publicly stated that, between 1950 and 1960, Soviet Russia will have graduated 1,200,000 scientists and engineers, compared with about 900,000 in the United States in our present program. Those figures would not be so important did we not know that our own colleges and universities are turning out only about half the number of engineers we require today. Unless corrected, this situation, a generation hence, will become a national calamity, imperiling our security and freedom in an age of expanding dependence upon science and technology. This is a most serious subject and demands prompt consideration and more emphasis than I can give it in this general report.

Sixth and finally, in this listing of the results of the world’s first Conference on the Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy, I come to the brightest, most appealing of all its accomplishments. As our story of the peaceful atom was printed widely overseas, the result was that for millions of people all over the world Geneva cast off the mesmerism of the bomb. No other event that has occurred has done so much toward taking the horror—the terror—out of the atom.

The first decade of man's mastery of the atom, in its actual application, began on an early morning in July of 1945 in a blinding flash over the sands of Alamogordo. The monstrous Djinn had been released from the bottle. The second decade of the atom may be said to have begun in Geneva, 10 years later, but this time it emerged, not as a terrifying monster, but as the powerful, obedient servant of man. Wider horizons of grander view were opened. To many, it must have seemed that, overnight, the atom had been transformed from a thing of fear and terror to a promise of great blessing.

History may record that in Geneva, at the opening of this second decade of the atom, mankind's stake in peace was lifted out of the paralysis of fear to a vision so compelling as to render unthinkable the very notion of another major war. If the conference produced such a vision, it made a good and auspicious beginning. We must not allow that vision to fade—either for us or for other men.

27. SUMMARY OF ATOMIC ENERGY NEGOTIATIONS: Report to the President by the United States Representative for International Atomic Energy Negotiations,¹ November 30, 1955 (Excerpt)²

The following is a progress report of my activities for the year during which I have served.

I. Discussions Abroad

In December 1954, at the suggestion of the Joint Atomic Energy Committee of the Congress, I joined certain of its members in visiting a number of European countries to determine the international response to our "Atoms for Peace" program. In Turkey, Greece, Italy, Spain, Portugal, France, and Switzerland, I consulted the individuals in government and in business chiefly concerned with atomic energy programs. It was apparent that the prospective demand for power in all these countries far exceeded their conventional fuel resources and that all of them would seek as rapidly as possible to develop atomic power programs. It was clear that they wished to cooperate and exchange information immediately with the United States. They preferred not to wait for the creation of an International Agency.

II. Negotiations for an International Atomic Energy Agency

The Secretary of State in his opening statement to the Ninth United Nations General Assembly on September 23, 1954³ stated that the U.S. efforts "have been and will be directed primarily toward the following ends: 1) The creation of an International Agency whose initial membership will include nations from all regions of the world. It is hoped that such an Agency will start its work as early as next year." The view of the United States that the Agency should come into being as soon as possible became the view of the United Nations when the General Assembly by a unanimous vote passed a resolution expressing "the hope that the International Atomic Energy Agency will be established without delay."¹

² Department of State Bulletin, Jan. 2, 1956, pp. 5-7.

³ For the full text of this statement, see supra, pp. 92-100.

This raised a basic issue—how it would be possible to solve the many complicated problems and troublesome details and at the same time establish an Agency at an early date. It was my conclusion that the draft Statute of the Agency² should be a broad constitutional framework—a statement of general principles rather than a point-by-point revelation of details—which would leave the Agency free to develop primarily as an operating Agency after its creation. The Agency should be led and operated by experts in the field and administrators qualified to meet and cope with the uncharted and evolving problems which will have to be solved. I proceeded on this basis, bearing constantly in mind the examples of the International Bank and the International Monetary Fund as organizations which have carried out great responsibilities in a businesslike and successful manner.

Among the problems which could be dealt with after the establishment of the Agency were the location of its headquarters and the functions it would assume under its broad grant of authority.

It was clear that the membership as a whole could not deal with the day-to-day technical problems which would confront the Agency. Therefore, we provided in the Statute for a Board of Governors with broad authority to make most of the necessary decisions for the Agency. The membership as a whole—described in the Statute as the General Conference—maintains its control over the Board of Governors through election of a number of its members and through complete control over the purse. The budget must be approved by a two-thirds vote of the General Conference.

The provisions of the Statute dealing with composition and selection of the Board of Governors were designed to reflect the realities of the international situation. It is clear that for a number of years the Agency will secure its fissionable materials, its source materials and its technical skill from a very small number of States. It would be unrealistic to disregard this situation in developing a formula for composition and selection of the Board of Governors of the Agency. We studied a number of methods of meeting this situation. One possibility was to provide a system of weighted voting in the Board of Governors dependent upon the size of contributions. This was not feasible because of the technical difficulties of evaluating contributions.

Another possible method of meeting this situation was to provide that certain countries with the most advanced atomic energy programs should be permanent members of the Board of Governors. This did not seem desirable for two reasons: Over a period of years quite a number of additional States are likely to develop important atomic energy programs. Furthermore the possibility exists that a State designated as a permanent member would fail to make a substantial contribution to the Agency.

The formula which we developed, while it necessarily could not fully satisfy everyone, seems to me a sound one. It places appropriate emphasis upon contributions of fissionable materials, of technical skills, and of source materials. It contemplates extensive changes in the composition of the Board as other States developed their resources of uranium and thorium and their atomic energy programs. It provides substantial representation for countries which would be in a position to contribute neither fissionable materials nor source materials nor technical skills.

I have gone into some detail in connection with this provision of the Statute since it was far the most difficult problem which faced the negotiating group.

Generally as the negotiating group clarified the problems and visualized in detail how the Agency would operate, solutions of other problems suggested themselves.

Procedurally the negotiations developed somewhat as follows: The United States prepared a first draft of the Statute taking into consideration suggestions received from other negotiating States and also from the United Nations General Assembly debates. This draft was then submitted to the negotiating States on March 29, 1955. During April and May the United States discussed this draft with all the negotiating States and also received further comments from interested agencies of the United States Government which had not participated in the original drafting.

After a thorough discussion, it developed that there was sufficient unanimity among all negotiating States so that substantially all of the suggested changes could be reconciled and incorporated into a new draft of the Statute. This new draft was transmitted to the Soviet Union on a confidential basis on July 29, 1955, and its comments were requested. It was distributed by the United States on behalf of the negotiating States also on a confidential basis to all eighty-four States Members of the United Nations or of the specialized agencies on August 22, 1955. Comments on the Statute were requested from all States.

Many comments have been received either through communications to the State Department or through statements made in the recent debate on this subject in the Tenth General Assembly. These comments indicate that differences in viewpoint as disclosed to date are mainly concentrated on a few points such as: a) composition and manner of selection of the Board of Governors of the Agency; b) relationship of the Agency to the United Nations; c) procedures for approval of the budget and prorating among States of operating expenses.

The United States and the other negotiating States have sought to give full consideration to the viewpoints expressed by all of the States. It would not, however, be feasible to include within the negotiating group all States which have made comments. A group of that size could not effectively work out the technical details of a Statute. Also a detailed discussion of the Statute in the General Assembly was undesirable at this stage.

On October 21, the United States called for an Operating Level Meeting to consider further the draft Statute.¹ The United States asked the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia, India, and Brazil in addition to the original negotiating group to participate in this Meeting. The USSR on October 1 had suggested such a meeting with the USSR and Czechoslovakia added to the original eight negotiating States. Thus the phase of the negotiations which I have conducted has now been merged with the negotiations with the USSR, heretofore reserved for the attention of the Secretary of State. The new group will seek to reconcile differences of viewpoint and to produce a Statute which will be acceptable to as many States as possible.

On many fundamental matters all States are thinking basically along the same lines. The differences of viewpoint, while substantial, seem capable of reconciliation. The unanimous approval by the Tenth General Assembly of the resolution dealing with the peaceful uses of the atom² highlights the great progress that has already been made.

III. Bilateral Agreements for Cooperation

The informal discussions among the eight States participating in the drafting of a Statute for an International Agency had by December 1954 revealed that the drafting of a Statute of an International Agency satisfactory even to the eight States initially participating in the negotiations, would in itself be a considerable task. To secure the views of all other States would certainly take a year. Therefore immediate achievements in advancing the Atoms-for-Peace program were more likely to result from bilateral agreements for cooperation.

The United States Atomic Energy Commission had already embarked upon extensive programs to share the benefits of the atom particularly through distribution of radio-isotopes,³ through furnishing extensive libraries of unclassified information to countries in all areas of the world and through extensive programs for training foreign students in the United States. This cooperation involving exchange of neither classified material nor fissionable materials was possible without formal agreements for cooperation.

A further approach promising immediate results was a program for the installation of research reactors abroad. These research reactors would furnish training in the type of problems that would be encountered on a larger scale in the operation of power reactors. In addition, these research reactors would permit production abroad of a number of useful isotopes.

In order for countries to receive from the United States the atomic fuel necessary for the operation of the research reactors, it is necessary for them to enter into Agreements for Cooperation as provided by Article 123 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954.¹ The discussions with several States which had already expressed an interest in such reactors disclosed that conditions and requirements in most countries were sufficiently similar so that a standard form of agreement could be prepared. Accordingly, the Department of State and the Atomic Energy Commission developed such an agreement which was first made available on March 22, 1955.

It was necessary that the Agreements for Cooperation be negotiated and initialed by approximately June 15 lest the adjournment of Congress in early August might make compliance with the thirty day waiting provision of Article 123 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 impossible until February of next year. The Missions in Washington of thirty-four States were contacted and twenty-four such Bilateral Agreements were initialed. Nineteen of these Agreements were initialed in time to become effective prior to the adjournment of Congress. (Annex I)

IV. Geneva Technical Conference

I attended the UN Technical Conference in Geneva from August 7 to August 20, accompanied by my Special Assistant. We discussed informally problems relating to the International Atomic Energy Agency with a large number of delegations.

28. ADDITIONAL INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCES ON THE PEACEFUL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY AND CONTINUED NEGOTIATIONS FOR AN INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY: Resolution 912 (X) of the United Nations General Assembly, December 3, 1955 ²

The General Assembly,

Desiring that mankind should be enabled to make the fullest use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes,

Desiring to promote energetically the use of atomic energy to the end that it will serve only the peaceful pursuits of mankind and ameliorate their living conditions,

¹ This table, based on a list in Mr. Patterson's report, has been revised and enlarged to include all bilateral agreements initialed or signed in 1955. The agreements with Belgium, Canada, and the United Kingdom were not initialed prior to signature. All agreements entered into force on date of signature with the following exceptions: Netherlands, Dec. 30, 1955; Japan, Dec. 27, 1955; United Kingdom, Canada, and Belgium, July 21, 1955.

² U.N. General Assembly, Official Records, Tenth Session, Supplement No. 19 (A/3116), pp. 4-5.

Recognizing the deep interest of all Members of the United Nations in achieving these ends,

Recalling its resolution 810 (IX) of 4 December 1954¹ concerning international co-operation in developing the peaceful uses of atomic energy, and recognizing that, in accordance with that resolution, significant progress is being made in promoting international co-operation for this purpose,

Having considered the report (A/2967) of the Secretary-General, submitted pursuant to paragraph 8 of section B of the above-mentioned resolution, on the International Conference on the Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy held in Geneva from 8 to 20 August 1955,

Recognizing the necessity of ensuring that the facilities of the International Atomic Energy Agency and such fissionable material as may be placed at its disposal are not used for, or diverted to, other than peaceful purposes,

Believing that continuing international co-operation is essential for further developing and expanding the peaceful uses of atomic energy,

A

CONCERNING INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCES ON THE PEACEFUL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

1. Expresses its satisfaction with the proceedings of the International Conference on the Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy convened in accordance with General Assembly resolution 810 (IX), and commends the participants therein for the high scientific quality of the papers and discussions, and for the spirit of co-operation which prevailed at the Conference;

2. Notes the impressive results achieved by the Conference in facilitating the free flow of scientific knowledge relating to the production and peaceful uses of atomic energy and in laying a foundation for the fuller exchange of information on the development of atomic energy for the aims of human welfare;

3. Expresses its appreciation of the work of the Secretary-General and of the Advisory Committee established under paragraph 5 of section B of resolution 810 (IX) in preparing and organizing the Conference;

4. Recommends that a second international conference for the exchange of technical information regarding the peaceful uses of atomic energy should be held under the auspices of the United Nations in two to three years time;

5. Requests the Secretary-General, acting upon the advice of the Advisory Committee referred to in paragraph 7 of section A of the present resolution and in consultation with the appropriate specialized agencies, to determine an appropriate place and date, to issue invitations to the conference in accordance with paragraphs 3 and 7 of section B of resolution 810 (IX), to prepare and circulate an agenda, and to provide the necessary staff and services;

6. Invites the specialized agencies to consult with the Secretary-General and the Advisory Committee with a view to ensuring proper co-ordination between the conference referred to in paragraph 4 above and such technical conferences as they or their affiliated non-governmental scientific organizations may convene on the more specialized aspects of the peaceful uses of atomic energy;

7. Decides to continue the Advisory Committee established under paragraph 5 of section B of resolution 810 (IX) in order that it may assist the Secretary-General in carrying out the provisions of the present resolution.

B

CONCERNING AN INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

1. Notes with satisfaction that substantial progress has been made toward negotiation of a draft statute establishing an International Atomic Energy Agency and that this draft has been circulated to Governments for their consideration and comment;¹

2. Welcomes the announced intention of Governments sponsoring the Agency to invite all States Members of the United Nations or members of the specialized agencies to participate in a conference on the final text of the statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency;

3. Further welcomes the extension of invitations to the Governments of Brazil, Czechoslovakia, India and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to participate, as Governments concerned, with the present sponsoring Governments in negotiations on the draft statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency;

4. Recommends that the Governments concerned take into account the views expressed on the Agency during the present session of the General Assembly, as well as the comments transmitted directly by Governments, and that they take all possible measures to establish the Agency without delay, bearing in mind the provisions of the present resolution;

5. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Advisory Committee referred to in paragraph 7 of Section A of the present resolution, to study the question of the relationship of the International Atomic Energy Agency to the United Nations, and to transmit the results of their study to the Governments concerned before the conference referred to in paragraph 2 of section B above is convened;

6. Requests the Governments concerned to report to the General Assembly as appropriate;

7. Suggests that the International Atomic Energy Agency, when established, consider the desirability of arranging for an international periodical devoted to the peaceful uses of atomic energy.

29. EFFECTS OF IONIZING RADIATION: Resolution 913 (X) of the United Nations General Assembly, December 3, 1955¹

The General Assembly,

Recognizing the importance of, and the widespread attention being given to, problems relating to the effects of ionizing radiation upon man and his environment,

Believing that the widest distribution should be given to all available scientific data on the short-term and long-term effects upon man and his environment of ionizing radiation, including radiation levels and radio-active "fallout",

Noting that studies of this problem are being conducted in various countries,

Believing that the peoples of the world should be more fully informed on this subject,

1. Establishes a scientific Committee consisting of Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, France, India, Japan, Mexico, Sweden, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and requests the Governments of these countries each to designate one scientist, with alternates and consultants as appropriate, to be its representative on this Committee;

2. Requests the Committee:

(a) To receive and assemble in an appropriate and useful form the following radiological information furnished by States Members of the United Nations or members of the specialized agencies:

- (i) reports on observed levels of ionizing radiation and radio-activity in the environment;
- (ii) reports on scientific observations and experiments relevant to the effects of ionizing radiation upon man and his environment already under way or later undertaken by national scientific bodies or by authorities of national Governments;

(b) To recommend uniform standards with respect to procedures for sample collection and instrumentation, and radiation counting procedures to be used in analyses of samples;

(c) To compile and assemble in an integrated manner the various reports, referred to in sub-paragraph (a) (i) above, on observed radiological levels;

(d) To review and collate national reports, referred to in sub-paragraph (a) (ii) above, evaluating each report to determine its usefulness for the purposes of the Committee;

(e) To make yearly progress reports and to develop by 1 July 1958, or earlier if the assembled facts warrant, a summary of the reports received on radiation levels and radiation effects on man and his environment together with the evaluations provided for in sub-paragraph (d) above and indications of research projects which might require further study;

(f) To transmit from time to time, as it deems appropriate, the documents and evaluations referred to above to the Secretary-General for publication and dissemination to States Members of the United Nations or members of the specialized agencies;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to provide the Committee with appropriate assistance in organizing and carrying on its work, and to provide a secretary of the Committee;

4. Calls upon all concerned to co-operate in making available reports and studies relating to the short-term and long-term effects of ionizing radiation upon man and his environment and radiological data collected by them;

5. Requests the specialized agencies to concert with the Committee concerning any work they may be doing or contemplating within the sphere of the Committee's terms of reference to assure proper co-ordination;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to invite the Government of Japan to nominate a scientist, with alternatives and consultants as appropriate, to be its representative on the Committee;

7. Decides to transmit to the Committee the records of the proceedings of the General Assembly on the present item.

G. CONSIDERATION OF METHODS OF DISARMAMENT INSPECTION, 1955

30. AERIAL INSPECTION OF MILITARY INSTALLATIONS: Proposal by the President of the United States at the Geneva Conference of Heads of Government, July 21, 1955¹

Disarmament is one of the most important subjects on our agenda. It is also extremely difficult. In recent years the scientists have discovered methods of making weapons many, many times more destructive of opposing armed forces—but also of homes and industries and lives—than ever known or even imagined before. These same scientific discoveries have made much more complex the problems of limitation and control and reduction of armament.

After our victory as allies in World War II, my country rapidly disarmed. Within a few years our armament was at a very low level. Then events occurred beyond our borders which caused us to realize that we had disarmed too much. For our own security and to safeguard peace we needed greater strength. Therefore we proceeded to rearm and to associate with others in a partnership for peace and for mutual security.

The American people are determined to maintain and, if necessary, increase this armed strength for as long a period as is necessary to safeguard peace and to maintain our security.

But we know that a mutually dependable system for less armament on the part of all nations would be a better way to safeguard peace and to maintain our security.

It would ease the fears of war in the anxious hearts of people everywhere. It would lighten the burdens upon the backs of the people. It would make it possible for every nation, great and small, developed and less developed, to advance the standards of living of its people, to attain better food and clothing and shelter, more of education and larger enjoyment of life.

Therefore the United States Government is prepared to enter into a sound and reliable agreement making possible the reduction of armament. I have directed that an intensive and thorough study of this subject be made within our own Government. From these studies, which are continuing, a very important principle is emerging to which I referred in my opening statement on Monday.¹

ADEQUATE INSPECTION AND REPORTING ESSENTIAL

No sound and reliable agreement can be made unless it is completely covered by an inspection and reporting system adequate to support every portion of the agreement. The lessons of history teach us that disarmament agreements without adequate reciprocal inspection increase the dangers of war and do not brighten the prospects of peace.

Thus it is my view that the priority attention of our combined study of disarmament should be upon the subject of inspection and reporting.

Questions suggest themselves.

How effective an inspection system can be designed which would be mutually and reciprocally acceptable within our countries and the other nations of the world? How would such a system operate? What could it accomplish? Is certainty against surprise aggression attainable by inspection? Could violations be discovered promptly and effectively counteracted?

We have not as yet been able to discover any scientific or other inspection method which would make certain of the elimination of nuclear weapons. So far as we are aware no other nation has made such a discovery. Our study of this problem is continuing. We have not as yet been able to discover any accounting or other inspection method of being certain of the true budgetary facts of total expenditures for armament. Our study of this problem is continuing. We by no means exclude the possibility of finding useful checks in these fields.

As you can see from these statements, it is our impression that many past proposals of disarmament are more sweeping than can be insured by effective inspection.

Gentlemen, since I have been working on this memorandum to present to this conference, I have been searching my heart and mind for something that I could say here that could convince everyone of the great sincerity of the United States in approaching this problem of disarmament. I should address myself for a moment principally to the delegates from the Soviet Union, because our two great countries admittedly possess new and terrible weapons in quantities which do give rise in other parts of the world, or reciprocally, to the fears and dangers of surprise attack.

U. S. PROPOSAL

I propose, therefore, that we take a practical step, that we begin an arrangement, very quickly, as between ourselves—immediately. These steps would include:

To give to each other a complete blueprint of our military establishments, from beginning to end, from one end of our countries to the other; lay out the establishments and provide the blueprints to each other.

Next, to provide within our countries facilities for aerial photography to the other country—we to provide you the facilities within our country, ample facilities for aerial reconnaissance, where you can make all the pictures you choose and take them to your own country to study; you to provide exactly the same facilities for us and we to make these examinations—and by this step to convince the world that we are providing as between ourselves against the possibility of great surprise attack, thus lessening danger and relaxing tension. Likewise we will make more easily attainable a comprehensive and effective system of inspection and disarmament, because what I propose, I assure you, would be but a beginning.

Now from my statements I believe you will anticipate my suggestion. It is that we instruct our representatives in the Subcommittee on Disarmament in discharge of their mandate from the United Nations to give priority effort to the study of inspection and reporting. Such a study could well include a step-by-step testing of inspection and reporting methods.

The United States is ready to proceed in the study and testing of a reliable system of inspections and reporting and, when that system is proved, then to reduce armaments with all others to the extent that the system will provide assured results. The successful working out of such a system would do much to develop the mutual confidence which will open wide the avenues of progress for all our peoples.

The quest for peace is the statesman's most exacting duty. Security of the nation entrusted to his care is his greatest responsibility. Practical progress to lasting peace is his fondest hope. Yet in pursuit of his hope he must not betray the trust placed in him as guardian of the people's security. A sound peace—with security, justice, well-being, and freedom for the people of the world—can be achieved, but only by patiently and thoughtfully following a hard and sure and tested road.

31. SYSTEM OF INSPECTION: Letter From the President of the United States to the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Soviet Union, October 11, 1955¹

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I wish to thank you for your letter of September 19, 1955² about my Geneva proposal of July 21³ that we exchange information about military establishments and permit reciprocal aerial inspection over our two countries.

You raise a good many questions, and I shall not be able to reply to them until the doctors let me do more than at present. In any event, a full reply calls for preliminary work by my advisers and this is actively under way.

Let me now say, however, that I am encouraged that you are giving such full consideration to my Geneva proposal. I hope that we can agree on it, not as a cure-all, but, as I said at Geneva, to show a spirit of non-aggressiveness on both sides and so to create a fresh atmosphere which would dispel much of the present fear and suspicion. This, of itself, would be worthwhile. It would, I believe, make it more possible to make progress in terms of comprehensive plans for inspection, controls and reductions of armament, which will satisfy the high hopes of our peoples, and indeed of all the world.

I have not forgotten your proposal having to do with stationing inspection teams at key points in our countries,⁴ and if you feel this would help to create the better spirit I refer to, we could accept that too.

32. FURTHER STUDY OF THE PROBLEM OF DISARMAMENT: Proposal Submitted by the Governments of the United States, the United Kingdom, and France at the Geneva Meeting of Foreign Ministers, November 10, 1955⁵

The four Ministers of Foreign Affairs

1. Note that their representatives on the subcommittee of the United Nations Disarmament Commission, in the pursuit of their efforts to establish a satisfactory system of disarmament, have followed the directive given by the four Heads of Government at Geneva on July 27, 1955;⁶

2. Take note of the work the subcommittee has accomplished in the spirit of the conference of the Heads of Government during its meetings in New York from August 29 to October 7, 1955, and express their appreciation to the subcommittee for its efforts;

3. Express their agreement on the following:

(a) The renunciation of the use of nuclear weapons and all other weapons in any manner inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations,

(b) The need to arrive at limitations and reductions of armaments and of armed forces,

(c) The need to devote to the peaceful economic development of nations, for raising their well being, as well as for assistance to less developed countries, the material resources that would be released by agreements in the disarmament field,

(d) The fact that an effective system of inspection and control is the keystone of any disarmament program, and, consequently, the need to establish an organ responsible for the inspection and control of agreed measures of disarmament under effective safeguards,

(e) The fact that there are possibilities beyond the reach of international control for evading this control and for organizing the clandestine manufacture of atomic and hydrogen weapons even if there is a formal agreement on international control,

(f) The need for continued scientific search by each state, with appropriate consultation between governments, for methods which might be derived from evolving scientific knowledge that would make possible a thoroughly effective inspection and control system of nuclear weapons material as part of a disarmament program covering all kinds of armaments;

4. Declare their intent to continue to seek agreements on a comprehensive program for disarmament which will promote international peace and security with the least diversion for armament of the world's human and economic resources;

5. Recognize that inspection, control, limitation and reduction of armaments can best be achieved in an atmosphere which is free of fear and suspicion;

6. Propose accordingly that, as a contribution to such an atmosphere and as a prelude to a general disarmament programme, the States concerned:

(a) Should agree promptly to put into early operation, in order to help prevent a surprise attack: (i) A plan for exchange of military blueprints and aerial inspection on the basis of the proposal of the President of the United States of July 21, 1955,¹ and (ii) A plan for establishing control posts at key points, as suggested in the proposals of the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the U. S. S. R. of July 21, 1955,²

(b) Should also agree: (i) To arrange for the exchange and publication of information regarding military expenditures and budgets, as suggested in the proposals made by the Prime Minister of France on July 22, 1955,³ and (ii) To study how best to gain practical experience regarding the problems of inspection and control, as suggested by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom on July 21, 1955.¹

7. Direct their representatives on the United Nations Disarmament Commission to request that its subcommittee be reconvened at an early date and continue to seek an acceptable solution to the problem of disarmament.

33. RECIPROCAL INSPECTION AND SUPERVISION: Statement by the Secretary of State at the Geneva Meeting of Foreign Ministers, November 11, 1955²

I shall speak first with reference to the statements of the Soviet delegation³ regarding President Eisenhower's proposal for an exchange of military blueprints and reciprocal aerial reconnaissance.⁴

The Soviet delegation says that "no doubt President Eisenhower was guided by the best of intentions."⁵ But the Soviet delegation concludes that, whereas President Eisenhower thought and said that his proposal would lessen danger and relax tension, the Soviet Union has come to the conclusion that it would work in exactly the opposite way and would increase danger and tension.

In essence, the Soviet Union says that, although President Eisenhower has good intentions, he has bad judgment regarding these matters of war and peace. With this conclusion we cannot agree, and we believe that most of the world will also not agree. It is not easy to disparage the judgment of one who won worldwide renown as the military leader of the great coalition which won the victory in the West for freedom.

When President Eisenhower made his proposal to Chairman Bulganin, it was greeted with a wave of acclaim throughout the whole world. The people everywhere felt instinctively that his proposal, if accepted, would, for all practical purposes, mean an ending of the danger of war between our two countries.

I believe that the instinct of the people of the world was right. I do not think that they will be convinced to the contrary by the arguments which Mr. Molotov yesterday put forward. I shall take up these arguments one by one and comment on them.

1. It is said that the link between the Eisenhower proposal and disarmament is not clear. But, in fact, the proposal was made as a prelude to a program for a mutually dependable system for less armament.

⁴ Proposal of July 21, 1955; supra, doc. 30.

2. The Soviet delegation points out that the Eisenhower proposal refers solely to the territory of the Soviet Union and of the United States and would not cover the forces of these two countries elsewhere, or the forces of our Allies.

It is quite true that both the Soviet Union and the United States have substantial military forces beyond their sovereign border. Certainly, the Government of the Soviet Union will not deny that it maintains substantial forces in East Germany, Poland, Hungary, Rumania, and other places and locations. However, the most important forces of both the Soviet Union and the United States are located within their sovereign borders.

The overwhelming portion of the forces that would be inevitably involved in an attack are located in both instances within the sovereign borders. This, then, is the place to begin. It is the place where a beginning can be made promptly because it would not require the sovereign decision of many nations or raise the problems involved in negotiating agreements with some 40 to 50 other countries.

The Governments of France and the United Kingdom have already associated themselves with the Eisenhower proposal. Furthermore, the Eisenhower proposal is accepted by the Soviet Union, the United States would be prepared to proceed promptly, so far as it is concerned, to negotiate both with other sovereign states involved and with the Soviet Union for the appropriate extension on a reciprocal, equitable basis of the Eisenhower proposal and the Bulganin control posts to overseas bases, and to the forces of other countries.

Of course, President Eisenhower realized that what he proposed here last July was only a beginning. I recall his exact words. He said, "what I propose, I assure you, would be but a beginning."¹

But it is the beginning, the initial breakthrough, that is often decisive. As President Eisenhower emphasized, the spirit of peace could more surely reign and further disarmament more surely be achieved if mutual understanding and reciprocal openness existed as between the two countries which have the greatest stockpiles of atomic weapons.

It is that moral aspect of President Eisenhower's proposal which the Soviet Union seems entirely to have missed.

3. In the third place, objection is made to what is called "enormous expenditures" which would be required to carry out aerial photography.

It is quite true that there would be considerable expense and that planes and technical facilities might have to be diverted from purposes of war to purposes of peace. The United States, I may say, is prepared to do that. I cannot believe that any country would really refuse to embark on a great project for peace because it required a diversion of resources from war.

4. It is further argued that President Eisenhower's proposal does not provide for "the setting up of control posts at ports, railway junctions," and so forth. I am surprised to hear this argument made after Chairman Bulganin has received President Eisenhower's letter of October 11,¹ in which President Eisenhower said:

I have not forgotten your proposal having to do with stationing inspection teams at key points in our countries, and if you feel this would help to create the better spirit I refer to, we could accept that too.

5. Finally, it is argued that the Eisenhower plan would increase the risk of war because it would give countries information about the military installations of each other and thus enable an aggressor to make a more effective surprise attack.

I know that the Soviet Union has ample information about the United States and about our military and industrial dispositions. And the United States is not totally ignorant of the Soviet Union. Both of us, I surmise, know enough to attack. What is lacking is the deterrent to attack which would come if preparations for attack can be detected so that the aggressor does not have the benefit of surprise.

That is the way in which the Eisenhower proposal would work powerfully for peace.

SOVIET POSITION ON AERIAL PHOTOGRAPHY

We do not ignore the fact that the Soviet Union, although rejecting President Eisenhower's proposal, as he made it, indicates that it would accept a concept of aerial photography as one of the forms of control to be considered, as the Soviet Union puts it, "at the concluding stage of the implementation of measures to reduce armaments and prohibit atomic weapons."²

We accept this statement of the Soviet Union as a welcome advance over prior Soviet positions. We are, nevertheless, grievously disappointed that the Soviet Union now rejects President Eisenhower's proposal as a beginning step to lessen tension between our countries and open the path to further steps for inspection and control, and reduction of armament based thereon.

Perhaps, however, the Soviet delegation's statement of yesterday does not represent the last word of the Soviet Union.

I recall the initial negative reaction of the Soviet Union toward President Eisenhower's atoms-for-peace proposal made in December 1953 before the United Nations. I also remember that by July 1955 the Soviet Union had come to accept in principle that proposal.

I still hope that there will be a similar evolution of Soviet thinking with reference to President Eisenhower's proposal for exchanges of blueprints and reciprocal aerial photography, although I hope that the time lapse will be shorter because time presses.

SOVIETS' ATOMIC PROPOSALS

I turn now to the proposal introduced yesterday by the Soviet delegation on this topic of disarmament,³ a proposal which in the main is a duplication of prior proposals made on various occasions. I deal with this proposal myself only in so far as it deals with atomic matters. There are four items with reference to atomic matters.

² The Geneva Meeting of Foreign Ministers, p. 183.

³ Ibid., pp. 184-186.

One is that "as one of the first measures for the execution of the program for the reduction of armaments and the prohibition of atomic weapons, states processing atomic and hydrogen weapons pledge themselves to discontinue tests of these weapons."

Let me say that, if agreement can be reached to eliminate or limit nuclear weapons under proper safeguards, the United States would be prepared to agree to corresponding restrictions on the testing of such weapons.

Then there are two rather similar items, one of which suggests that the four powers would pledge themselves "not to be the first to use atomic and hydrogen weapons," and the other of which suggests that they should "pledge themselves not to use nuclear weapons."

These suggestions are subject to the grave defect that they contemplate only promises.

It is basic in the United States policy not to allow its security to be dependent upon promises and agreements which may prove illusory. We had this week a grave disillusionment when we sought fulfillment of the Soviet agreement that Germany should be reunified by free elections.

It can hardly be expected that the United States would depend upon pledges which cannot be relied upon and for the performance of which no dependable controls are provided.

We further point out that if a war begins it will be because some nation has violated the solemn pledge contained in the charter of the United Nations, and found in many other international agreements, to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the charter. If a nation breaks that pledge, how can we assume that it will live up to its pledge not to use atomic weapons, or not to be the first to use them? The United States has agreed not to use force against the Soviet Union in violation of the charter of the United Nations. But if the Soviet Union does not believe that we shall live by that pledge, why does it want more pledges? And vice versa?

NEED FOR "ATMOSPHERE OF TRUST"

With respect to the proposal that all atomic weapons shall be eliminated, I call attention to the powerful statement made by the Soviet Union in its May 10 proposals,¹ to the effect that there can be no assurance of the elimination of atomic weapons. I should like to read from that statement:

There are possibilities beyond the reach of international control for evading this control and for organizing the clandestine manufacture of atomic and hydrogen weapons, even if there is a formal agreement on international control. In such a situation the security of the states signatory to the international convention cannot be guaranteed, since the possibility would be open to a potential aggressor to accumulate stocks of atomic and hydrogen weapons for a surprise atomic attack on peace-loving states.

Until an atmosphere of trust has been created in relations between states, any agreement on the institution of international control can only serve to lull the vigilance of the peoples. It will create a false sense of security, while in reality there will be a danger of the production of atomic and hydrogen weapons and hence the threat of surprise attack and the unleashing of an atomic war with all its appalling consequences for the people.

It is the danger so graphically portrayed by the Soviet Union that creates the problem with which we are all wrestling. It will, we assume, come again before the United Nations disarmament subcommittee. We here are obviously unable to solve that problem, nor are we prepared to anticipate what will be the conclusions of the scientific experts who are dealing with the matter.

It will be recalled that in the proposal which the three Western powers submitted yesterday¹ we called for "continued scientific search by each state, with appropriate consultation between governments, for methods which might be derived from evolving scientific knowledge that would make possible a thoroughly effective inspection and control system of nuclear weapons material as part of a disarmament program covering all kinds of armaments."

It cannot reasonably be expected that we here shall agree to an elimination of nuclear weapons in the face of the difficulties and dangers to which the Soviet Union has itself directed our attention and which create a situation such that—in the words of the Soviet Union—we cannot be assured "until an atmosphere of trust has been created in relations between states." We can only regret that at this conference the position of the Soviet Union has brought no progress, but retrogression, as regards "an atmosphere of trust." It is more than ever inevitable that the United States should adhere closely to the position which President Eisenhower set forth in his address of July 25, 1955:

In the matter of disarmament, the American Government believes that an effective disarmament system can be reached only if at its base there is an effective reciprocal inspection and overall supervision system, one in which we can have confidence and each side can know that the other side is carrying out its commitments.²

I have given the reasons why the United States cannot entertain disarmament proposals from the Soviet Union which are predicated upon mutual trust and confidence, which does not now exist. We urge that the Soviet Union realistically accept that fact and that through the United Nations disarmament subcommittee we develop as rapidly and as fully as possible an effective reciprocal inspection and overall supervision system. Then we would, indeed, have a basis for the reduction of armaments which we all want and which would enable the resources of the world more fully to be dedicated to the welfare of mankind.

34. PROPOSAL FOR CONCLUSION OF AN INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION (TREATY) ON THE REDUCTION OF ARMAMENTS AND THE PROHIBITION OF ATOMIC, HYDROGEN AND OTHER WEAPONS OF MASS DESTRUCTION: Resolution 914 (X) of the United Nations General Assembly, December 16, 1955¹

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 808 (IX) of 4 November 1954,² which established the conclusion that a further effort should be made to reach agreement on comprehensive and co-ordinated proposals to be embodied in a draft international disarmament convention providing for:

(a) The regulation, limitation and major reduction of all armed forces and all conventional armaments,

(b) The total prohibition of the use and manufacture of nuclear weapons and weapons of mass destruction of every type, together with the conversion of existing stocks of nuclear weapons for peaceful purposes,

(c) The establishment of effective international control, through a control organ with rights, powers and functions adequate to guarantee the effective observance of the agreed reductions of all armaments and armed forces and the prohibition of nuclear and other weapons of mass destruction, and to ensure the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only,

The whole programme to be such that no State would have cause to fear that its security was endangered,

Expressing the hope that efforts to relax international tensions, to promote mutual confidence and to develop co-operation among States, such as the Geneva Conference of the Heads of Government of the four Powers, the Bandung Conference of Asian and African countries and the United Nations tenth anniversary commemorative meeting at San Francisco, will prove effective in promoting world peace,

Desirous of contributing to the lowering of international tensions, the strengthening of confidence between States, the removal of the threat of war and the reduction of the burden of armaments,

Convinced therefore of the need to continue to seek agreement on a comprehensive programme for disarmament which will promote international peace and security with the least diversion for armaments of the world's human and economic resources,

Welcoming the progress which has been made towards agreement on objectives during the meetings in 1955 of the Sub-Committee of the Disarmament Commission,

Noting that agreement has not yet been reached on the rights, powers and functions of a control system, which is the keystone of any disarmament agreement, nor on other essential matters set out in General Assembly resolution 808 (IX),

Noting also that special technical difficulties have arisen in regard to the detection and control of nuclear weapons material,

Recognizing further that inspection and control of disarmament can best be achieved in an atmosphere which is free of fear and suspicion,

1. Urges that the States concerned and particularly those on the Sub-Committee of the Disarmament Commission:

(a) Should continue their endeavours to reach agreement on a comprehensive disarmament plan in accordance with the goals set out in General Assembly resolution 808 (IX);

(b) Should, as initial steps, give priority to early agreement on and implementation of:

(i) Such confidence-building measures as the plan of Mr. Eisenhower, President of the United States of America, for exchanging military blueprints and mutual aerial inspection,¹ and the plan of Mr. Bulganin, Prime Minister of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, for establishing control posts at strategic centres;²

(ii) All such measures of adequately safeguarded disarmament as are now feasible;

2. Suggests that account should also be taken of the proposals of the Prime Minister of France for exchanging and publishing information regarding military expenditures and budgets,³ of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland for seeking practical experience in the problems of inspection and control,⁴ and of the Government of India regarding the suspension of experimental explosions of nuclear weapons and an "armaments truce";

3. Calls upon the States concerned, and especially those on the Sub-Committee of the Disarmament Commission, to study the proposal of the Prime Minister of France for the allocation of funds resulting from disarmament for improving the standards of living throughout the world and, in particular, in the less-developed countries;⁵

4. Recommends further that scientific search should be continued by each State, with appropriate consultation between Governments, for methods that would make possible thoroughly effective inspection and control of nuclear weapons material, having as its aim to facilitate the solution of the problem of comprehensive disarmament;

5. Suggests that the Disarmament Commission reconvene its Sub-

. SHARING OF UNITED STATES ATOMIC ENERGY INFORMATION, 1954-1955

. REVISION OF THE ATOMIC ENERGY ACT OF 1946: Message From the President to the Congress, February 17, 1954¹

to the Congress of the United States:

For the purpose of strengthening the defense and economy of the United States and of the free world, I recommend that the Congress approve a number of amendments to the Atomic Energy Act of 1946.² These amendments would accomplish this purpose, with proper security safeguards, through the following means:

First, widened cooperation with our allies in certain atomic energy matters;

Second, improved procedures for the control and dissemination of atomic energy information; and,

Third, encouragement of broadened participation in the development of peacetime uses of atomic energy in the United States.

NUCLEAR PROGRESS

In 1946, when the Atomic Energy Act was written, the world was at the threshold of the atomic era. A new and elemental source of tremendous energy had been unlocked by the United States the year before. To harness its power in peaceful and productive service was then our hope and our goal, but its awesome destructiveness overshadowed its potential for good. In the minds of most people this new energy was equated with the atomic bomb, and the bomb belled the erasure of cities and the mass death of men, women, and children.

Moreover, this Nation's monopoly of atomic weapons was of crucial importance in international relations. The common defense and world peace required that this monopoly be protected and prolonged by the most stringent security safeguards.

In this atmosphere the Atomic Energy Act was written. Well suited to conditions then existing, the act in the main is still adequate to the Nation's needs.

Since 1946, however, there has been great progress in nuclear science and technology. Generations of normal scientific development have been compressed into less than a decade. Each successive year has seen technological advances in atomic energy exceeding even progressive estimates. The anticipations of 1946, when Government policy was established and the Atomic Energy Act was written, have been far outdistanced.

One popular assumption of 1946—that the United States could maintain its monopoly in atomic weapons for an appreciable time—was quickly proved invalid. That monopoly disappeared in 1949, only 3 years after the Atomic Energy Act was enacted. But to counterbalance that debit on the atomic ledger there have been mighty increases in our assets.

A wide variety of atomic weapons—considered in 1946 to be mere possibilities of a distant future—have today achieved conventional status in the arsenals of our Armed Forces. The thermonuclear weapon, nonexistent 8 years ago, today dwarfs in destructive power all atomic weapons. The practicability of constructing a submarine with atomic propulsion was questionable in 1946; 3 weeks ago the launching of the U. S. S. Nautilus made it certain that the use of atomic energy for ship propulsion will ultimately become widespread. In 1946, too, economic industrial power from atomic energy sources seemed very remote; today, it is clearly in sight—largely a matter of further research and development, and the establishment of conditions in which the spirit of enterprise can flourish.

Obviously, such developments as these within so short a period should have had a profound influence on the Nation's atomic energy policy. But in a number of respects our atomic energy law is still designed to fit the conditions of 1946.

Many statutory restrictions, based on such actual facts of 1946 as the American monopoly of atomic weapons and limited application of atomic energy in civilian and military fields, are inconsistent with the nuclear realities of 1954. Furthermore, these restrictions impede the proper exploitation of nuclear energy for the benefit of the American people and of our friends throughout the free world.

An objective assessment of these varied factors leads clearly to these conclusions: In respect to defense considerations, our atomic effectiveness will be increased if certain limited information on the use of atomic weapons can be imparted more readily to nations allied with us in common defense. In respect to peaceful applications of atomic energy, these can be developed more rapidly and their benefits more widely realized through broadened cooperation with friendly nations and through greater participation by American industry. By enhancing our military effectiveness, we strengthen our efforts to deter aggression; by enlarging opportunities for peacetime development, we accelerate our own progress and strengthen the free world.

Section 1 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1946 wisely recognizes the need for future revisions of the law. In its spirit, and in consideration of matters of the utmost importance to the Nation's defense and welfare, I recommend that the Congress approve a number of amendments to the Atomic Energy Act.

COOPERATION WITH OTHER NATIONS

In this atomic era the growth of international cooperation for the defense of the free world is the most heartening development on the world political scene. The United States is allied with many friends in measures to deter aggression and, where necessary, to defeat the aggressor. The agreements binding ourselves and our friends in common defense constitute a warning to any potential aggressor that his punishment will be swift and his defeat inevitable. These powerful influences for peace must be made as strong and convincing as possible.

Most of our friends among the nations have had little opportunity to inform themselves on the employment of atomic weapons. Under present law we cannot give them tactical information essential to their effective participation with us in combined military operations and planning, and to their own defense against atomic attack.

Our own security will increase as our allies gain information concerning the use of and the defense against atomic weapons. Some of our allies, in fact, are now producing fissionable materials or weapons, supporting effective atomic energy research and developing peacetime uses for atomic power. But all of them should become better informed in the problems of atomic warfare and, therefore, better prepared to meet the contingency of such warfare. In order for the free world to be an effective defense unit, it must be geared to the atomic facts of this era.

I urge, therefore, that authority be provided to exchange with nations participating in defensive arrangements with the United States such tactical information as is essential to the development of defense plans and to the training of personnel for atomic warfare. Amendments to the definition of "restricted data" recommended later in this message will also contribute to needed administrative flexibility in the exchange of information with such nations concerning the use of atomic weapons.

To meet a specific defense need existing in 1951, the Congress approved a carefully limited procedure for the communication of information on the processing of atomic raw materials, reactor development, production of fissionable materials, and related research and development.¹ These limitations should now be modified so that the authority to communicate information, adjusted to present conditions, may be better used to our national advantage.

In the development of peaceful uses for atomic energy, additional amendments are required for effective United States cooperation with friendly nations. Such cooperation requires the exchange of certain "restricted data" on the industrial applications of atomic energy and also the release of fissionable materials in amounts adequate for industrial and research use. I therefore recommend that the Atomic Energy Act be amended to authorize such cooperation. Such amendments should prescribe that before the conclusion of any arrangements for the transfer of fissionable material to a foreign nation, assurances must be provided against its use by the recipient nation for military purposes.

Sharing certain information with other nations involves risks that must be weighed, in each instance, against the net advantages to the United States. In each case we must be guided by such considerations as: The sensitivity and importance of the data, the specific uses to which the information will be put, the security standards of the cooperating nation, its role in the common defense of the free world, and the contributions it has made and can make to the mutual security effort. Such considerations apply to the exchange or communication of information on general-defense planning and the employment of conventional weapons as well as to the information that could be exchanged pursuant to these recommendations.

These recommendations are apart from my proposal to seek a new basis for international cooperation in the field of atomic energy as outlined in my address before the General Assembly of the United Nations last December.¹ Consideration of additional legislation which may be needed to implement that proposal should await the development of areas of agreement as a result of our discussions with other nations.

In a related area, present law prevents United States citizens or corporations from engaging directly or indirectly in the production of fissionable material outside the United States, except upon determination by the President that the proposed activity will not adversely affect the common defense and security. Matters that have arisen under this provision have been ordinary business or commercial activities which nevertheless fall within the broad statutory prohibition because they might contribute in some degree, however minor, to foreign atomic-energy programs. The President should be enabled to authorize the Atomic Energy Commission to make future determinations of this nature. This amendment is related also to the above amendment concerning the exchange of information with other countries, as arrangements for authorized exchanges of information with friendly foreign governments may involve participation by American citizens or firms in work in foreign countries. The proposed amendment would permit the Atomic Energy Commission also to authorize such participation.

All of these proposed amendments should make it clear that the authority granted must be exercised only in accordance with conditions prescribed by the President to protect the common defense and security.

PROTECTION OF ATOMIC-ENERGY INFORMATION

A special category of "restricted data," so defined as to include virtually all atomic-energy data of security significance, is now established by law. "Restricted data" are protected in the law by special espionage provisions, provisions relating to the control, dissemination, and declassification of such data, and by requirements for personnel security clearances.

Personnel security.—The provisions of the act relating to security clearances of personnel need improvement in several respects. The act does not recognize degrees of sensitivity of "restricted data." The same clearance requirements apply to any type of "restricted data," whether it be access by the unskilled construction laborer to "restricted data" of only marginal security significance, or access by a scientist to the heart of atomic weapons information. The Atomic Energy Commission lacks sufficient latitude under present law to determine the extent of personnel investigation needed for adequate security. Many costly background investigations required by present law are unnecessary. The Atomic Energy Commission should be permitted to relate the scope of investigation required under the act to the significance of the access to "restricted data" which will be permitted.

This amendment is especially pertinent to the proposed broadening of private participation in the development of atomic power. While such private participants will require access to "restricted data" on reactor technology, full investigations of all their employees who will have such access are not warranted because much of the data involved will not have significant security importance. Moreover, such investigations would impede and discourage the desired participation and would be unnecessarily costly both to Government and to industry. Where access to more sensitive "restricted data" is involved, the Commission must, of course, require full investigations.

Another security clearance problem relates to personnel of Department of Defense agencies and to the personnel of contractors with those agencies. The Atomic Energy Commission may now disclose "restricted data" to such of these personnel as have security clearances from the Department of Defense. The "restricted data" so disclosed by the Commission are thereafter protected in accordance with Department of Defense security regulations. And yet, contractors of the Commission are precluded by law from granting the same personnel access to the same "restricted data" until they have had AEC clearances, based on investigations by the Federal Bureau of Investigation or the Civil Service Commission.

As applications of atomic energy become increasingly widespread within the armed services, the necessity increases for communication of "restricted data" between AEC contractors and participants in related Department of Defense programs. The present fact that personnel engaged in military programs who have military clearances must be denied access to "restricted data" by AEC contractor personnel impedes cooperation between the Department of Defense and the Atomic Energy Commission in areas of mutual interest and causes unnecessary expense in time and money. I, therefore, recommend that the Atomic Energy Commission be enabled to authorize its contractors and licensees to afford access to "restricted data" to personnel engaged in Department of Defense programs who need such data in their work and who possess the proper military security clearances.

The definition of "restricted data".—(1) A large body of "restricted data" under present law relates primarily to military utilization of atomic weapons. The responsibility for the control of much of this weapons information logically should rest with the Department of Defense rather than with the Commission. Many administrative difficulties that are produced by a dual system of security would be eliminated by the removal of this weapons information from the "restricted data" category and its subsequent protection by the Department of Defense in the same manner and under the same safeguards as other military secrets.

This method of handling weapons information is not possible under present law. "Restricted data" can be removed from the statutory "restricted data" category only by declassification, upon a determination by the Atomic Energy Commission that the publication of such data would not adversely affect the common defense and security. Declassification obviously is not the remedy. The remedy lies in reliance upon the standard security measures of the user, the Department of Defense. I recommend, therefore, that the statutory definition of "restricted data" be amended to exclude information concerning the utilization of atomic weapons, as distinguished from information on their theory, design, and manufacture.

(2) In addition to information which falls wholly within the utilization category, there is information which concerns primarily the utilization of weapons but which pertains also to their design and manufacture. In order to avoid difficulties in this marginal zone, I recommend legislation which also would authorize removal of such information from the "restricted data" category. This would be done only when the Commission and the Department of Defense jointly determine that it relates primarily to military utilization of atomic weapons and that it can be adequately safeguarded as classified defense information under the Espionage Act and other applicable law.¹

(3) Consistent with these changes, I recommend that the Department of Defense join with the Atomic Energy Commission in any declassification of "restricted data" which relate primarily to military utilization of atomic weapons and which can be published without endangering the national security. Thus, the Department of Defense will have an appropriate voice in the protection and declassification of such "restricted data" and the responsibilities of the Commission will be clarified with respect to all other "restricted data."

DOMESTIC DEVELOPMENT OF ATOMIC ENERGY

What was only a hope and a distant goal in 1946—the beneficent use of atomic energy in human service—can soon be a reality. Before our scientists and engineers lie rich possibilities in the harnessing of atomic power. The Federal Government can pioneer in its development. But, in this undertaking, the enterprise, initiative, and competitive spirit of individuals and groups within our free economy are needed to assure the greatest efficiency and progress at the least cost to the public.

Industry's interest in this field is already evident. In collaboration with the Atomic Energy Commission a number of private corporations are now conducting studies, largely at their own expense, of the various reactor types which might be developed to produce economic power. There are indications that they would increase their efforts significantly if the way were open for private investment in such reactors. In amending the law to permit such investment, care must be taken to encourage the development of this new industry in a manner as nearly normal as possible, with careful regulation to protect the national security and the public health and safety. It is essential that this program so proceed that this new industry will develop self-reliance and self-sufficiency.

The creation of opportunities for broadened industrial participation may permit the Government to reduce its own reactor research and development after private industrial activity is well established. For the present, in addition to contributing toward the advancement of power-reactor technology, the Government will continue to speed progress in the related technology of military propulsion reactors. The present complementary efforts of industry and Government will therefore continue, and industry should be encouraged by the enactment of appropriate legislation to assume a substantially more significant role. To this end, I recommend amendments to the Atomic Energy Act which would—

1. Relax statutory restrictions against ownership or lease of fissionable material and of facilities capable of producing fissionable material.

2. Permit private manufacture, ownership, and operation of atomic reactors and related activities, subject to necessary safeguards and under licensing systems administered by the Atomic Energy Commission.

3. Authorize the Commission to establish minimum safety and security regulations to govern the use and possession of fissionable material.

4. Permit the Commission to supply licensees special materials and services needed in the initial stages of the new industry at prices estimated to compensate the Government adequately for the value of the materials and services and the expense to the Government in making them available.

5. Liberalize the patent provisions of the Atomic Energy Act, principally by expanding the area in which private patents can be obtained to include the production as well as utilization of fissionable material, while continuing for a limited period the authority to require a patent owner to license others to use an invention essential to the peacetime applications of atomic energy.

Until industrial participation in the utilization of atomic energy acquires a broader base, considerations of fairness require some mechanism to assure that the limited number of companies which, as Government contractors now have access to the program, cannot build a patent monopoly which would exclude others desiring to enter the field. I hope that participation in the development of atomic power will have broadened sufficiently in the next 5 years to remove the need for such provisions.

In order to encourage the greatest possible progress in domestic application of atomic energy, flexibility is necessary in licensing and regulatory provisions of the legislation. Until further experience with this new industry has been gained, it would be unwise to try to anticipate by law all of the many problems that are certain to arise. Just as the basic Atomic Energy Act recognized by its own terms that it was experimental in a number of respects, so these amendments will be subject to continuing future change and refinement.

The destiny of all nations during the 20th century will turn in large measure upon the nature and the pace of atomic energy development here and abroad. The revisions to the Atomic Energy Act herein recommended will help make it possible for American atomic energy development, public and private, to play a full and effective part in leading mankind into a new era of progress and peace.

36. STABLE ISOTOPES AVAILABLE FOR FOREIGN DISTRIBUTION: Statement Issued to the Press by the United States Atomic Energy Commission, July 1, 1954¹

Stable isotopes produced in facilities of the U. S. Atomic Energy Commission will be available for foreign distribution under a program announced today by the Commission.²

Radioisotopes have been sold to foreign users by the Commission since 1947,³ but stable isotopes generally have been available only to users within the United States. About 175 stable isotopes of nearly 50 elements are produced by the AEC. Stable isotopes, like radioisotopes, are valuable tools for basic research in various scientific fields.

A total of 48 foreign countries has been authorized to receive radioisotopes produced in the United States, and approximately 2,500 foreign shipments of radioisotopes have been made. Foreign requests for stable isotopes will be forwarded to the Commission through the official representatives of foreign nations for radioisotope procurement.

The terms and conditions for obtaining stable isotopes will be the same as those which now apply to foreign requests for radioisotopes. The applicant must agree to use the isotope only for the purpose stated in the application, and also must agree to report research results to the AEC. Foreign countries may obtain isotopes for scientific research, medical research, industrial isotopes for scientific research, medical research, industrial research, medical therapy and industrial utilization.

Stable isotopes will be sold at prices which will recover full costs of production. The quantity of a stable isotope approved for export will be limited to the amount generally provided to a domestic user for a similar purpose.

Although some stable isotopes have been produced since the 1930's, pre-World War II techniques for the concentration and separation of stable isotopes were impracticable for most elements, and only very minute quantities of pure separated isotopes could be obtained.

Electromagnetic separation was one of the methods used during World War II to separate the uranium-235 isotope, needed for atomic weapons, from the more common uranium-238 isotope. This method no longer is used for uranium separation. However, part of the electromagnetic separation plant at the Oak Ridge National Laboratory has been utilized for the production of stable isotopes for research, in quantities much greater than were available before. Most stable isotopes now are produced by electromagnetic separation.

Stable isotopes have various research uses. Some elements do not have radioisotopes with half-lives long enough to make their use feasible in experiments. Stable isotopes of these elements can be used in tracer experiments. Boron-10 is useful as a neutron detector. Deuterium, the stable heavy isotope of hydrogen, has been utilized in biological and chemical studies. Helium 3 is important in low-temperature studies.

37. ATOMIC ENERGY ACT OF 1954: Public Law 703 (83d Congress, 2d Session), August 30, 1954 (Excerpts)¹

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Atomic Energy Act of 1946,² as amended, is amended to read as follows:

“CHAPTER 1. DECLARATION, FINDINGS, AND PURPOSE

“SECTION 1. DECLARATION.—Atomic energy is capable of application for peaceful as well as military purposes. It is therefore declared to be the policy of the United States that—

“a. the development, use, and control of atomic energy shall be directed so as to make the maximum contribution to the general welfare, subject at all times to the paramount objective of making the maximum contribution to the common defense and security; and

¹ 68 Stat. 919. For statement of the President on signing the act, see Department of State Bulletin, Sept. 13, 1954, pp. 365-366.

"b. the development, use, and control of atomic energy shall be directed so as to promote world peace, improve the general welfare, increase the standard of living, and strengthen free competition in private enterprise.

"SEC. 2. FINDINGS.—The Congress of the United States hereby makes the following findings concerning the development, use, and control of atomic energy:

"a. The development, utilization, and control of atomic energy for military and for all other purposes are vital to the common defense and security.

"b. In permitting the property of the United States to be used by others, such use must be regulated in the national interest and in order to provide for the common defense and security and to protect the health and safety of the public.

"c. The processing and utilization of source, byproduct, and special nuclear material affect interstate and foreign commerce and must be regulated in the national interest.

"d. The processing and utilization of source, byproduct, and special nuclear material must be regulated in the national interest and in order to provide for the common defense and security and to protect the health and safety of the public.

"e. Source and special nuclear material, production facilities, and utilization facilities are affected with the public interest, and regulation by the United States of the production and utilization of atomic energy and of the facilities used in connection therewith is necessary in the national interest to assure the common defense and security and to protect the health and safety of the public.

"f. The necessity for protection against possible interstate damage occurring from the operation of facilities for the production or utilization of source or special nuclear material places the operation of those facilities in interstate commerce for the purposes of this Act.

"g. Funds of the United States may be provided for the development and use of atomic energy under conditions which will provide for the common defense and security and promote the general welfare.

"h. It is essential to the common defense and security that title to all special nuclear material be in the United States while such special nuclear material is within the United States.

"SEC. 3. PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this Act to effectuate the policies set forth above by providing for—"a. a program of conducting, assisting, and fostering research and development in order to encourage maximum scientific and industrial progress;

"b. a program for the dissemination of unclassified scientific and technical information and for the control, dissemination, and declassification of Restricted Data, subject to appropriate safeguards, so as to encourage scientific and industrial progress;

"c. a program for Government control of the possession, use, and production of atomic energy and special nuclear material so directed as to make the maximum contribution to the common defense and security and the national welfare;

"d. a program to encourage widespread participation in the development and utilization of atomic energy for peaceful purposes to the maximum extent consistent with the common defense and security and with the health and safety of the public;

"e. a program of international cooperation to promote the common defense and security and to make available to cooperating nations the benefits of peaceful applications of atomic energy as widely as expanding technology and considerations of the common defense and security will permit; and

"f. a program of administration which will be consistent with the foregoing policies and programs, with international arrangements, and with agreements for cooperation, which will enable the Congress to be currently informed so as to take further legislative action as may be appropriate.

"CHAPTER 2. DEFINITIONS

SEC. 11. DEFINITIONS.—The intent of Congress in the definitions as set forth in this section should be construed from the words or phrases used in the definitions. As used in this Act:

a. The term 'agency of the United States' means the executive branch of the United States, or any Government agency, or the legislative branch of the United States, or any agency, committee, commission, office, or other establishment in the legislative branch, or the judicial branch of the United States, or any office, agency, committee, commission, or other establishment in the judicial branch.

b. The term 'agreement for cooperation' means any agreement between a nation or regional defense organization, authorized or approved by sections 54, 57, 64, 82, 103, 104, or 144, and made pursuant to section 123.

c. The term 'atomic energy' means all forms of energy released in the course of nuclear fission or nuclear transformation.

d. The term 'atomic weapon' means any device utilizing atomic energy, exclusive of the means for transporting or propelling the device (where such means is a separable and divisible part of the device), the principal purpose of which is for use as, or for development of, a weapon, a weapon prototype, or a weapon test device.

e. The term 'byproduct material' means any radioactive material (except special nuclear material) yielded in or made radioactive by exposure to the radiation incident to the process of producing or utilizing special nuclear material.

f. The term 'Commission' means the Atomic Energy Commission.

g. The term 'common defense and security' means the common defense and security of the United States.

h. The term 'defense information' means any information in any category determined by any Government agency authorized to classify information, as being information respecting, relating to, or affecting the national defense.

"i. The term 'design' means (1) specifications, plans, drawings, blueprints, and other items of like nature; (2) the information contained therein; or (3) the research and development data pertinent to the information contained therein.

"j. The term 'Government agency' means any executive department, commission, independent establishment, corporation, wholly or partly owned by the United States of America which is an instrumentality of the United States, or any board, bureau, division, service, office, officer, authority, administration, or other establishment in the executive branch of the Government.

"k. The term 'international arrangement' means any international agreement hereafter approved by the Congress or any treaty during the time such agreement or treaty is in full force and effect, but does not include any agreement for cooperation.

"l. The term 'Joint Committee' means the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

"m. The term 'operator' means any individual who manipulates the controls of a utilization or production facility.

"n. The term 'person' means (1) any individual, corporation, partnership, firm, association, trust, estate, public or private institution, group, Government agency other than the Commission, any State or any political subdivision of, or any political entity within a State, any foreign government or nation or any political subdivision of any such government or nation, or other entity; and (2) any legal successor, representative, agent, or agency of the foregoing.

"o. The term 'produce', when used in relation to special nuclear material, means (1) to manufacture, make, produce, or refine special nuclear material; (2) to separate special nuclear material from other substances in which such material may be contained; or (3) to make or to produce new special nuclear material.

"p. The term 'production facility' means (1) any equipment or device determined by rule of the Commission to be capable of the production of special nuclear material in such quantity as to be of significance to the common defense and security, or in such manner as to affect the health and safety of the public; or (2) any important component part especially designed for such equipment or device as determined by the Commission.

"q. The term 'research and development' means (1) theoretical analysis, exploration, or experimentation; or (2) the extension of investigative findings and theories of a scientific or technical nature into practical application for experimental and demonstration purposes, including the experimental production and testing of models, devices, equipment, materials, and processes.

"r. The term 'Restricted Data' means all data concerning (1) design, manufacture, or utilization of atomic weapons; (2) the production of special nuclear material; or (3) the use of special nuclear material in the production of energy, but shall not include data declassified or removed from the Restricted Data category pursuant to section 142.

's. The term 'source material' means (1) uranium, thorium, or any other material which is determined by the Commission pursuant to the provisions of section 61 to be source material; or (2) ores containing one or more of the foregoing materials, in such concentration as the Commission may by regulation determine from time to time.

't. The term 'special nuclear material' means (1) plutonium, uranium enriched in the isotope 233 or in the isotope 235, and any other material which the Commission pursuant to the provisions of section 61 determines to be special nuclear material, but does not include source material; or (2) any material artificially enriched by any of the foregoing, but does not include source material.

'u. The term 'United States', when used in a geographical sense, includes all Territories and possessions of the United States, and the continental Zone.

'v. The term 'utilization facility' means (1) any equipment or device, except an atomic weapon, determined by rule of the Commission to be capable of making use of special nuclear material in such quantity as to be of significance to the common defense and security, or in such manner as to affect the health and safety of the public, or peculiarly adapted for making use of atomic energy in such quantity as to be of significance to the common defense and security, or in such manner as to affect the health and safety of the public; or (2) any important component part especially designed for such equipment or device as determined by the Commission.

"CHAPTER 3. ORGANIZATION

SEC. 21. ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION.—There is hereby established the Atomic Energy Commission, which shall be composed of five members, each of whom shall be a citizen of the United States. The President shall designate one member of the Commission as Chairman thereof to serve as such during the pleasure of the President. The Chairman may from time to time designate any other member of the Commission as Acting Chairman to act in the place and stead of the Chairman during his absence. The Chairman (or the Acting Chairman in the absence of the Chairman) shall preside at all meetings of the Commission and a quorum for the transaction of business shall consist of at least three members present. Each member of the Commission, including the Chairman, shall have equal responsibility and authority in all decisions and actions of the Commission and shall have one vote. Action of the Commission shall be determined by a majority vote of the members present. The Chairman (or Acting Chairman in the absence of the Chairman) shall be the official spokesman of the Commission in its relations with the Congress, Government agencies, persons, or the public, and, on behalf of the Commission, shall see to the faithful execution of the policies and decisions of the Commission, and shall report thereon to the Commission from time to time or as the Commission may direct. The Commission shall have an official seal which shall be judicially noticed.

[Sections 22-28 deal with Members, Office, General Manager, Divisions and Offices, General Advisory Committee, Military Liaison Committee, and Appointment of Army, Navy, or Air Force Officers.]

"CHAPTER 4. RESEARCH

"SEC. 31. RESEARCH ASSISTANCE.—

"a. The Commission is directed to exercise its powers in such manner as to insure the continued conduct of research and development activities in the fields specified below, by private or public institutions or persons, and to assist in the acquisition of an ever-expanding fund of theoretical and practical knowledge in such fields. To this end the Commission is authorized and directed to make arrangements (including contracts, agreements, and loans) for the conduct of research and development activities relating to—

- "(1) nuclear processes;
- "(2) the theory and production of atomic energy, including processes, materials, and devices related to such production;
- "(3) utilization of special nuclear material and radioactive material for medical, biological, agricultural, health, or military purposes;
- "(4) utilization of special nuclear material, atomic energy, and radioactive material and processes entailed in the utilization or production of atomic energy or such material for all other purposes, including industrial uses, the generation of usable energy, and the demonstration of the practical value of utilization or production facilities for industrial or commercial purposes; and
- "(5) the protection of health and the promotion of safety during research and production activities.

"b. The Commission may (1) make arrangements pursuant to this section, without regard to the provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes,¹ as amended, upon certification by the Commission that such action is necessary in the interest of the common defense and security, or upon a showing by the Commission that advertising is not reasonably practicable; (2) make partial and advance payments under such arrangements; and (3) make available for use in connection therewith such of its equipment and facilities as it may deem desirable.

"c. The arrangements made pursuant to this section shall contain such provisions (1) to protect health, (2) to minimize danger to life or property, and (3) to require the reporting and to permit the inspection of work performed thereunder, as the Commission may determine. No such arrangement shall contain any provisions or conditions which prevent the dissemination of scientific or technical information, except to the extent such dissemination is prohibited by law.

"SEC. 32. RESEARCH BY THE COMMISSION.—The Commission is authorized and directed to conduct, through its own facilities, activities and studies of the types specified in section 31.

"SEC. 33. RESEARCH FOR OTHERS.—Where the Commission finds private facilities or laboratories are inadequate to the purpose, it is authorized to conduct for other persons, through its own facilities, such of those activities and studies of the types specified in section 31 as it deems appropriate to the development of atomic energy. The Commission is authorized to determine and make such charges as in its discretion may be desirable for the conduct of such activities and studies.

"CHAPTER 5. PRODUCTION OF SPECIAL NUCLEAR MATERIAL

"SEC. 41. OWNERSHIP AND OPERATION OF PRODUCTION FACILITIES.—

"a. OWNERSHIP OF PRODUCTION FACILITIES.—The Commission, as agent of and on behalf of the United States, shall be the exclusive owner of all production facilities other than facilities which (1) are useful in the conduct of research and development activities in the fields specified in section 31, and do not, in the opinion of the Commission, have a potential production rate adequate to enable the user of such facilities to produce within a reasonable period of time a sufficient quantity of special nuclear material to produce an atomic weapon; or (2) are licensed by the Commission pursuant to section 103 or 104.

[Subsections b. and c. deal with operation of the commission's production facilities and operation of other production facilities. Sections 42 and 43 deal with Irradiation of Materials and Acquisition of Production Facilities.]

"SEC. 44. DISPOSITION OF ENERGY.—If energy is produced at production facilities of the Commission or is produced in experimental utilization facilities of the Commission, such energy may be used by the Commission, or transferred to other Government agencies, or sold to publicly, cooperatively, or privately owned utilities or users at reasonable and nondiscriminatory prices. If the energy produced is electric energy, the price shall be subject to regulation by the appropriate agency having jurisdiction. In contracting for the disposal of such energy, the Commission shall give preference and priority to public bodies and cooperatives or to privately owned utilities providing electric utility services to high cost areas not being served by public bodies or cooperatives. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to authorize the Commission to engage in the sale or distribution of energy for commercial use except such energy as may be produced by the Commission incident to the operation of research and development facilities of the Commission, or of production facilities of the Commission.

"CHAPTER 6. SPECIAL NUCLEAR MATERIAL

"SEC. 51. SPECIAL NUCLEAR MATERIAL.—The Commission may determine from time to time that other material is special nuclear material in addition to that specified in the definition as special nuclear material. Before making any such determination, the Commission must find that such material is capable of releasing substantial quantities of atomic energy and must find that the determination that such material is special nuclear material is in the interest of the common defense and security, and the President must have expressly assented in writing to the determination. The Commission's determination, together with the assent of the President, shall be submitted to the Joint Committee and a period of thirty days shall elapse while Congress is in session (in computing such thirty days, there shall be excluded the days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment for more than three days) before the determination of the Commission may become effective: Provided, however, That the Joint Committee, after having received such determination, may by resolution in writing, waive the conditions of or all or any portion of such thirty-day period.

"SEC. 52. GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP OF ALL SPECIAL NUCLEAR MATERIAL.—All rights, title, and interest in or to any special nuclear material within or under the jurisdiction of the United States, now or hereafter produced, shall be the property of the United States and shall be administered and controlled by the Commission as agent of and on behalf of the United States by virtue of this Act. Any person owning any interest in any special nuclear material at the time when such material is hereafter determined to be a special nuclear material shall be paid just compensation therefor. Any person who lawfully produces any special nuclear material, except pursuant to a contract with the Commission under the provisions of section 31 or 41, shall be paid a fair price, determined pursuant to section 56, for producing such material.

"SEC. 53. DOMESTIC DISTRIBUTION OF SPECIAL NUCLEAR MATERIAL.—

[Subsections a.-e. deal with licenses, charges, and license conditions.]

"f. The Commission is directed to distribute within the United States sufficient special nuclear material to permit the conduct of widespread independent research and development activities to the maximum extent practicable and within the limitations set by the President pursuant to section 41. In the event that applications for special nuclear material exceed the amount available for distribution, preference shall be given to those activities which are most likely, in the opinion of the Commission, to contribute to basic research, to the development of peacetime uses of atomic energy, or to the economic and military strength of the Nation.

"SEC. 54. FOREIGN DISTRIBUTION OF SPECIAL NUCLEAR MATERIAL.—The Commission is authorized to cooperate with any nation by distributing special nuclear material and to distribute such special nuclear material, pursuant to the terms of an agreement for cooperation to which such nation is a party and which is made in accordance with section 123.

"SEC. 55. ACQUISITION.—The Commission is authorized to purchase or otherwise acquire any special nuclear material or any interest therein outside the United States without regard to the provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes,¹ as amended, upon certification by the Commission that such action is necessary in the interest of the common defense and security, or upon a showing by the Commission that advertising is not reasonably practicable. Partial and advance payments may be made under contracts for such purposes.

[Section 56 deals with Fair Price.]

"SEC. 57. PROHIBITION.—

"a. It shall be unlawful for any person to—

"(1) possess or transfer any special nuclear material which is the property of the United States except as authorized by the Commission pursuant to subsection 53 a.;

"(2) transfer or receive any special nuclear material in interstate commerce except as authorized by the Commission pursuant to subsection 53 a., or export from or import into the United States any special nuclear material; and

"(3) directly or indirectly engage in the production of any special nuclear material outside of the United States except (A) under an agreement for cooperation made pursuant to section 123, or (B) upon authorization by the Commission after a determination that such activity will not be inimical to the interest of the United States.

"b. The Commission shall not distribute any special nuclear material—

"(1) to any person for a use which is not under the jurisdiction of the United States except pursuant to the provisions of section 54; or

"(2) to any person within the United States, if the Commission finds that the distribution of such special nuclear material to such person would be inimical to the common defense and security.

"CHAPTER 7. SOURCE MATERIAL

"SEC. 61. SOURCE MATERIAL.—The Commission may determine from time to time that other material is source material in addition to those specified in the definition of source material. Before making such determination, the Commission must find that such material is essential to the production of special nuclear material and must find that the determination that such material is source material is in the interest of the common defense and security, and the President must have expressly assented in writing to the determination. The Commission's determination, together with the assent of the President, shall be submitted to the Joint Committee and a period of thirty days shall elapse while Congress is in session (in computing such thirty days, there shall be excluded the days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than three days) before the determination of the Commission may become effective: Provided, however, That the Joint Committee, after having received such determination, may by resolution in writing waive the conditions of or all or any portion of such thirty-day period.

"SEC. 62. LICENSE FOR TRANSFERS REQUIRED.—Unless authorized by a general or specific license issued by the Commission, which the Commission is hereby authorized to issue, no person may transfer or receive in interstate commerce, transfer, deliver, receive possession of or title to, or import into or export from the United States any source material after removal from its place of deposit in nature, except that licenses shall not be required for quantities of source material which, in the opinion of the Commission, are unimportant.

[Section 63 deals with Domestic Distribution of Source Material.]

"SEC. 64. FOREIGN DISTRIBUTION OF SOURCE MATERIAL.—The Commission is authorized to cooperate with any nation by distributing source material and to distribute source material pursuant to the terms of an agreement for cooperation to which such nation is a party and which is made in accordance with section 123. The Commission is also authorized to distribute source material outside of the United States upon a determination by the Commission that such activity will not be inimical to the interests of the United States.

[Sections 65-69 deal with Reporting, Acquisition, Operations on Lands Belonging to the United States, Public Lands, and Prohibition.]

"CHAPTER 8. BYPRODUCT MATERIAL

[Section 81 deals with Domestic Distribution.]

"SEC. 82. FOREIGN DISTRIBUTION OF BYPRODUCT MATERIAL.—

"a. The Commission is authorized to cooperate with any nation by distributing byproduct material, and to distribute byproduct material, pursuant to the terms of an agreement for cooperation to which such nation is party and which is made in accordance with section 123.

"b. The Commission is also authorized to distribute byproduct material to any person outside the United States upon application therefor by such person and demand such charge for such material as would be charged for the material if it were distributed within the United States: Provided, however, That the Commission shall not distribute any such material to any person under this section if, in its opinion, such distribution would be inimical to the common defense and security: And provided further, That the Commission may require such reports regarding the use of material distributed pursuant to the provisions of this section as it deems necessary.

"c. The Commission is authorized to license others to distribute byproduct material to any person outside the United States under the same conditions, except as to charges, as would be applicable if the material were distributed by the Commission.

"CHAPTER 9. MILITARY APPLICATION OF ATOMIC ENERGY

"SEC. 91. AUTHORITY.—

"a. The Commission is authorized to—

"(1) conduct experiments and do research and development work in the military application of atomic energy; and

"(2) engage in the production of atomic weapons, or atomic weapon parts, except that such activities shall be carried on only to the extent that the express consent and direction of the President of the United States has been obtained, which consent and direction shall be obtained at least once each year.

"b. The President from time to time may direct the Commission

(1) to deliver such quantities of special nuclear material or atomic weapons to the Department of Defense for such use as he deems necessary in the interest of national defense, or (2) to authorize the Department of Defense to manufacture, produce, or acquire any atomic weapon or utilization facility for military purposes: Provided, however, That such authorization shall not extend to the production of special nuclear material other than that incidental to the operation of such utilization facilities.

"SEC. 92. PROHIBITION.—It shall be unlawful for any person to transfer or receive in interstate commerce, manufacture, produce, transfer, acquire, possess, import, or export any atomic weapon, except as may be authorized by the Commission pursuant to the provisions of section 91. Nothing in this section shall be deemed to modify the provisions of subsection 31 a. or section 101.

"CHAPTER 10. ATOMIC ENERGY LICENSES

[Sections 101–103 deal with License Required, Finding of Practical Value, and Commercial Licenses.]

"SEC. 104. MEDICAL THERAPY AND RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT.—

"a. The Commission is authorized to issue licenses to persons applying therefor for utilization facilities for use in medical therapy. In issuing such licenses the Commission is directed to permit the widest amount of effective medical therapy possible with the amount of special nuclear material available for such purposes and to impose the minimum amount of regulation consistent with its obligations under this Act to promote the common defense and security and to protect the health and safety of the public.

"b. The Commission is authorized to issue licenses to persons applying therefor for utilization and production facilities involved in the conduct of research and development activities leading to the demonstration of the practical value of such facilities for industrial or commercial purposes. In issuing licenses under this subsection, the Commission shall impose the minimum amount of such regulations and terms of license as will permit the Commission to fulfill its obligations under this Act to promote the common defense and security and to protect the health and safety of the public and will be compatible with the regulations and terms of license which would apply in the event that a commercial license were later to be issued pursuant to section 103 for that type of facility. In issuing such licenses, priority shall be given to those activities which will, in the opinion of the Commission, lead to major advances in the application of atomic energy for industrial or commercial purposes.

"c. The Commission is authorized to issue licenses to persons applying therefor for utilization and production facilities useful in the conduct of research and development activities of the types specified in section 31 and which are not facilities of the type specified in subsection 104 b. The Commission is directed to impose only such minimum amount of regulation of the licensee as the Commission finds will permit the Commission to fulfill its obligations under this Act to promote the common defense and security and to protect the health and safety of the public and will permit the conduct of widespread and diverse research and development.

"d. No license under this section may be given to any person for activities which are not under or within the jurisdiction of the United States, except for the export of production or utilization facilities under terms of an agreement for cooperation arranged pursuant to section 123 or except under the provisions of section 109. No license may be issued to any corporation or other entity if the Commission knows or has reason to believe it is owned, controlled, or dominated by an alien, a foreign corporation, or a foreign government. In any event, no license may be issued to any person within the United States if, in the opinion of the Commission, the issuance of a license to such person would be inimical to the common defense and security or to the health and safety of the public.

[Sections 105-107 deal with Antitrust Provisions, Classes of Facilities, and Operators' Licenses.]

"SEC. 108. WAR OR NATIONAL EMERGENCY.—Whenever the Congress declares that a state of war or national emergency exists, the Commission is authorized to suspend any licenses granted under this Act if in its judgment such action is necessary to the common defense and security. The Commission is authorized during such period, if the Commission finds it necessary to the common defense and security, to order the recapture of any special nuclear material distributed under the provisions of subsection 53 a., or to order the operation of any facility licensed under section 103 or 104, and is authorized to order the entry into any plant or facility in order to recapture such material, or to operate such facility. Just compensation shall be paid for any damages caused by the recapture of any special nuclear material or by the operation of any such facility.

[Sections 109-110 deal with Component Parts of Facilities and Exclusions.]

"CHAPTER 11. INTERNATIONAL ACTIVITIES

"SEC. 121. EFFECT OF INTERNATIONAL ARRANGEMENTS.—Any provision of this Act or any action of the Commission to the extent and during the time that it conflicts with the provisions of any international arrangement made after the date of enactment of this Act shall be deemed to be of no force or effect.

"SEC. 122. POLICIES CONTAINED IN INTERNATIONAL ARRANGEMENTS.—In the performance of its functions under this Act, the Commission shall give maximum effect to the policies contained in any international arrangement made after the date of enactment of this Act.

"SEC. 123. COOPERATION WITH OTHER NATIONS.—No cooperation with any nation or regional defense organization pursuant to sections 54, 57, 64, 82, 103, 104, or 144 shall be undertaken until—

"a. the Commission or, in the case of those agreements for cooperation arranged pursuant to subsection 144 b., the Department of Defense has submitted to the President the proposed agreement for cooperation, together with its recommendation thereon, which proposed agreement shall include (1) the terms, conditions, duration, nature, and scope of the cooperation; (2) a guaranty by the cooperating party that security safeguards and standards as set forth in the agreement for cooperation will be maintained; (3) a guaranty by the cooperating party that any material to be transferred pursuant to such agreement will not be used for atomic weapons, or for research on or development of atomic weapons, or for any other military purpose; and (4) a guaranty by the cooperating party that any material or any Restricted Data to be transferred pursuant to the agreement for cooperation will not be transferred to unauthorized persons or beyond the jurisdiction of the cooperating party, except as specified in the agreement for cooperation;

"b. the President has approved and authorized the execution of the proposed agreement for cooperation, and has made a determination in writing that the performance of the proposed agreement will promote and will not constitute an unreasonable risk to the common defense and security; and

"c. the proposed agreement for cooperation, together with the approval and the determination of the President, has been submitted to the Joint Committee and a period of thirty days has elapsed while Congress is in session (in computing such thirty days, there shall be excluded the days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than three days).

"SEC. 124. INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC POOL.—The President is authorized to enter into an international arrangement with a group of nations providing for international cooperation in the nonmilitary applications of atomic energy and he may thereafter cooperate with that group of nations pursuant to sections 54, 57, 64, 82, 103, 104, or 144 a.: Provided, however, That the cooperation is undertaken pursuant to an agreement for cooperation entered into in accordance with section 123.

"CHAPTER 12. CONTROL OF INFORMATION

"SEC. 141. POLICY.—It shall be the policy of the Commission to control the dissemination and declassification of Restricted Data in such a manner as to assure the common defense and security. Consistent with such policy, the Commission shall be guided by the following principles:

"a. Until effective and enforceable international safeguards against the use of atomic energy for destructive purposes have been established by an international arrangement, there shall be no exchange of Restricted Data with other nations except as authorized by section 144; and

"b. The dissemination of scientific and technical information relating to atomic energy should be permitted and encouraged so as to provide that free interchange of ideas and criticism which is essential to scientific and industrial progress and public understanding and to enlarge the fund of technical information.

"SEC. 142. CLASSIFICATION AND DECLASSIFICATION OF RESTRICTED DATA.—

"a. The Commission shall from time to time determine the data, within the definition of Restricted Data, which can be published without undue risk to the common defense and security and shall thereupon cause such data to be declassified and removed from the category of Restricted Data.

"b. The Commission shall maintain a continuous review of Restricted Data and of any Classification Guides issued for the guidance of those in the atomic energy program with respect to the areas of Restricted Data which have been declassified in order to determine which information may be declassified and removed from the category of Restricted Data without undue risk to the common defense and security.

"c. In the case of Restricted Data which the Commission and the Department of Defense jointly determine to relate primarily to the military utilization of atomic weapons, the determination that such data may be published without constituting an unreasonable risk to the common defense and security shall be made by the Commission and the Department of Defense jointly, and if the Commission and the Department of Defense do not agree, the determination shall be made by the President.

"d. The Commission shall remove from the Restricted Data category such data as the Commission and the Department of Defense jointly determine relates primarily to the military utilization of atomic weapons and which the Commission and Department of Defense jointly determine can be adequately safeguarded as defense information: Provided, however, That no such data so removed from the Restricted Data category shall be transmitted or otherwise made available to any nation or regional defense organization, while such data remains defense information, except pursuant to an agreement for cooperation entered into in accordance with subsection 144 b.

"e. The Commission shall remove from the Restricted Data catetaken pursuant to an agreement entered into in accordance with section 123.

[Sections 145-146 deal with Restrictions and General Provisions.]

"CHAPTER 13. PATENTS AND INVENTIONS

"CHAPTER 14. GENERAL AUTHORITY

[Sections 161-169 deal with General Provisions, Contracts, Advisory Committees, Electric Utility Contracts, Contract Practices, Comptroller General Audit, Claim Settlements, Payments in Lieu of Taxes, and No Subsidy.]

"CHAPTER 15. COMPENSATION FOR PRIVATE PROPERTY ACQUIRED

[Sections 171-174 deal with Just Compensation, Condemnation of Real Property, Patent Application Disclosures, and Attorney General Approval of Title.]

"CHAPTER 16. JUDICIAL REVIEW AND ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE

[Sections 181-189 deal with General, License Applications, Terms of Licenses, Inalienability of Licenses, Construction Permits, Revocation, Modification of License, Continued Operation of Facilities, and Hearings and Judicial Review.]

"CHAPTER 17. JOINT COMMITTEE ON ATOMIC ENERGY

"SEC. 201. MEMBERSHIP.—There is hereby established a Joint Committee on Atomic Energy to be composed of nine Members of the Senate to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and nine Members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. In each instance not more than five Members shall be members of the same political party.

"SEC. 202. AUTHORITY AND DUTY.—The Joint Committee shall make continuing studies of the activities of the Atomic Energy Commission and of problems relating to the development, use, and control of atomic energy. During the first sixty days of each session of the Congress, the Joint Committee shall conduct hearings in either open or executive session for the purpose of receiving information concerning the development, growth, and state of the atomic energy industry. The Commission shall keep the Joint Committee fully and currently informed with respect to all of the Commission's activities. The Department of Defense shall keep the Joint Committee fully and currently informed with respect to all matters within the Department of gory such information concerning the atomic energy programs of other nations as the Commission and the Director of Central Intelligence jointly determine to be necessary to carry out the provisions of section 102 (d) of the National Security Act of 1947,¹ as amended, and can be adequately safeguarded as defense information.

[Section 143 deals with Department of Defense Participation.]

"SEC. 144. INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION.—

"a. The President may authorize the Commission to cooperate with another nation and to communicate to that nation Restricted Data on—

"(1) refining, purification, and subsequent treatment of source material;

"(2) reactor development;

"(3) production of special nuclear material;

"(4) health and safety;

"(5) industrial and other applications of atomic energy for peaceful purposes; and

"(6) research and development relating to the foregoing:

Provided, however, That no such cooperation shall involve the communication of Restricted Data relating to the design or fabrication of atomic weapons: And provided further, That the cooperation is undertaken pursuant to an agreement for cooperation entered into in accordance with section 123, or is undertaken pursuant to an agreement existing on the effective date of this Act.

"b. The President may authorize the Department of Defense, with the assistance of the Commission, to cooperate with another nation or with a regional defense organization to which the United States is a party, and to communicate to that nation or organization such Restricted Data as is necessary to—

"(1) the development of defense plans;

"(2) the training of personnel in the employment of and defense against atomic weapons; and

"(3) the evaluation of the capabilities of potential enemies in the employment of atomic weapons, while such other nation or organization is participating with the United States pursuant to an international arrangement by substantial and material contributions to the mutual defense and security:

Provided, however, That no such cooperation shall involve communication of Restricted Data relating to the design or fabrication of atomic weapons except with regard to external characteristics, including size, weight, and shape, yields and effects, and systems employed in the delivery or use thereof but not including any data in these categories unless in the joint judgment of the Commission and the Department of Defense such data will not reveal important information concerning the design or fabrication of the nuclear components of an atomic weapon: And provided further, That the cooperation is under-

Defense relating to the development, utilization, or application of atomic energy. Any Government agency shall furnish any information requested by the Joint Committee with respect to the activities or responsibilities of that agency in the field of atomic energy. All bills, resolutions, and other matters in the Senate or the House of Representatives relating primarily to the Commission or to the development, use, or control of atomic energy shall be referred to the Joint Committee. The members of the Joint Committee who are Members of the Senate shall from time to time report to the Senate, and the members of the Joint Committee who are Members of the House of Representatives shall from time to time report to the House, by bill or otherwise, their recommendations with respect to matters within the jurisdiction of their respective Houses which are referred to the Joint Committee or otherwise within the jurisdiction of the Joint Committee.

38. ATOMIC INFORMATION FOR MUTUAL DEFENSE: Agreement Between the Governments of the United States and the United Kingdom, June 15, 1955¹

The Government of the United States of America and the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland,

Recognizing that their mutual security and defense requires that they be prepared to meet the contingencies of atomic warfare,

Recognizing that their common interests will be advanced by the exchange of information pertinent thereto, ¹ TIAS 3322 (6 UST 2721); entered into force July 21, 1955. Similar agreement with Canada on the same date, TIAS 3305 (6 UST 2607).

Believing that the exchange of such information can be undertaken without threat to the security of either country, and

Taking into consideration the United States Atomic Energy Act of 1954,¹ which was prepared with these purposes in mind, Agree as follows:

ARTICLE I

1. While the United States and the United Kingdom are participating in international arrangements for their mutual defense and security and making substantial and material contribution thereto, each Government will from time to time make available to the other Government atomic information which the Government making such information available deems necessary to:

- (a) the development of defense plans;
- (b) the training of personnel in the employment of and defense against atomic weapons; and
- (c) the evaluation of the capabilities of potential enemies in the employment of atomic weapons.

2. Atomic information which is transferred by either Government pursuant to this Agreement shall be used by the other Government exclusively for the preparation and implementation of defense plans in the mutual interests of the two countries.

ARTICLE II

1. All transfers of atomic information to the United Kingdom by the United States pursuant to this Agreement will be made in compliance with the provisions of the United States Atomic Energy Act of 1954 and any subsequent applicable United States legislation. All transfers of atomic information to the United States by the United Kingdom pursuant to this Agreement will be made in compliance with the United Kingdom Official Secrets Acts, 1911-1939, and the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Act of 1946.

2. Under this Agreement there will be no transfers by the United States or the United Kingdom of atomic weapons or special nuclear material, as these terms are defined in Section 11 d. and Section 11 t. of the United States Atomic Energy Act of 1954.

ARTICLE III

1. Atomic information made available pursuant to this Agreement shall be accorded full security protection under applicable security arrangements between the United States and the United Kingdom and applicable national legislation and regulations of the two countries. In no case shall either Government maintain security standards for safeguarding atomic information made available pursuant to this Agreement lower than those set forth in the applicable security arrangements in effect on the date this Agreement comes into force.

2. Atomic information which is exchanged pursuant to this Agreement will be made available through channels existing or hereafter agreed for the exchange of classified defense information between the two Governments.

3. Atomic information received pursuant to this Agreement shall not be transferred by the recipient Government to any unauthorized person or, except as provided in Article V of this Agreement, beyond the jurisdiction of that Government. Each Government may stipulate the degree to which any of the categories of information made available to the other Government pursuant to this Agreement may be disseminated, may specify the categories of persons who may have access to such information, and may impose such other restrictions on the dissemination of such information as it deems necessary.

ARTICLE IV

As used in this Agreement, "atomic information" means:

- (a) so far as concerns the information provided by the United States, Restricted Data, as defined in Section 11 r. of the United States Atomic Energy Act of 1954, which is permitted to be communicated pursuant to the provisions of Section 144 b. of that Act, and information relating primarily to the military utilization of atomic weapons which has been removed from the Restricted Data category in accordance with the provisions of Section 142 d. of the United States Atomic Energy Act of 1954;
- (b) so far as concerns the information provided by the United Kingdom, information exchanged under this Agreement which is either classified atomic energy information or other United Kingdom defense information which it is decided to transfer to the United States in pursuance of Article I of this Agreement.

ARTICLE V

Nothing herein shall be interpreted or operate as a bar or restriction to consultation and cooperation by the United States or the United Kingdom with other nations or regional organizations in any fields of defense. Neither Government, however, shall communicate atomic information made available by the other Government pursuant to this Agreement to any nation or regional organization unless the same information has been made available to that nation or regional organization by the other Government in accordance with its own legislative requirements and except to the extent that such communication is expressly authorized by such other Government.

ARTICLE VI

This Agreement shall enter into force on the date on which each Government shall receive from the other Government written notification that it has complied with all statutory and constitutional requirements for the entry into force of such an Agreement, and shall remain in effect until terminated by mutual agreement of both Governments.

DONE at Washington this Fifteenth day of June 1955 in two original texts.

39. ATOMIC INFORMATION FOR MUTUAL DEFENSE: Agreement Between the United States and the Other Parties to the North Atlantic Treaty, June 22, 1955¹

PREAMBLE

The Parties to the North Atlantic Treaty, signed at Washington on 4th April, 1949,

Recognising that their mutual security and defence requires that they be prepared to meet the contingencies of atomic warfare, and

Recognising that their common interests will be advanced by making available to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization information pertinent thereto, and

Taking into consideration the United States Atomic Energy Act of 1954,² which was prepared with these purposes in mind,

Acting on their own behalf and on behalf of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization,

Agree as follows:

ARTICLE I

1. While the North Atlantic Treaty Organization continues to make substantial and material contributions to the common defence efforts, the United States will from time to time make available to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, including its civil and military agencies and commands, atomic information which the Government of the United States of America deems necessary to:

- (a) the development of defence plans;
- (b) the training of personnel in the employment of and defence against atomic weapons; and
- (c) the evaluation of the capabilities of potential enemies in the employment of atomic weapons.

2. As used in this Agreement so far as concerns information provided by the United States, "atomic information" means Restricted Data, as defined in Section 11 r of the United States Atomic Energy Act of 1954, which is permitted to be communicated pursuant to the provisions of Section 144 b of that Act, and information relating primarily the military utilisation of atomic weapons which has been removed from the Restricted Data category in accordance with the provisions of Section 142 d of the United States Atomic Energy Act of 1954.

¹ TIAS 3521 (7 UST 397); entered into force Mar. 29, 1956. The agreement was forwarded to the President under cover of a letter from the Secretary of Defense, Apr. 2, 1955 (Department of State Bulletin, Apr. 25, 1955, pp. 686-687); the President approved the agreement in his letter to the chairman of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, Apr. 13, 1955 (ibid., p. 686).

² Supra, doc. 37.

3. All transfers by the Government of the United States of America of atomic information will be made in compliance with the provisions of the United States Atomic Energy Act of 1954, and subsequent applicable United States legislation. Under this Agreement there will be no transfers of atomic weapons or special nuclear material, as these terms are defined in Section 11 d and Section 11 t of the United States Atomic Energy Act of 1954. (The Sections of the United States Atomic Energy Act of 1954 referred to in paragraphs 2 and 3 of this Article are attached).¹

1. Atomic information which is transferred to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization will be made available through the channels now existing for providing classified military information to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

2. Only those persons within the North Atlantic Treaty Organization whose duties require access to atomic information may be the original recipients of such information. Atomic information will be authorised for dissemination within the North Atlantic Treaty Organization only to persons whose North Atlantic Treaty Organization responsibilities require them to have access to such information. Information will not be transferred by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to unauthorised persons or beyond the jurisdiction of that Organization. The Government of the United States of America may stipulate the degree to which any of the categories of information made available by it may be disseminated, may specify the categories of persons who may have access to such information, and may impose such other restrictions on the dissemination of information as it deems necessary.

ARTICLE III

1. Atomic information will be accorded full security protection under applicable North Atlantic Treaty Organization regulations and procedures, and where applicable, national legislation and regulations. In no case will recipients maintain security standards for the safeguarding of atomic information lower than those set forth in the pertinent North Atlantic Treaty Organization security regulations in effect on the date this Agreement comes into force.

ARTICLE IV

1. Atomic information which is transferred by the Government of the United States of America pursuant to Article I of this Agreement shall be used exclusively for the preparation of and in implementation of North Atlantic Treaty Organization defence plans.

2. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization will from time to time render reports to the Government of the United States of America of the use which has been made of the information. These reports will contain pertinent information requested by the Government of the United States of America and will in particular contain a list of the persons possessing certain categories of information, in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 2 of Article II, and a list of the documents which have been transferred.

ARTICLE V

1. The Parties to the North Atlantic Treaty, other than the United States, will to the extent that they deem necessary, make available to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization information in the same categories as may be made available by the United States under Article I of this Agreement. Any such information will be supplied on the same or similar conditions as those which apply under this Agreement with respect to the United States.

ARTICLE VI

1. The Agreement shall enter into force upon notification to the United States by all Parties to the North Atlantic Treaty that they are bound by the terms of the Agreement.

2. If any other State becomes a Party to the North Atlantic Treaty no information made available to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization under this Agreement will be provided to any person who is a national of, or who is employed by, the new Party to the North Atlantic Treaty until the new Party has notified the Government of the United States of America that it is bound by the terms of this Agreement, and upon such notification, this Agreement will enter into force for the new Party.

3. The Government of the United States of America will inform all Parties to the North Atlantic Treaty of the entry into force of this Agreement under paragraph 1 of this Article and of each notification received under paragraph 2 of this Article.

4. This Agreement shall be valid as long as the North Atlantic Treaty is in force.

In witness whereof the undersigned Representatives have signed the present Agreement on behalf of their respective States, members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and on behalf of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Done at Paris this 22nd day of June 1955, in the English and French languages, both texts being equally authoritative, in a single original which shall be deposited in the Archives of the Government of the United States of America. The Government of the United States of America shall transmit certified copies thereof to all the signatory and acceding states.

10. CIVIL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY: Agreement Between the Governments of the United States and the Turkish Republic,
June 10, 1955¹

Whereas the peaceful uses of atomic energy hold great promise for all mankind; and

Whereas the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Turkish Republic desire to cooperate with each other in the development of such peaceful uses of atomic energy; and

Whereas there is well advanced the design and development of several types of research reactors (as defined in Article X of this Agreement); and

Whereas research reactors are useful in the production of research quantities of radioisotopes, in medical therapy and in numerous other research activities and at the same time are a means of affording valuable training and experience in nuclear science and engineering useful in the development of other peaceful uses of atomic energy including civilian nuclear power; and

Whereas the Government of the Turkish Republic desires to pursue a research and development program looking toward the realization of the peaceful and humanitarian uses of atomic energy and desires to obtain assistance from the Government of the United States of America and United States industry with respect to this program; and

Whereas the Government of the United States of America, represented by the United States Atomic Energy Commission (hereinafter referred to as the "Commission"), desires to assist the Government of the Turkish Republic in such a program;

The Parties therefore agree as follows:

ARTICLE I

Subject to the limitations of Article V, the parties hereto will exchange information in the following fields:

A. Design, construction and operation of research reactors and their use as research, development, and engineering tools and in medical therapy.

B. Health and safety problems related to the operation and use of research reactors.

C. The use of radioactive isotopes in physical and biological research, medical therapy, agriculture, and industry.

ARTICLE II

A. The Commission will lease to the Government of the Turkish Republic uranium enriched in the isotope U-235, subject to the terms and conditions provided herein, as may be required as initial and replacement fuel in the operation of research reactors which the Government of the Turkish Republic, in consultation with the Commission, decides to construct and as required in agreed experiments related thereto. Also, the Commission will lease to the Government of the Turkish Republic uranium enriched in the isotope U-235, subject to the terms and conditions provided herein, as may be required as initial and replacement fuel in the operation of such research reactors as the Government of the Turkish Republic may, in consultation with the Commission, decide to authorize private individuals or private organizations under its jurisdiction to construct and operate, provided the Government of the Turkish Republic shall at all times maintain sufficient control of the material and the operation of the reactor to enable the Government of the Turkish Republic to comply with the provisions of this Agreement and the applicable provisions of the lease arrangement.

B. The quantity of uranium enriched in the isotope U-235 transferred by the Commission into the custody of the Government of the Turkish Republic shall not at any time be in excess of six (6) kilograms of contained U-235 in uranium enriched up to a maximum of twenty percent (20%) U-235, unless the Commission shall specify that a greater quantity of such material may be transferred under this Agreement to the Government of the Turkish Republic or authorized persons under its jurisdiction.

C. When any fuel elements containing U-235 leased by the Commission require replacement, they shall be returned to the Commission and, except as may be agreed, the form and content of the radiated fuel elements shall not be altered after their removal from the reactor and prior to delivery to the Commission.

D. The lease of uranium enriched in the isotope U-235 under this article shall be on such terms and conditions as may be mutually agreed and under the conditions stated in Articles VI and VII.

ARTICLE III

Subject to the availability of supply and as may be mutually agreed, the Commission will sell or lease through such means as it deems appropriate, to the Government of the Turkish Republic or authorized persons under its jurisdiction such reactor materials, other than special nuclear materials, as are not obtainable on the commercial market and which are required in the construction and operation of research reactors in Turkey. The sale or lease of these materials shall be on such terms as may be agreed.

ARTICLE IV

It is contemplated that, as provided in this Article, private individuals and private organizations in either the United States or Turkey may deal directly with private individuals and private organizations in the other country. Accordingly, with respect to the subjects of agreed exchange of information as provided in Article I, the Government of the United States will permit persons under its jurisdiction to transfer and export materials, including equipment and devices, to, and perform services for, the Government of the Turkish Republic and such persons under its jurisdiction as are authorized by the Government of the Turkish Republic to receive and possess such materials and utilize such services, subject to:

- A. Limitations in Article V.
- B. Applicable laws, regulations and license requirements of the Government of the United States, and the Government of the Turkish Republic.

ARTICLE V

Restricted Data shall not be communicated under this Agreement and no materials or equipment and devices shall be transferred and no services shall be furnished under this Agreement to the Government of the Turkish Republic or authorized persons under its jurisdiction if the transfer of any such materials or equipment and devices or the furnishing of any such services involves the communication of Restricted Data.

ARTICLE VI

A. The Government of the Turkish Republic agrees to maintain such safeguards as are necessary to assure that the uranium enriched in the isotope U-235 leased from the Commission shall be used solely for the purposes agreed in accordance with this Agreement and to assure the safekeeping of this material.

B. The Government of the Turkish Republic agrees to maintain such safeguards as are necessary to assure that all other reactor materials, including equipment and devices, purchased in the United States of America under this Agreement by the Government of the Turkish Republic or authorized persons under its jurisdiction, shall be used solely for the design, construction, and operation of research reactors which the Government of the Turkish Republic decides to construct and operate and for research in connection therewith, except as may otherwise be agreed.

C. In regard to research reactors constructed pursuant to this Agreement the Government of the Turkish Republic agrees to maintain records relating to power levels of operation and burnup of reactor fuels and to make annual reports to the Commission on these subjects. If the Commission requests, the Government of the Turkish Republic will permit Commission representatives to observe from time to time the condition and use of any leased material and to observe the performance of the reactor in which the material is used.

ARTICLE VII

Guaranties Prescribed by the U.S. Atomic Energy Act of 1954¹

The Government of the Turkish Republic guaranties that:

A. Safeguards provided in Article VI shall be maintained.

B. No material, including equipment and devices, transferred to the Government of the Turkish Republic or authorized persons under its jurisdiction, pursuant to this Agreement, by lease, sale, or otherwise will be used for atomic weapons or for research on or development of atomic weapons or for any other military purposes, and that no such material, including equipment and devices, will be transferred to unauthorized persons or beyond the jurisdiction of the Government of the Turkish Republic except as the Commission may agree to such transfer to another nation and then only if in the opinion of the Commission such transfer falls within the scope of an agreement for cooperation between the United States and the other nation.

ARTICLE VIII

This Agreement shall enter into force on June 10, 1955 and remain in force until June 9, 1965, inclusively, and shall be subject to renewal as may be mutually agreed.

At the expiration of this Agreement or any extension thereof the Government of the Turkish Republic shall deliver to the United States all fuel elements containing reactor fuels leased by the Commission and any other fuel material leased by the Commission. Such fuel elements and such fuel materials shall be delivered to the Commission at a site in the United States designated by the Commission the expense of the Government of the Turkish Republic, and such very shall be made under appropriate safeguards against radiation ards while in transit.

ARTICLE IX

is the hope and expectation of the parties that this initial Agree-t for Cooperation will lead to consideration of further cooperation nding to the design, construction, and operation of power producreactors. Accordingly, the parties will consult with each other a time to time concerning the feasibility of an additional agreement cooperation with respect to the production of power from atomic gy in Turkey.

ARTICLE X

or purposes of this Agreement:

. "Commission" means the United States Atomic Energy Com-
 sion or its duly authorized representatives.

. "Equipment and devices" means any instrument or apparatus, includes research reactors, as defined herein, and their component s.

. "Research reactor" means a reactor which is designed for the duction of neutrons and other radiations for general research and elopment purposes, medical therapy, or training in nuclear science engineering. The term does not cover power reactors, power onstration reactors, or reactors designed primarily for the producof special nuclear materials.

. The terms "Restricted Data", "atomic weapon", and "special ear material" are used in this Agreement as defined in the United es Atomic Energy Act of 1954.

WITNESS WHEREOF, the parties hereto have caused this Agree-t to be executed pursuant to duly constituted authority.

FOREIGN ECONOMIC POLICIES—TRADE AND TARIFFS

[REPORT TO THE PRESIDENT BY HIS SPECIAL ASSISTANT ON FOREIGN ECONOMIC POLICIES (GRAY REPORT), NO-VEMBER 10, 1950] ¹

[REPORT TO THE PRESIDENT BY THE INTERNATIONAL DE-VELOPMENT ADVISORY BOARD (ROCKEFELLER REPORT),
MARCH 7, 1951] ²

1. TRADE AGREEMENTS EXTENSION ACT OF 1951: Public Law 50 (82d Congress, 1st Session), June 16, 1951 ³

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951".

¹ Report to the President on Foreign Economic Policies, Washington, D.C. Government Printing Office, 1950. On Mar. 31, 1950, the President requested Mr. Gordon Gray as his special assistant to study the whole complex of United States foreign economic relations and to develop appropriate recommendations designed to "assure ourselves that our policies are those which will serve best to reinforce our economic strength and that of the other free nations of the world." For "Summary and Recommendations," see ibid., pp. 1-18; for "Analysis of the Gray Report," see Report of the Special Subcommittee on Foreign Economic Cooperation of the Senate Appropriations Committee, 82d Cong., 1st sess. (Subcommittee Print).

² Partners in Progress: A Report to the President by the International Development Advisory Board, Washington, D.C., Government Printing Office, 1951. On Nov. 24, 1950, the President requested the Advisory Board on International Development (Mr. Nelson Rockefeller, chairman) to "address itself specifically to the consideration of desirable plans to accomplish with maximum dispatch and effectiveness the broad objectives and policies of the Point Four program. . . . You will wish to formulate your recommendations in light of the Gray Report's comprehensive analysis of our entire foreign economic policy" (ibid., pp. 89-90). The Advisory Board had been created under the "Act for International Development," June 5, 1950 (PL 535, 81st Cong., 2d sess.)—an act to implement Point Four of the President's Inaugural Address, Jan. 20, 1949 (see A Decade of American Foreign Policy, pp. 1366-1367). The "recommendations" of the Board appear in italics under the appropriate topical headings of the Report.

c. 2. The period during which the President is authorized to enter into foreign-trade agreements under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930,¹ as amended and extended is hereby extended for a further period of two years from June 12, 1951.

c. 3. (a) Before entering into negotiations concerning any proposed foreign trade agreement under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, the President shall furnish the United States Tariff Commission (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Commission") with a list of all articles imported into the United States to be considered for possible modification of duties and other import restrictions, imposition of additional import restrictions, or continuance of existing customs or excise treatment. Upon receipt of such list the Commission shall make an investigation and report to the President the findings of the Commission with respect to each such article as to (1) the limit to which such modification, imposition, or continuance may be extended in order to carry out the purpose of such section 350 without causing or threatening serious injury to the domestic industry producing like or directly competitive articles; (2) if increases in duties or additional import restrictions are required to avoid serious injury to the domestic industry producing like or directly competitive articles the minimum increases in duties and additional import restrictions required. Such report shall be made to the Commission to the President not later than 120 days after receipt of such list by the Commission. No such foreign trade agreement shall be entered into until the Commission has made its report to the President or until the expiration of the 120-day period.

(b) In the course of any investigation pursuant to this section the Commission shall hold hearings and give reasonable public notice thereof, and shall afford reasonable opportunity for parties interested to be present, to produce evidence, and to be heard at such hearings.

Section 4 of the Act entitled "An Act to amend the Tariff Act of 1930", approved June 12, 1934,² as amended (19 U. S. C., sec. 1354), is hereby amended by striking out the matter following the semicolon and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "and before concluding such agreement the President shall request the Tariff Commission to make the investigation and report provided for by section 3 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951, and shall seek information and advice with respect to such agreement from the Departments of State, Agriculture, Commerce, and Defense, and from such other agencies as he may deem appropriate."

c. 4. (a) Within thirty days after any trade agreement under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, has been entered into which, when effective, will (1) require or make appropriate any modification of duties or other import restrictions, the imposition of additional import restrictions, or the continuance of existing customs or excise treatment, which modification, imposition, or continuance exceeds the limit to which such modification, imposition, or continuance may be extended without causing or threatening serious injury to the domestic industry producing like or directly competitive articles as found and reported by the Tariff Commission under section 3, or (2) fail to require or make appropriate the minimum increase in duty or additional import restrictions required to avoid such injury, the President shall transmit to Congress a copy of such agreement together with a message accurately identifying the article with respect to which such limits or minimum requirements are not complied with, and stating his reasons for the action taken with respect to such article. If either the Senate or the House of Representatives, or both, are not in session at the time of such transmission, such agreement and message shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives, or both, as the case may be.

(b) Promptly after the President has transmitted such foreign trade agreement to Congress the Commission shall deposit with the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and the Committee on Finance of the Senate, a copy of the portions of its report to the President dealing with the articles with respect to which such limits or minimum requirements are not complied with.

SEC. 5. As soon as practicable, the President shall take such action as is necessary to suspend, withdraw or prevent the application of any reduction in any rate of duty, or binding of any existing customs or excise treatment, or other concession contained in any trade agreement entered into under authority of section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended and extended, to imports from the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and to imports from any nation or area dominated or controlled by the foreign government or foreign organization controlling the world Communist movement.

SEC. 6. (a) No reduction in any rate of duty, or binding of any existing customs or excise treatment, or other concession hereafter proclaimed under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, shall be permitted to continue in effect when the product on which the concession has been granted is, as a result, in whole or in part, of the duty or other customs treatment reflecting such concession, being imported into the United States in such increased quantities, either actual or relative, as to cause or threaten serious injury to the domestic industry producing like or directly competitive products.

(b) The President, as soon as practicable, shall take such action as may be necessary to bring trade agreements heretofore entered into under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, into conformity with the policy established in subsection (a) of this section.

On or before January 10, 1952, and every six months thereafter, the President shall report to the Congress on the action taken by him under this subsection.¹

SEC. 7. (a) Upon the request of the President, upon resolution of either House of Congress, upon resolution of either the Committee on Finance of the Senate or the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, upon its own motion, or upon application of any interested party, the United States Tariff Commission shall promptly make an investigation and make a report thereon not later than one year after the application is made to determine whether any product upon which a concession has been granted under a trade agreement is, as a result, in whole or in part, of the duty or other customs treatment reflecting such concession, being imported into the United States in such increased quantities, either actual or relative, as to cause or threaten serious injury to the domestic industry producing like or directly competitive products.

In the course of any such investigation, whenever it finds evidence of serious injury or threat of serious injury or whenever so directed by resolution of either the Committee on Finance of the Senate or the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, the Tariff Commission shall hold hearings giving reasonable public notice thereof and shall afford reasonable opportunity for interested parties to be present, to produce evidence, and to be heard at such hearings.

Should the Tariff Commission find, as the result of its investigation and hearings, that a product on which a concession has been granted is, as a result, in whole or in part, of the duty or other customs treatment reflecting such concession, being imported in such increased quantities, either actual or relative, as to cause or threaten serious injury to the domestic industry producing like or directly competitive products, it shall recommend to the President the withdrawal or modification of the concession, its suspension in whole or in part, or the establishment of import quotas, to the extent and for the time necessary to prevent or remedy such injury. Within sixty days, or sooner if the President has taken action under subsection (c) of this section, the Tariff Commission shall transmit to the Committee on Finance of the Senate and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives an exact copy of its report and recommendations to the President.

(b) In arriving at a determination in the foregoing procedure the Tariff Commission, without excluding other factors, shall take into consideration a downward trend of production, employment, prices, profits, or wages in the domestic industry concerned, or a decline in sales, an increase in imports, either actual or relative to domestic production, a higher or growing inventory, or a decline in the proportion of the domestic market supplied by domestic producers.

(c) Upon receipt of the Tariff Commission's report of its investigation and hearings, the President may make such adjustments in the rates of duty, impose such quotas, or make such other modifications as are found and reported by the Commission to be necessary to prevent or remedy serious injury to the respective domestic industry. If the President does not take such action within sixty days he shall immediately submit a report to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House and to the Committee on Finance of the Senate stating why he has not made such adjustments or modifications, or imposed such quotas.

(d) When in the judgment of the Tariff Commission no sufficient reason exists for a recommendation to the President that a concession should be withdrawn or modified or a quota established, it shall make and publish a report stating its findings and conclusions.

SEC. 8. (a) In any case where the Secretary of Agriculture determines and reports to the President and to the Tariff Commission with regard to any agricultural commodity that due to the perishability of the commodity a condition exists requiring emergency treatment, the Tariff Commission shall make an immediate investigation under the provisions of section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended,¹ or under the provisions of section 7 of this Act to determine the facts and make recommendations to the President for such relief under those provisions as may be appropriate. The President may take immediate action however, without awaiting the recommendations of the Tariff Commission if in his judgment the emergency requires such action. In any case the report and findings of the Tariff Commission and the decision of the President shall be made at the earliest possible date and in any event not more than 25 calendar days after the submission of the case to the Tariff Commission.

(b) Subsection (f) of section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(f) No trade agreement or other international agreement heretofore or hereafter entered into by the United States shall be applied in a manner inconsistent with the requirements of this section."

SEC. 9. (a) The second sentence of section 2 (a) of the Act entitled "An Act to amend the Tariff Act of 1930", approved June 12, 1934, as amended, is amended by striking out the word "sections" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "section" and by striking out "and 516 (b)".

(b) Subsection (c) of section 17 of the Customs Administrative Act of 1938, as amended,² is hereby repealed.

SEC. 10. The enactment of this Act shall not be construed to determine or indicate the approval or disapproval by the Congress of the Executive Agreement known as the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.³

SEC. 11. The President shall, as soon as practicable, take such measures as may be necessary to prevent the importation of ermine, fox, kolinsky, marten, mink, muskrat, and weasel furs and skins, dressed or undressed, which are the product of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics or of Communist China.

2. TRADE AGREEMENTS EXTENSION ACT OF 1953: Public Law 215 (83d Congress, 1st Session), August 7, 1953³

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1953".

TITLE I--FOREIGN-TRADE AGREEMENTS

SEC. 101. EXTENSION OF AUTHORITY.

The period during which the President is authorized to enter into foreign-trade agreements under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended and extended⁴ (19 U. S. C., sec. 1351), is hereby extended for a further period of one year from June 12, 1953.

SEC. 102. TIME FOR CERTAIN REPORTS BY TARIFF COMMISSION.

The first paragraph of subsection (a) of section 7 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951⁵ (19 U. S. C., sec. 1364) is hereby amended by striking out "one year" and inserting in lieu thereof "nine months". In the case of any application made under such first paragraph before the date of the enactment of this Act, the United States Tariff Commission shall make its report not later than whichever of the following is the earlier: (1) one year after the application was made, or (2) nine months after the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 103. GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE NOT AFFECTED.

The enactment of this Act shall not be construed to determine or indicate the approval or disapproval by the Congress of the Executive Agreement known as the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.¹

SEC. 104. EMERGENCY ACTION UNDER SECTION 22 OF THE AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT.

Section 8 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951 (Public Law 50, Eighty-second Congress, first session) is hereby amended by adding a new subsection (c) at the end thereof, reading as follows:

"(c) Subsection (b) of section 22 of the Agriculture Adjustment Act, as amended,² is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"In any case where the Secretary of Agriculture determines and reports to the President with regard to any article or articles that a condition exists requiring emergency treatment, the President may take immediate action under this section without awaiting the recommendations of the Tariff Commission, such action to continue in effect pending the report and recommendations of the Tariff Commission and action thereon by the President.' "

TITLE II—UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION

SEC. 201. EFFECT OF DIVIDED VOTE IN CERTAIN CASES.

Section 330 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, is hereby amended by adding a new subsection (d) reading as follows:

"(d) EFFECT OF DIVIDED VOTE IN CERTAIN CASES.—

"(1) Whenever, in any case calling for findings of the Commission in connection with any authority conferred upon the President by law to make changes in import restrictions, a majority of the commissioners voting are unable to agree upon findings or recommendations, the findings (and recommendations, if any) unanimously agreed upon by one-half of the number of commissioners voting may be considered by the President as the findings and recommendations of the Commission: Provided, That if the commissioners voting are divided into two equal groups each of which is unanimously agreed upon findings (and recommendations, if any) the findings (and recommendations, if any) of either group may be considered by the President as the findings (and recommendations, if any) of the Commission. In any case of a divided vote referred to in this paragraph the Commission shall transmit to the President the findings (and recommendations, if any) of each group within the Commission with respect to the matter in question.

"(2) Whenever, in any case in which the Commission is authorized to make an investigation upon its own motion, upon complaint, or upon application of any interested party, one-half of the number of commissioners voting agree that the investigation should be made, such investigation shall thereupon be carried out in accordance with the statutory authority covering the matter.

in question. Whenever the Commission is authorized to hold hearings in the course of any investigation and one-half of the number of commissioners voting agree that hearings should be held, such hearings shall thereupon be held in accordance with the statutory authority covering the matter in question."

TITLE III—ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION ON FOREIGN ECONOMIC POLICY¹

SEC. 301. ESTABLISHMENT OF THE COMMISSION.

There is hereby established a bipartisan commission to be known as the Commission on Foreign Economic Policy (in this title referred to as the "Commission").

SEC. 302. MEMBERSHIP OF THE COMMISSION.

(a) NUMBER AND APPOINTMENT.—The Commission shall be composed of seventeen members as follows:

- (1) Seven appointed by the President of the United States;
- (2) Five appointed from the Senate by the Vice President of the United States; and
- (3) Five appointed from the House of Representatives by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

(b) POLITICAL AFFILIATION.—Of the first class of members specified in subsection (a), no more than four members shall be from the same political party. Of the second and third classes of members specified in subsection (a), no more than three members from each class shall be from the same political party.

SEC. 303. ORGANIZATION OF THE COMMISSION.

The President shall designate the member of the Commission who shall be the Chairman, and the member who shall be the Vice Chairman.

SEC. 304. QUORUM.

Nine members of the Commission (including at least five who are Members of Congress) shall constitute a quorum.

SEC. 305. COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION.

(a) MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.—Members of Congress who are members of the Commission shall serve without compensation in addition to that received for their services as Members of Congress; but they shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of the duties vested in the Commission.

(b) MEMBERS FROM THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH.—The members of the Commission who are in the executive branch of the Government shall each receive the compensation which he would receive if he were not a member of the Commission, but they shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of the duties vested in the Commission.

(c) MEMBERS FROM PRIVATE LIFE.—The members from private life

shall receive not to exceed $75 per diem when engaged in the performance of duties vested in the Commission, plus reimbursement for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of such duties.

SEC. 306. STAFF OF THE COMMISSION.

(a) APPOINTMENT OF PERSONNEL.—The Commission may appoint such personnel as it deems advisable, without regard to the civil-service laws, and shall fix the compensation of such personnel in accordance with the Classification Act of 1949,¹ as amended. The Commission may procure temporary and intermittent services in accordance with section 15 of the Act of August 2, 1946² (5 U. S. C., sec. 55a), but at rates not to exceed $75 per diem for individuals. The Commission may reimburse employees, experts, and consultants for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of their official duties and make reasonable advances to such persons for such purposes.

(b) CERTAIN LAWS NOT TO APPLY.—Except for members of the Commission appointed by the Vice President or the Speaker of the House, and except for any member of the Commission who may be appointed by the President from the executive branch of the Government, service of an individual as a member of the Commission, employment of an individual pursuant to the first sentence of subsection (a), and service by a person pursuant to the second sentence of subsection (a), shall not be considered as service or employment bringing such person within the provisions of section 281, 283, or 284, or 1914 of title 18 of the United States Code, or section 412 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949,³ as amended (22 U. S. C., sec. 1584), or section 190 of the Revised Statutes (5 U. S. C., sec. 99).

SEC. 307. EXPENSES OF THE COMMISSION.

There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, so much as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this title.

SEC. 308. REPORT—EXPIRATION OF THE COMMISSION.

(a) REPORT.—Within sixty days after the second regular session of the Eighty-third Congress is convened, the Commission shall make a report of its findings and recommendations to the President and to the Congress.

(b) EXPIRATION OF THE COMMISSION.—Ninety days after the submission to the Congress of the report provided for in subsection (a) of this section, the Commission shall cease to exist.

SEC. 309. DUTIES OF THE COMMISSION.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Commission is directed to examine, study, and report on the subjects of international trade and its enlargement consistent with a sound domestic economy, our foreign economic policy, and the trade aspects of our national security and total for-gn policy; and to recommend appropriate policies, measures, and practices.

(b) CERTAIN OF THE MATTERS TO BE CONSIDERED AND REPORTED ON.—Without limiting the general scope of the direction to the Commission contained in subsection (a), the Commission shall consider, and shall report on, the following matters:

(1) (A) Applicable provisions of the Constitution of the United States;

(B) Laws, regulations, and practices of the United States relating to international trade, including such matters as tariffs, customs, customs administration, trade agreements, peril point and escape procedures, opinions and decisions thereon of the United States Tariff Commission and the President, import and export quotas, monetary licenses, countervailing duties, and procurement preferences;

(C) Departments, agencies, boards, commissions, bureaus, and other instrumentalities of the United States having jurisdiction over, or dealing with, these matters;

(D) Laws, regulations, and practices and official instrumentalities of other nations concerned with similar subject matters;

(E) Pertinent statistics on international trade; and

(F) Balance of payments, nation by nation; and the causes and effects of, and proposed remedies for, excessive imbalances.

(2) Relationship of our foreign economic policies to, and their influences on, our total foreign policy; and the proper relationship of each to the other.

(3) Effect of our foreign aid and military defense programs on international trade and international balance of payments.

(4) Foreign markets of trading nations—extent and nature; and the effect thereon of wars, other emergencies, technological advances, international relations, and other pertinent factors.

(5) International instrumentalities, organizations, and agreements and practices affecting trade, such as the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, Customs Unions, Organization for European Economic Cooperation, International Wheat Agreement, cartels, European Payments Union, European Coal and Steel Community, and International Monetary Fund.

(6) Foreign investment capital and the flow of investment capital between nations—need thereof—restrictions thereon—inducements necessary to encourage—role of the Export-Import Bank and of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

(7) Effects on international trade of factors such as costs of production and pricing, labor practices and standards, general living standards, currency manipulation, inconvertible currencies, official inflationary policies, currency devaluations, exchange controls and licenses, quotas, embargoes, dumping and pricing practices, multiple currencies, bilateral trade agreements, barter arrangements, customs procedures, marking and transit problems, concealed regulation of exports and imports, preferential tariff systems,

3. REPORT BY THE COMMISSION ON FOREIGN ECONOMIC POLICY (RANDALL REPORT), JANUARY 23, 1954 (Excerpts)²

INTRODUCTION

As directed by the Act of Congress under which our work has been undertaken,³ and guided by a sense of heavy responsibility, the members of the Commission on Foreign Economic Policy have endeavored faithfully to re-examine the international relationships of the United States in the economic field, as they bear upon the soundness of our domestic economy and the security of our citizens.

Dominating our thinking throughout, has been the sobering realization that the policies pursued and the actions taken by the United States in respect to foreign economic policy profoundly influence the destinies of all of the peoples of the world. Our Nation bears an awesome responsibility of world leadership. Though not of our seeking, it is one that we may be fated to bear for a long time to come. If we bear it with understanding, courage, and honor, we can make incalculable contributions to the cause of peace and the advancement of human welfare.

The Commission was made up of the following members: Clarence B. Randall (Chairman), Lamar Fleming, Jr. (Vice Chairman), Senators Eugene D. Millikin, Bourke B. Hickenlooper, Prescott Bush, Walter F. George, and Harry F. Byrd, Representatives Daniel A. Reed, Richard M. Simpson, John M. Vorys, Jere Cooper, and Laurie C. Battle, and David J. McDonald, Cola G. Parker, Jesse W. Tapp, John Hay Whitney, and John H. Williams (the five last-named being appointed by the President).

In our discharge of this responsibility, we shall find at times that our views will differ from those held by other free peoples. On such occasions we must display forbearance, but never falter in the high quality of our leadership.

Nor can we forget that the security and well-being of our own citizens are constantly at stake as we take significant steps in foreign economic policy, though the effects of such decisions may at times seem remote to the individual, or difficult of evaluation.

The responsibility which rests upon the President and the Congress to make wise decisions, and to take them promptly, is grave indeed.

How then shall our Government determine what is wise in the field of foreign economic policy?

Ours is clearly one of the most dynamic, the most resilient, the most creative economies in the world. Never has it seemed more powerful than it is today. What, therefore, could be wiser than to determine what are the sources of that strength, and then to build upon these as we play our part in the international economy?

The strength of our domestic economy requires adherence to three fundamental principles:

1. The freest possible opportunity for the development of individual talents and initiative in the utilization of private resources and through the free association of workers.

2. The maintenance of vigorous, but fair, competition.

3. The maintenance of a broad free market for goods and services.

Our primary reliance should therefore be upon the incentives of the free enterprise system, the stimulating effects of competition, and the stabilizing influence of free markets.

In moving toward a fresh release of these expansive forces, here and abroad, we must not expect to repeal history. The present fabric of our laws, the obligations which we have assumed under the necessities of national defense, the customs and traditions of our people, the basic protective standards of our laws that safeguard wages, commerce, industry, and agriculture, must all be respected. Where changes are required they must be embarked upon gradually, with every precaution possible taken to avoid dislocations in our present systems of production, and distress to individual citizens.

Changes when made must take us toward recognizable goals. We must know what we are seeking to achieve and advance steadily and intelligently toward those known objectives. We must avoid the instability of the improvised.

Boldness will be required. We have outgrown some former practices.

The larger interests of all our people must at all times be our standard of conduct.

Responsible behavior on our part, moreover, requires that we recognize our own limitations and restrict our commitments to our capabilities. Our first obligation to the world, as well as to ourselves, is to keep the United States strong. Only from that firm base shall we be able intelligently and worthily to measure up to our great responsibility in world leadership.

That from our own resources we have already poured out vast sums to help reconstruct a war-torn world, and to further our own security, is common knowledge. But the extent to which there still exists a serious distortion in our economic relationships with the rest of the world is not so clearly understood.

Basic, therefore, to any survey of our foreign economic problems is an analysis of the so-called dollar gap.

THE POSTWAR DOLLAR PROBLEM

During the period 1946 through 1953, the United States transferred to the rest of the world through gifts and loans $33 billion of goods and services, exclusive of military items. This total was equal to more than one-fourth of all American exports. The fact that after so large a program of assistance, carried out over so long a period, the rest of the world still finds it necessary to maintain drastic restrictions on trade and payment, directed particularly against this country, indicates strikingly the gravity of the world's dollar problem.

The average world dollar deficit of $4 billion a year covers up large and significant fluctuations as well as a declining trend. In 1947, before the Marshall plan began, the deficit reached a peak of $11 billion, which was reduced by almost one-half in the first 2 years of the Marshall plan. The first impact of the Korean war was greatly to reduce the deficit, to somewhat more than $1 billion in 1950, owing largely to our heavy buying of raw materials and other goods and services from abroad. But in 1951 the pendulum swung the other way, as the European countries felt the impact of the previous great rise of raw material prices as compared with the pre-Korean level, while the raw materials exporting countries, once the buying rush had subsided, felt the effects of the shrinkage in the volume and value of their exports. In the past two years there has again been a marked improvement. For the first time since the war our foreign trade, exclusive of military exports, has come into balance; and foreign gold and dollar reserves have increased at a rate that is currently running at well over $2 billion per year.

Of major importance for this report is the interpretation of this current improvement. There is a disposition in some quarters to conclude that the world's dollar problem has at length been solved. This conclusion gains plausibility from the fact that, with some important exceptions, the Western European countries have been making substantial economic progress. Their industrial production is now much above prewar; foreign trade, both within Western Europe and with the outside world, is also much above prewar; the internal financial situation in most of the countries has much improved and inflation has been checked; direct internal controls have been removed or relaxed and, again with some exceptions, general monetary and fiscal controls have been more effectively applied. Finally, through the Organization for European Economic Cooperation, significant headway has been made toward liberalizing trade and widening the area of multilateral trade and payment, both within Western Europe and with its overseas trading areas.

This is an impressive record, and this Commission feels confidence in its conclusion that genuine progress has been made toward establishing the conditions in which multilateral trade and payment may be made worldwide, and the dollar deficit removed, not primarily through trade and payment restrictions but in a relatively free market. But it is the Commission's view that much yet remains to be accomplished before a dependable and durable solution of the dollar problem can be achieved.

In interpreting the current improvement, account must be taken of a number of facts. It has been accompanied by a favorable change for Western Europe in the "terms of trade"—a decline of import prices relative to export prices—due largely to the decline of raw materials prices from the high level created by the outbreak of the Korean war. Europe's terms of trade have worsened since before World War II owing, basically, to the large growth of world industrial output since prewar and to the relatively small growth of production of raw materials and food, due in part to the urge of the primary producing countries to industrialize and diversify their economies. Looking to the future, there will be a major problem of developing the raw materials needed by the continuing industrial expansion; and though in the end this may prove one of the main ways of achieving a solution of the problem of world trade imbalance, it suggests also that for a long time to come the terms of trade may continue to be one of the chief problems. Here, clearly, is an area of international policy which should command our most serious attention.

Other uncertainties arise from the fact that, owing to the direct restriction abroad of dollar imports, the potential demand for dollar goods and services, in a free market and with convertible currencies, could substantially exceed the present restricted demand. There is the further fact that the recent high level of American imports, relative to earlier years, has been closely linked with the high level of our gross national product. Experience has shown that our imports are very sensitive to our level of national income, and that any contraction here has a multiplied effect in reducing foreign exports to this country.

There is, furthermore, an element of illusion in the present apparent balanced position of our trade (apart from military exports), in that large "extraordinary" dollar expenditures are still being made by the United States in other countries. As of the end of 1953 these were running at an annual rate of about $3 billion. These extraordinary expenditures consist of disbursements by our military and civilian establishments abroad, offshore procurement, and stockpiling. If economic aid is also included, the total of extraordinary expenditures, as of the end of 1953, was running at about the rate of $5 billion per year. Against this total should be credited the current increase of foreign gold and dollar reserves which is running at a rate of over $2 billion per year. There is thus a concealed dollar gap of some $2 billion to $3 billion annually, which would be increased if there were a change in the economic situation, such as a recession here or a deterioration in Western Europe's terms of trade. On the other hand, it should be recognized that major parts of our "extraordinary" expenditures abroad are connected with our defense effort, and that the Western European countries' own defense programs affect adversely their trade position, by increasing their essential imports and by absorbing resources that would otherwise be available for expanding their exports.

Surveying the postwar experience as a whole, the Commission believes, as already stated, that much remains to be done to achieve a dependable international balance. It believes that the problem must be attacked on many fronts and that too much dependence should not be placed on any one line of attack. There is no single or simple solution. The final solution will probably depend even more upon the efforts of other countries than upon our own. It will involve their continuing internal efforts to achieve sound and strong economies and their external efforts to correct their international imbalance.

This report, however, is primarily concerned with the steps that this country can take toward solving the world's dollar problem, steps that will be consistent with our own political, economic, and security interests. Or, to employ the language of the statute under which this Commission was organized, this report must deal with the enlargement of international trade in a manner consistent with a sound domestic economy.

FOREIGN AID AND TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

The dollar problem has its source in basic maladjustments within the international economy that were caused by World War II and the following political disturbances. Our large foreign aid programs, which were directed toward the rapid restoration of economic and political stability within the free world, and the rebuilding of the military strength of our allies, dealt with these maladjustments on an emergency basis only.

That period has passed. The fundamental causes of the world's economic problems must now be analyzed, and solutions sought in the fields of investment, trade, and foreign exchange policies.

Before these other fields can be surveyed intelligently, however, our foreign aid must be reviewed, and its future role determined.

ECONOMIC AND MILITARY AID

From the end of the war through June 1953, United States expenditures in the form of grants and loans to other countries amounted to $41.7 billion after taking into account loan repayments and other returns. Of this, $33 billion was economic aid and $8.7 billion military aid. In addition, on June 30, 1953, $7.9 billion of mutual security funds had been obligated but not spent, and $0.9 billion of Export-Import Bank funds were committed to various countries but not disbursed. Since fiscal 1949 economic aid has been declining, and since fiscal 1951 military aid has been increasing. A further $7.3 billion has been made available for all purposes for fiscal 1954, of which $5.3 billion or 73 percent is military aid, and $2 billion or 27 percent is economic aid. (See table.)¹

Had such aid not been given, friendly countries would have been forced to restrict their purchases of American goods and services to such a degree that economic and political chaos might well have ensued abroad. With the additional resources which American aid placed at their disposal, they were able to maintain politically tolerable levels of consumption; to carry out programs of reconstruction and development needed to restore their overall levels of production, and gradually to reduce their dependence on our assistance; and after June 1950, to speed up their rearmament programs in the interests of the common defense of the free world. In many countries the most important economic objectives for which American economic aid has been extended in the past have been achieved, or nearly so.

The Commission is reluctant to make suggestions that would affect programs now in operation, or commitments already made. We note, however, that the $7.3 billion available now for present programs and commitments will be spent over a period of years. In planning future programs based on future appropriations the following comments and recommendations are offered.

. . . : : :

The Commission recommends that economic aid on a grant basis should be terminated as soon as possible. No further aid is justified unless it contributes to the security of the United States. Our security involves defense against communist aggression or infiltration here and all over the free world. The greatest expenditures are now for military defense, but our security must take into account many political and economic considerations. The security of the United States is bound up with that of the free world.

. . . : : :

The United States is now giving economic aid to several countries which do not have the economic capacity to maintain the military effort that is deemed essential by the NATO Council and by our Government to deter aggression. Among these countries are Greece, Turkey, Spain, and Yugoslavia in Europe, and Indochina and Formosa in the Far East. It is also extending very large scale economic aid to France to enable France to increase its military effort to bring the war in Indochina to a successful conclusion, and small amounts to the United Kingdom, Italy, and Germany (Berlin) for special purposes. This aid has been given the new name of "defense support" or "mutual defense financing." The distinction between military and economic aid is blurred by the use of such terms in a way which the Commission believes is undesirable. Though "defense support" is defended first and foremost as a means of preventing an undesirable reduction in the defense effort, it also serves all the economic ends which have been advanced in justification of economic aid in the past. It is a form of economic aid and should be so denominated.

General support is also being given to the economies of our European allies, including the United Kingdom, through offshore procurement—that is, the purchase of military items in a foreign country for transfer to the same country or to other foreign countries as military aid. The Commission recognizes that, from an economic point of view, offshore procurement has certain advantages as compared to grant aid such as was given under the European Recovery Program. If so administered as to encourage an increase of productive capacity on a competitive basis, it may be a step toward a solution of Europe's remaining dollar problem. The primary purpose of offshore procurement, however, is military. For the military purpose of offshore procurement to be served effectively, the Commission recommends that contracts for the production of military equipment be placed abroad on the basis of the considerations of cost, availability, and quality of the items purchased that govern effective procurement policy at home, or on broad strategic judgments concerning the character and location of the military production base on which the success of the joint defense effort depends. The offshore procurement program should not be used as a form of general economic aid.

Our foreign aid programs up to the present have been carried on by a combination of grants, loans, and guaranties, with overwhelming emphasis on grants which have been decreasing for economic purposes and increasing for military purposes. At present, as the need for economic aid for postwar recovery disappears, demands are increasing for general economic aid unconnected with recovery from war or preparation for defense. Underdeveloped areas are claiming a right to economic aid from the United States, in proposals in the United Nations and the Interparliamentary Union. We recognize no such right.

In Europe, with the exceptions previously mentioned, there now appears to be no need for further economic aid in the form of grants. This is a source of satisfaction to our European allies who are as anxious as we are to terminate the giver and receiver relationship.

In other sections of this report the Commission recommends steps that should be taken to assist underdeveloped countries in obtaining an adequate flow of capital from the United States without resort to grants-in-aid. In cases where our security is importantly involved, the Commission believes that moderate grants-in-aid may serve the national interest of the United States.

The Commission recommends further that where support is needed to maintain military forces or to conduct military operations connected with our own security beyond the economic capacity of a country to sustain, grants should be made, not loans.

In other cases where substantial economic aid is necessary in the interest of the United States but cannot be obtained from private or international sources, loans should be made, not grants.

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

The Commission does not include within economic aid what is often called "technical assistance."

The United States is now engaged in bilateral programs of technical cooperation in 38 countries for which about $120 million has been made available this year. These programs are undertaken only at the request of the host government. They are operated on a share-the-cost basis and they are intended eventually to be taken over completely by the host governments. The United States also participates in the United Nations Expanded Program of Technical Assistance, operating on a budget of about $21 million to which it contributes about 60 percent, and in the smaller program of the Organization of American States.

All these are essentially programs of education and training in the knowledge and techniques required for economic development, including the administrative skills needed to create and manage institutions which are indispensable for such development.

The Commission recommends that within the limits imposed by congressional appropriations, the need for selecting only sound projects, the availability of trained technicians, and good administration, the technical cooperation program be pressed forward vigorously. It need not and should not become a "big money" program and should not involve capital investments.

The Commission also recommends that the United States continue its support of the United Nations Expanded Technical Assistance Program and the small program of the Organization of American States, through which the technical skills of many countries can be better mobilized and some dependent area and regional problems can be more effectively approached than through bilateral programs.

The Commission attaches special importance to the strengthening of the technical assistance work of the United Nations. It believes, however, that no country should contribute as much as 60 percent of the financing of this worldwide cooperative effort. It believes that some expansion of this program would be desirable, but that the United States percentage share in the cost should be reduced.

The Commission wishes to stress the great potential importance of the technical assistance programs in contributing to improved standards of living in countries with half the world population, in counteracting communist influence, and in helping to solve the problems of trade and investment dealt with elsewhere in this report.

All American military, economic, and technical aid to other countries is rooted in the national interest of the United States. Such aid is acceptable to other countries only if it also serves their national interests. The fundamental basis on which all foreign aid operations should rest, therefore, is mutual interest. Mutual interest cannot be created by pressure and can be destroyed by coercion. Foreign aid, therefore, should not become an instrument of coercion, and the fixing of conditions on which it is extended should be limited by this principle.

UNITED STATES FOREIGN INVESTMENT

In considering the enlargement of international trade in a manner consistent with a sound domestic economy, and our foreign economic policy, no subject could be more urgent than an examination of the problems having to do with the flow of investment capital to those areas in the free world where it is most needed.

Fortunately, the economic welfare of the United States would itself be directly promoted by an increased movement abroad of sound investment by United States nationals and corporations. Such a flow, if well conceived and directed, would not only contribute to an increase in international trade, but would assist in the maintenance of high levels of economic activity and employment within our own country. It can increase our national income by taking advantage of opportunities for more profitable investment. It can aid in the development abroad of primary resources to meet the ever-increasing civilian and defense needs of the United States and the free world. And, since private United States investment usually carries with it management and technical skills, it can contribute strongly to the economic development of foreign countries.

Such an increased flow of private investment abroad can also assist in attaining United States foreign policy objectives through strengthening the economy of the free world, and can reduce the burden of military aid by increasing productivity abroad.

During the period 1948-52, United States private long-term investment abroad increased at an average annual rate of $1.5 billion. Of this total, additions to holdings of foreign securities by private individuals and financial institutions accounted for only $200 million per year, mostly in investments in Canada or in securities of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. The remaining $1.3 billion per year was about equally divided between net new direct investments abroad of American corporations and reinvestment of earnings from their foreign operations.

During the same period, the value of United States Government foreign loans outstanding increased at an average annual rate of $500 million. Repayments on old loans now nearly equal new lending. Disbursements by the International Bank averaged $139 million per year during the period.

United States investment abroad has not increased as rapidly as anticipated at the end of the war, and the United States has not achieved all of the benefits which might have resulted from an expanded volume of wise foreign investment.

THE CONDITIONS CONDUCIVE TO PRIVATE INVESTMENT ABROAD

The small flow of private investment abroad may be attributed to the concern of potential investors over the general political, economic, and military uncertainties abroad, as well as over other aspects of the "climate" for investment in particular countries. Many of the deterrents can be overcome only gradually. Countries desiring to attract capital must provide a secure legal status for private capital and enterprise, domestic as well as foreign. United States investors can hardly be expected to venture into countries and fields which local capital and enterprise consider unattractive or insecure. On the other hand, United States investors will venture into areas of political and economic stability which provide fair and equitable treatment and with it an opportunity for reasonable profit and assurance of remitting earnings.

There are various types of action which the United States Government can take to encourage the flow of private investment abroad.

The Government can and should give full diplomatic support to the acceptance and understanding abroad of the principles underlying the creation of a climate conducive to private foreign investment. This requires better coordination of policy and action by the various United States agencies and representatives in the field of foreign economic policy, and, in particular, a clear formulation of the Government's position with respect to private investment abroad, stressing support of the private enterprise system and the interests of United States investors.

To some extent the general climate and legal environment for private investment may also be improved through the negotiation of international treaties relating to foreign investment. Although it must be recognized that such treaties more often record the existence of a favorable climate than create it, the discussions which take place in the attempt of two governments to reach agreement may in themselves be beneficial. The United States Government should continue to use the treaty approach to establish common rules on the fair treatment of foreign investment. Negotiations should be undertaken first with like-minded countries, and gradually be extended as additional countries become convinced of the desirability of a friendly attitude toward private enterprise.

The United States Government also can remove uncertainties in its own policies which affect foreign investment.

One uncertainty relates to the application of United States antitrust laws to operations abroad. United States antitrust policies should be restated in a manner which would clearly acknowledge the right of each country to regulate trade within its own borders. At the same time it should be made clear that foreign laws or established business practices which encourage restrictive price, production, or marketing arrangements will limit the willingness of United States businessmen to invest abroad and will reduce the benefits of investment from abroad to the economies of the host countries.

Another source of uncertainty which affects the willingness of foreign countries to accept private capital from abroad relates to United States policy in the field of public financing. The United States Government should make clear that primary reliance must be placed on private investment to undertake the job of assisting in economic development abroad. It should point out that United States resources for public loans are limited and inadequate in relation to total investment needs, and that public lending or other forms of public financing will not be a substitute for private investment.

In addition to these general activities in the field of diplomatic and foreign policy, there are two specific areas in which the Government can take action to encourage the flow of private investment abroad. It can provide an inducement to foreign investment by removing certain United States tax burdens and inequities. It can mitigate, or remove, certain risks peculiar to foreign investment by providing Government guaranties or insurance not available from commercial sources.

UNITED STATES TAXATION AND INVESTMENT ABROAD

The nature of United States taxation of income earned outside the country is an important determinant of the flow of United States private investment abroad. At present, income from foreign investments is taxed at the same rates as income from investments within the United States. An attempt is made to avoid double taxation by allowing the taxpayer to credit certain of his foreign taxes against his domestic tax bill. However, the existing restrictions on the use of the foreign tax credit may prevent the taxpayer from offsetting in full the appropriate foreign taxes which he has paid.

As a result of this system of taxation the United States investor abroad is placed at a disadvantage in competition with international investors from other nations which levy little or no tax on income earned abroad. Furthermore, United States tax policy serves to offset any tax reductions by which foreign governments might seek to attract investment from the United States. United States tax laws may even result in pressure on foreign governments to adopt income taxes or to increase their income tax rates.

A study of these considerations leads the Commission to recommend three revisions in the Revenue Code.

(1) RATE REDUCTION

The Commission recommends that there be a reduction in the corporate tax rate by at least 14 percentage points on income from investment abroad. As a result of such reductions, when the tax rates of a foreign country are not in excess of the reduced United States rates, the taxes of a corporation previously paying taxes at a 52 percent rate would be reduced to 38 percent on income from investment in that country. The existing reduction in the taxation of the income of a Western Hemisphere Trade Corporation amounts to 14 percentage points, but this reduction is now too limited in some respects and too broad in others. The Commission recommends that the lower corporate tax rate be made to apply to investment income from all areas abroad; but the reduced rate should not apply to income from exports which do not involve the risks of investment abroad.

The Commission believes that in many instances investments abroad by United States citizens and investment trusts also deserve encouragement. Such investors now pay the full United States rates of tax on income from investments in those same countries in which it is recommended that investment be encouraged by a tax reduction for United States corporations. The Commission recognizes that it is a far more difficult task of tax legislation to draft equitable tax incentives to apply to individuals, with their varying tax rates, than it is to provide fair tax incentives to corporate investors. Nonetheless the Commission recommends that the Congress seek to provide to individuals who invest abroad—by means of a rate reduction, a foreign tax credit, or some other device—preferential tax treatment . . . comparable to that already recommended for corporate investors.

(2) REMOVAL OF CERTAIN RESTRICTIONS ON FOREIGN TAX CREDITS.

The Commission recommends that the Congress remove several restrictions which now prevent a person who invests abroad from offsetting in full against his domestic tax the appropriate foreign taxes. Investment abroad is discouraged since these restrictions impose a higher total tax on income from foreign investments than on income from investment at home.

(a) Under present law a United States corporation owning 10 percent or more of the voting stock of a foreign corporation may credit against its United States tax on the dividends received from the foreign corporation a proportionate share of the foreign income taxes paid by the foreign corporation on the earnings from which the dividend was distributed. This 10 percent ownership requirement should be reduced or eliminated if satisfactory administrative standards can be devised for dealing with smaller holdings. Under present law an individual investor can credit foreign taxes which are imposed directly on his income from abroad. The individual investor can, for example, credit the 15 percent Canadian withholding tax on dividends paid to a United States investor. This credit is lost, however, when the United States citizen invests through an investment trust. Provision should be made for the investment trusts, not only to receive, but to pass on to the individual shareholder the credit for foreign taxes available to individual investors.

(b) The foreign tax credits are also limited to income taxes and to taxes in lieu of a tax on income. This requirement that the foreign country have a general income tax to which the investor would be subject in the absence of a special provision applicable to him has clearly been too restrictive. The interpretation of what taxes are in lieu of income taxes should be liberalized in this and other respects.

(c) The Commission recommends further that the "over-all" limitation on foreign tax credits be eliminated. This limitation requires losses in one foreign country to be set off against income from another in determining the total of foreign income which can justify a tax credit. This limitation, by reducing the foreign tax credit, deprives the taxpayer of the full tax benefit of foreign losses so long as he has offsetting foreign income. The limitation is a serious deterrent to the commencement of operations in a new foreign country by a taxpayer having profitable operations in other foreign countries.

(3) THE CHOICE OF FORM OF INVESTMENT ABROAD.

In the view of the Commission, United States tax law should not penalize investors for adopting the form of organization dictated by local laws or business conditions abroad. In order to reduce the possibility of such penalties the Commission recommends that a United States corporation be allowed the option of treating any direct foreign investment either as a branch or a subsidiary for United States tax purposes, regardless of which of the two forms of organization is actually chosen for operations abroad. The choice of treatment for tax purposes should be binding, however, until for good cause the United States Treasury allows a change.

GOVERNMENT GUARANTY OF PRIVATE INVESTMENT ABROAD

For the last few years the United States Government has offered to guarantee approved United States private investments in certain countries, mainly in Europe, against loss from exchange inconvertibility or expropriation. This guaranty, or insurance, program was introduced in the hope that it would reduce the need for foreign aid expenditures. To date the program has not greatly stimulated private investment abroad. Coverage has been given to only $41 million of new investment. Thus far the Government has not been required to pay out on any policy and nearly $1 million has been earned in the form of fees.

The Commission considers that the present experimental program has not proved itself. On the other hand, a number of potential investors continue to show interest in the guaranty device. Many investors have suggested that the program would be more conducive to additional investment abroad if it were extended in some areas to cover the risks of war, revolution, and insurrection. To the Commission, such risks actually seem to be the most appropriate risks of all for Government insurance. The Commission therefore recommends that the program of guaranties against expropriation or inconvertibility of exchange be given a further period of trial and that during this period guaranty coverage on a discretionary basis be authorized for the risks of war, revolution, and insurrection on new investments abroad.

THE ROLE OF PUBLIC LENDING

Although the United States Government should place primary reliance on private enterprise and investment to assist in economic development abroad, there are special circumstances in which United States economic and foreign policy objectives can be served by public lending. Loans by the Export-Import Bank have been made to expand the foreign production of raw materials needed for defense purposes. In order to achieve vital foreign policy objectives in certain areas, the Export-Import Bank has made loans for such purposes as reconstruction of earthquake damage in Ecuador, and for helping countries to adjust to political developments favorable to United States interests, as exemplified by the loan to Yugoslavia following that country's break with the U. S. S. R. The Export-Import Bank has also made loans for the general economic development of foreign countries where such loans supported the special national interests of the United States.

The expansion of basic facilities, such as transportation, harbors, and irrigation, is frequently essential for a balanced growth of the less developed countries, most of which lack the capital required to finance projects of this type. Loans by the Export-Import Bank and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development to finance such basic facilities are often a necessary condition for increased private foreign investment in raw materials, manufacturing, and distribution—fields which are more attractive to private foreign investors. Wherever possible, such loans should be made to private enterprise abroad, and foreign public lending should not encourage the displacement of private by public operations. It should also be emphasized that public lending should not compete with, or displace, private foreign investment, including private loans to foreign borrowers, and this principle should be made abundantly clear to prospective borrowers.

ROLES OF THE INTERNATIONAL BANK AND THE EXPORT-IMPORT BANK

The Export-Import Bank is essentially an instrument of United States foreign policy. The International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, on the other hand, promotes the interests of the United States broadly in the field of foreign economic development. The record does not indicate that there has been harmful competition or duplication in the operations of the two banks. The Congress, in the Bretton Woods Act of 1945, established the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems to coordinate the policies of the Export-Import Bank with the activities of the United States representatives on the board of the International Bank. This machinery should be employed to resolve any issues between the two banks.

The International Bank has demonstrated its capacity to apply banking principles in the field of public lending, and plays a useful role in the achievement of the vital objectives of increasing trade and raising living standards in the free world. On the other hand, the national interests of the United States may require the making of certain loans by the Export-Import Bank, which the International Bank will not make because of its charter limitations or for other reasons. For example, the Export-Import Bank can make loans to private United States or foreign investors operating abroad without a foreign government guaranty; the International Bank can make loans only to member governments or to residents of member countries with the guaranty of the member government.

While it is believed that the Export-Import Bank should continue to make loans which are in the special interest of the United States, the Bank should not use its own funds for loans which do not meet reasonable standards of bankability. In general, loans which do not meet reasonable financial standards are likely to create serious administrative difficulties by setting up dual standards for the treatment of international obligations. Nevertheless, in cases where there is an urgent political need for foreign financial assistance to a country whose capacity to service additional loans is doubtful, and where such assistance is deemed by the Congress to be more appropriate on a loan rather than a grant basis, special funds should be authorized for such purposes.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT AND ECONOMIC STABILITY

United States investment abroad, public and private, provides additional markets for United States exports. The financing of exports by public loans has been, and can be, helpful, not only in maintaining domestic production and employment when domestic demand falls off, but also in assisting foreign countries in procuring the United States goods necessary to their growth. The financing of exports by short-term loans from the Export-Import Bank may provide a stimulus to exports. Long-term loans for carefully selected development projects not only will increase United States exports, but are also likely to create a better international balance by assisting foreign countries in expanding their capacity to export to the United States and to third countries.

International balance may also be affected by the pattern of total United States capital outflow. Because of the large United States Government loans made immediately following World War II, repayments on old loans from this source are now running at a rate of about $400 million annually, plus another $230 million in interest payments. United States Government lending is now little more than sufficient to offset the repayment of principal on old loans. Direct private investment, on the other hand, has been reasonably stable over the past few years. Any sharp decline in the total flow of investment abroad would create severe problems of adjustment in American export industries and in the development programs of the other nations of the free world. Moreover, a rapid fall in United States foreign investment, such as occurred during the period 1928-33, would inevitably put a strain on the balance of payments position of other countries and might lead to a tightening of trade and exchange restrictions or defaults on foreign obligations.

PROBLEMS OF AGRICULTURE AND RAW MATERIALS

IMPORTANCE OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE TO AGRICULTURE

Foreign handicaps to the free flow of international trade such as inconvertible currencies, exchange controls, import quotas, and special import licenses exert a depressing influence upon the exports of farm products from the United States, especially when such products are available from nondollar areas. American farmers therefore have a keen interest in measures which will reduce or eliminate such discrimination against the free movement of United States farm products into world markets.

Export markets are of vital importance for our great staple farm products such as cotton, wheat, tobacco, rice, and soybeans. In recent years one-third of our wheat, 40 percent of our cotton and rice, and one-fourth of our tobacco and soybeans have been exported. Such export markets are also important to the producers of fresh and dried fruits, dry beans and peas, condensed, evaporated, and dried milk, and a considerable list of other products. In all, farm products representing about 30 percent of the value of farm marketings in 1952 were dependent to a highly important degree upon export markets.

It would be unrealistic to expect the total volume of our farm product exports to continue at the level attained during the period of post-war reconstruction, when foreign supplies of such products were limited as a result of the war and when large United States foreign aid expenditures were financing a large fraction of such exports from the United States. In order to minimize the repercussions on agriculture of any inevitable decline in farm exports, however, it is important to take such steps as can be taken to maximize a continuing flow of United States farm products into world markets. Failure to do so would adversely affect not only those segments of agriculture directly concerned with export markets but also, as a result of the diversion of resources from these to other farm enterprises, other segments of our farm economy. The prospect of such repercussions is already evident in the shift of wheat and cotton acreages to other farm enterprises for the 1954 harvest, as a result of the curtailment of these crops that has been ordered, partly in view of the decline in exports of wheat and cotton during 1952-53.

CONFLICT BETWEEN FARM POLICIES AND ENLARGEMENT OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE

In the opinion of the Commission, it is necessary to harmonize our agricultural and foreign economic policies without sacrificing the sound objectives of either.

The inherent conflict is not between foreign trade policy and farm policy as such, but rather between foreign trade policy and the means by which an important phase of our farm policy is being implemented. To put the matter boldly, it is necessary to emphasize that inflexible price-support programs which hold domestic prices above world prices become price-fixing programs and result in accumulations of surpluses that would otherwise have moved into consumption here or abroad. To maintain such price-fixing programs it may become necessary for the United States to apply trade restrictions of various kinds, including import quotas, to keep down foreign importations. To move high-priced surpluses into export markets it may seem necessary to use export subsidies or dumping procedures that, if practiced with respect to imports into this country, would involve the application of our antidumping and countervailing-duty laws. Price-fixing, particularly with reference to commodities moving in international trade, is inherently incompatible with a pattern of private trade, free enterprise, and nondiscriminatory commerce among nations.

The International Wheat Agreement¹ has contributed little to the solution of wheat problems of the United States and the world at large. Its chief significance has been to accord official sanction, on the part of the participating nations, to United States export subsidization of the United States quota when nonquota export prices were at or above the agreed maximum. At heavy expense to the United States Treasury, this has contributed to the persistence of excessive domestic support prices, which have given undue stimulus to wheat production here and abroad, and has tended to obstruct, rather than to facilitate, normal readjustments in United States agriculture, and to lead to abnormal accumulation of stocks of wheat. In the current season, when export prices are below the agreed maximum, the importing countries are relieved of their obligation to purchase wheat unless the prices drop below the agreed minimum level. Furthermore, the most important importing country is no longer a party to the agreement. Under these circumstances the significance of the agreement in relation to our wheat export problem is relatively slight.

Restrictions on our imports of certain farm products, for the purpose of protecting domestic price-fixing programs on such products at prices above world levels, can and do lead to retaliatory measures which hurt other segments of agriculture which are dependent upon export outlets and a favorable climate for foreign trade.

If to a scheme of fixed prices in agriculture are added the inevitable implementing devices of production quotas, import controls, and export subsidies, the ability of agriculture to play a continuing dynamic role in expanding international trade will be largely lost. This would be a serious loss, not only to agriculture, but to our entire economy and to the productivity of the free world. Furthermore, the repercussions from the standpoint of the trading policies of our friends and allies of the free world would be to the detriment of all concerned.

STEPS TOWARD RECONCILIATION OF FARM AND TRADE POLICIES

The first step toward policy reconciliation in the fields of foreign economic and domestic agricultural policies must of necessity be a delineation by the Congress and the administrative agencies concerned of a consistent pattern of policies and procedures which will permit the achievement of the objectives of both our agricultural and our foreign economic policies. The transition to this new pattern will require time, particularly in view of the existing accumulations (in actual or potential government ownership) of substantial quantities of several farm products for which foreign markets are urgently needed in the not too distant future. The potential international complications which keep arising over import quotas or embargoes, import fees additional to tariff rates, and export subsidies on a small or large scale, undertaken in consequence of domestic agricultural programs, bid fair to reach an unprecedented peak in the fiscal year 1954, as large stocks of farm products are being acquired. The transitional problems are difficult but not insoluble.

During the transitional period it will be necessary to take every precaution to avoid steps which may lead toward an increase in actual or virtual state trading, lest a pattern of such conduct, seemingly forced by the circumstances of the moment, becomes established as permanent policy. Also, if we are to succeed in moving toward a lessened use of such devices as export subsidies and import quotas, it would be desirable to continue the policy and extend the practice of consulting with interested and affected countries, for the purpose of seeing that such actions of this character as may be required by present law be modified to the extent necessary to ensure that we do not provoke a self-defeating chain of offsetting actions by other countries.

The International Wheat Council may constitute a useful body for international consultations on current wheat problems, although this value is limited by the absence of certain nations that are important as importing or exporting countries. The Commission recommends that during the life of the 1953 International Wheat Agreement its operation be kept under critical review, that efforts be made to make the organization contribute its maximum to solving pressing problems, and that its termination in 1956 be given consideration.

In the application of import restrictions on farm products, the level of those restrictions should be set with full regard for the effects on overseas buying power and the possibility that such restrictions may lead to retaliation and may be self-defeating.

The temptation to resort to short-run expedients as easy remedies is great, and, in fact, a number of interim measures must be used. But it is important to agriculture, and to the national interest, that these interim measures be consistent with the long-term objective, and that they hasten rather than hinder the achievement of this goal.

The Commission believes that a dynamic foreign economic policy as it relates to agriculture cannot be built out of a maze of restrictive devices such as inflexible price-support programs which result in fixed prices, open or concealed export subsidies, import quotas at home and abroad, excessive use of tariffs here and abroad, exchange restrictions, and state trading. If we are to have a foreign economic policy which will make its best contribution to the strengthening of our long-term development of foreign markets for farmers, we must move as rapidly as feasible toward the elimination of such devices as a part of, or supplement to, our own agricultural policy.

INSTABILITY OF RAW MATERIALS PRICES

Fluctuations in prices have particularly serious effects upon countries whose economies depend predominantly upon production and export of primary products. Extreme fluctuations not only induce distortions in the economic development of these countries; they sometimes shock their economies to an extent that throws great strain upon their social and political fabrics. Moreover, memories of collapses in primary products prices and fears of a recurrence tend to stimulate overrapid industrialization, designed to reduce their dependence upon the sale of primary products.

For these reasons, greater stability of prices is one of the prime desires in the raw materials exporting countries; and of course it is desired too in the industrialized countries which import raw materials and foodstuffs.

Prices inevitably fluctuate with variations in supply and demand; and such variations are affected by changes in the general economy. In particular, the demand for primary products in international trade is affected by business conditions in the industrialized countries which import them. Because of its sheer economic weight, the American economy exercises a particularly great influence on raw materials prices.

Proposals have been made to solve the problem of price instability by intergovernmental commodity agreements, involving export quotas, import quotas, price limits, reserve stocks, price stabilization purchases and sales (buffer stocks), production controls, or some combination of such devices. The Commission does not believe that exten-

e resort to commodity agreements will solve the problem of price stability; and it believes that such agreements introduce rigidities and restraints that impair the elasticity of economic adjustment and the freedom of individual initiative, which are fundamental to economic progress. Moreover, the types of intergovernmental commodity agreements thus far tried or proposed for the purpose of stabilizing prices involve commitments which could lead, if extensively employed, to very great outlays of United States Government funds in certain contingencies, of indeterminable amounts.

The Commission finds the same objections to the proposals for unilateral price-fixing action by the United States to stabilize world prices of raw materials and foodstuffs. Experience with the costs of efforts to stabilize certain commodity prices within the United States are an indication of the indeterminability of the costs of similar programs on a worldwide scale.

Aside from other causes, price instabilities are caused or aggravated in some instances by actions of governments. These include restrictions upon imports, exports, and foreign exchange; national commodity controls; accumulations and liquidations of commodities by governments; and finally wars.

The Commission believes that the constructive contributions that the United States Government can make toward greater stability of world prices are:

1) measures tending to relax or remove impediments to United States foreign trade and to encourage other countries to move in the same direction;

2) a policy of encouragement of diversification of the economies of the countries now excessively dependent upon a small number of products, and of encouragement of the governments of those countries to pursue policies likely to attract foreign investors to participate in the works of diversification;

3) avoidance of actions incidental to our own commodity control and stockpile programs that would have avoidably disruptive effects upon world prices;

4) continued consultation and cooperation with other nations to improve knowledge of world supply and demand for materials and foodstuffs, and to explore possible means of lessening instability; and

5) policies which will temper the fluctuations of our domestic economy, which exert great influence upon the course of world prices.

UNITED STATES DEPENDENCE ON IMPORTED MATERIALS

Since the beginning of World War II, the United States has become a consumer of more raw materials than it produces. This makes us dependent on materials imported from foreign sources and upon the availability, accessibility, and reasonable cost of the materials produced. This dependence will increase with growth in population, with increase in per capita consumption of end products, and with invention of new useful products to open new avenues of demand. The population factor alone will add 25 percent to our needs if it compounds at the rate of 1.5 percent annually for 15 years. Forecasts of the further additions through expansion of per capita consumption and through new invention would be guesswork; but those who review the experience of the last half century cannot weigh them lightly.

We depend on foreign sources today for over 30 percent of our requirements of copper, lead, and zinc; over 50 percent of our requirements of tungsten, bauxite, and antimony; over 75 percent of our requirements of chrome and manganese; practically all of our nickel requirements; and all our requirements of tin, natural rubber, and jute.

The Western European countries and Japan depend more heavily than we do on imported materials; and the needs for raw materials in other countries are growing steadily with the progress of industrialization which is in evidence in most parts of the world. In all these countries, growth of population and the demands for ever higher standards of living indicate progressively expanding requirements for raw materials, although at rates of expansion varying with the circumstances of each country. Their dependence on the development of new foreign sources of raw materials will increase with ours, from year to year and from generation to generation.

To some extent, this need for development of foreign sources of materials may be mitigated by discoveries of new sources in the United States. To some extent, it can be lessened by intensified exploitation of high-cost United States sources. The latter course, however, would involve quickened depletion of some of them and high costs of materials to our industry and of the products to our consumers. For many materials, the only practical sources are outside our borders. In most of the countries where these sources are situated, local capital is not adequate to finance their development.

The Commission believes that the most effective contribution which the United States Government can make to the development of the foreign sources of raw materials in which we and the free nations generally are deficient, is to follow policies favorable toward private investment abroad (as recommended earlier in this report), and to advocate among nations adherence to principles and practices hospitable to foreign investors and conducive to thrift and investment by their own nationals. One principle in particular must be stressed: Investors in the development of sources of needed materials must be assured against frustration of their ventures by unpredictable or capricious levies on exports or production by the countries of origin. Also our tariff policy toward the needed materials should be such as to offer them reasonably easy access to the United States market.

Intensified development of foreign sources of deficit materials is not only a compelling necessity for the United States and free nations generally; it also is a promising means of enlarging wealth and productivity in the countries where the development takes place, and of improving their opportunities of employment, standards of living, and capacities to buy from abroad.

SECURITY CONSIDERATIONS

The purely economic considerations, however, must be reconciled with considerations of military preparedness, where the two are not in harmony. A prime military consideration in the selection of foreign sources of materials is availability of the materials for United States and allied use under conditions of war. The preference among sources is governed by the degree of friendliness of the nations involved, their exposure to enemy action, and the length and safety of the transportation routes. In the case of critical materials which are extremely scarce, or whose sources in event of war would be in jeopardy or at the other end of a long or dangerous ocean route, assured wartime availability depends upon stockpiling.

The argument is often made that military considerations should dictate a preference for higher cost domestic sources of materials that may be needed in time of war, and that the maintenance of these lines of production here should be assured by effective tariffs. In some cases, such protection may enlarge our available supplies by expanding our production base, whereas in others it may exhaust the supplies that remain. Acceptance of this principle could lead to extreme distortions of the costs to our industry and consumers, with detriment to the international competitive situation of industry and the living costs of consumers incommensurate with the military considerations involved. It could lead also to burdens upon the entire American people incommensurate with the benefits to small numbers of them. It could bring about uneconomical substitutions of other things less adapted to the same use for the things whose costs it would inflate. The Commission recommends that tariffs or other import restrictions on raw materials should be determined on economic grounds. Upon a finding by the Executive that it is necessary on solely military grounds to assure a strictly domestic source of supply, the Commission recommends that the purpose should be accomplished by other means, the cost of which should be borne in the defense budget.

TARIFFS AND TRADE POLICY

In our consideration of the broad subject of tariffs and trade policies in relation to international trade, our starting point of course must be our present tariff structure. The world, including the United States, has had no experience for any considerable period of time with our present tariffs under conditions which might be termed relatively normal. The Trade Agreements Act ¹ was enacted while we were in the middle of a depression. Many bilateral trade agreements involving many reductions in our duties, were made during the first 5 years the act was in effect, but there had been limited opportunity to observe their effect before our trade, already distorted, was further disrupted by the outbreak of war. Since the termination of World War II the patterns of both our exports and our imports have been abnormal. There was an unusually large demand for our exports both for consumption and for rebuilding a war-torn world, and an interruption in the growth of our imports, arising out of the same causes. The Korean War resulted in a further distortion. Resulting imbalances were financed largely through our foreign loan and grant programs. During this period we continued to make further agreements involving still greater reductions in our tariffs.

Now, we find ourselves facing demands for further opening of our markets at a time when our commercial exports are in approximate balance with the highest level of imports ever reached, while the world as a whole has considerably rebuilt its holdings of gold and dollar reserves.

We are fully aware of the arguments for free trade. It is sufficient to say that, in our opinion, free trade is not possible under the conditions facing the United States today. Even in moving toward greater freedom of trade we must consider all of the rigidities, both here and elsewhere, which negate some of the premises upon which the arguments for free trade rest. We must take into account that while the United States employs impediments to trade, primarily through tariffs and in only limited fields through quotas, other countries also employ these devices. Beyond this, they employ the quota procedure far beyond our use, and against other countries as well as against us, and also employ exchange controls and many other devices not used here.

The record clearly indicates that, from a psychological and economic point of view, United States policies in fields connected with the tariff have come to be regarded as of key importance by both the American and the foreign public. We believe this is an over-emphasis, for it must not be assumed that any measures which the United States might take in the fields of customs administration and tariff policy, taken by themselves, could provide the full answer to the problem of imbalance described earlier in this report.

Any adequate program requires appropriate policies on a broad front, in foreign countries as well as here, including but not limited to policies with respect to convertibility and investment. Nor should any assumptions be made as to the key position of United States tariffs and customs procedures, relative to the many impediments which exist in the world to the international movement of goods and to the most effective application of capital and labor. It is clear, on the evidence examined by this Commission, that although many United States tariffs are high and many of our customs procedures are slow and cumbersome, many other United States tariffs are low and more than half our imports enter free of duty.

We fully recognize the dangers of using averages; yet it seems clear by any test that can be devised that the United States is no longer among the higher tariff countries of the world. Taken by and large, our trade restrictions are certainly no more of a cause of payment imbalances than the rigidities maintained by other nations. Restrictions on import and export trade, in turn, are probably no more important than, and in a measure are bound up with, the rigidities maintained inside foreign economies through cartel restrictions, the immobility of labor, and ingrained resistance to technological change; and the rigidities maintained inside the American economy through farm price-support programs, minimum wage legislation, resale price maintenance laws, and the like.

The fact is that we have moved far from a world in which complete international specialization of labor is possible. Some of the rigidities mentioned above are here to stay. Other rigidities, such as those necessary for the defense of the free world, cannot be eliminated as long as the threat of communist aggression continues. This means that completely free trade is not feasible.

Yet the nations of the free world would be stronger and more cohesive if many of the existing barriers to the exchange of their goods were reduced, if unnecessary uncertainties and delays created by such barriers were eliminated, and if adequate international arrangements for discussing and finding solutions to their common trade problems were developed and maintained. The measures described below are aimed at contributing to these broad objectives.

The Buy American Act¹ and legislative provisions of other acts containing the Buy American principle should be amended to give authority to the President to exempt from the provisions of such legislation the bidders from other nations that treat our bidders on an equal basis with their own nationals. Pending such amendment, the President by Executive Order should direct procurement agencies in the public interest to consider foreign bids which satisfy all other considerations on substantially the same price basis as domestic bids.

The Buy American Act was enacted in 1933 as an antidepression measure. It requires Government procurement agencies in effect to give a preference to domestic suppliers, except where such suppliers are quoting prices substantially higher than those quoted from foreign sources. It embodies a philosophy and a practice which exists in many industrial nations of the free world and which is costly to them all. Today our Government procurement alone is of an order some 40 times its dollar volume in 1933. We are fully aware of sentiment everywhere that governments should buy from those who pay their expenses. While we do not believe that foreign producers have any inherent right to supply our Government, we believe that in the total national interest the United States could well lead the way toward the elimination of such preferences on a reciprocal basis.

Congress should direct the President to have the Tariff Commission undertake a study of the tariff schedules immediately, with the stated purpose of framing proposals for the simplification of commodity definitions and rate structures; this study should be completed within a definite time period and the Tariff Commission should be provided during this period with an appropriately enlarged staff. Congress should empower the President, on the basis of such recommendations, to proclaim such changes in commodity definitions and changes in rates as he determines to be appropriate, provided that such changes do not materially alter the total of duties collected pursuant to any group of rates affected by such simplifying changes when calculated on imports in a specified base period.

The Department of the Treasury should formulate proposals designed to simplify the problem of classifying articles not enumerated in our tariff schedules. To that end, consideration should be given to eliminating the multiple and conflicting standards which now apply in the classification of such articles, such as "similitude" and "component of chief value," and developing a single standard of classifications for the widest practicable application.

The Senate should promptly consider H. R. 6584 now before it,¹ which would amend and improve the customs valuation provisions of our law by eliminating so-called "foreign value" as a basis of valuation and by other simplifying changes. In addition, the Department of the Treasury should be directed to make a study and report to the Congress on the feasibility and effect of making greater use of the actual invoice price of imported goods for valuation purposes in transactions between a buyer and a seller who are independent of each other. In that connection it should also consider and report upon the feasibility of making more efficient use of the "antidumping" law.

The Department of the Treasury should be directed to make a continuing study of difficulties and delays in customs administration and to report the results of its studies each year to the Congress, together with any proposals for legislative action.

a. The first of the regular reports herein recommended should indicate those detailed administrative provisions of the tariff laws which should be modified so that adequate discretion can be granted to the Secretary of the Treasury to insure the greatest possible speed and efficiency of administration in the operation of customs.

b. The first report should also set forth progress made through recent administrative action in simplifying customs procedures, including measures taken in accordance with the Customs Simplification Act of 1953.²

In connection with the application of antidumping duties, the task of determining, in accordance with the provisions of existing law, "that an industry in the United States is being or is likely to be injured . . ." by foreign dumping, should be transferred from the Department of the Treasury to the Tariff Commission. The Department of the Treasury should be directed to study and report to the Congress on any statutory amendments which may be needed to permit the continuance of shipments pending investigation of suspected dumping; and at the same time it should report on any measures needed to effect speedier and more efficient operation of antidumping provisions in proper cases.

The President should study appropriate methods to assure that American industry is not injured by embargoes upon or other impediments to exports of raw materials to the United States for use in processing here. In this connection, he should direct the Department of the Treasury to review the effectiveness of existing countervailing-duty provisions of the law, should consider any alternative measures which may be available for achieving this purpose, and if necessary should make appropriate recommendations to the Congress.

Our policy of nondiscrimination in trade matters, as reflected in our unconditional most-favored-nation policy, should not be changed.

The United States should continue its traditional policy of nondiscrimination in its trade relations with other free nations. Only the unconditional most-favored-nation doctrine is consistent with this policy. If the United States were to give preferential trade treatment to certain countries, such action would itself constitute discrimination and be inconsistent with the position of the United States in the free world. Our present unconditional policy has been in effect for 30 years. Its reversal now would probably defeat our efforts to induce other countries to eliminate preferential arrangements that discriminate against us.

The organizational provisions of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade should be renegotiated¹ with a view to confining the functions of the contracting parties to sponsoring multilateral trade negotiations, recommending broad trade policies for individual consideration by the legislative or other appropriate authorities in the various countries, and providing a forum for consultation regarding trade disputes. The organizational provisions renegotiated in accordance with this recommendation should be submitted to the Congress for approval either as a treaty or by joint resolution.

The President's power to negotiate trade agreements under the Trade Agreements Act and to place them in force should be extended for not less than 3 years, with appropriate safeguards.² Such a period should give time for considering the effects of the recommendations for action here and of the actions taken abroad to restore multilateral trade and payments as in the past, and for Congress to give adequate consideration to the renegotiated organizational provisions of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, as recommended above. Consideration should then be given to extending the Trade Agreements Act for a longer period than 3 years, with such safeguards as experience then indicates to be necessary.

In the past, the repeated short-term renewals of the President's powers to negotiate trade agreements have created an aura of instability in our trade policy which it would be desirable to avoid for the future. However, any permanent or long-term delegation of tariff-changing power by the Congress, while including limitations on maximum permissible changes, must also be accompanied by adequate standards, more specific than those which have accompanied the earlier delegations of such power for limited periods of time.

² See the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1955; infra, doc. 9.]

The President should be delegated broad powers under the Trade Agreements Act to enter into multilateral negotiations looking toward a reduction of tariff rates on a gradual basis. The President's power to increase rates should not thereby be curtailed. The President should be authorized for the 3 years following the renewal of the act to reduce tariff rates to the following extent:

a. Pursuant to multilateral trade agreement negotiation, the President should be authorized to reduce existing tariff rates by not more than 5 percent of present rates in each of the first 3 years of the new act.

b. On the basis of information provided by the Tariff Commission, the President should be authorized, with or without receiving reciprocal concessions, to reduce tariffs by not more than one-half of rates in effect January 1, 1945, on products which are not being imported or which are being imported in negligible volume. Any such reductions should be made in steps spread over a period of 3 years.

c. The President should be authorized to reduce to 50 percent ad valorem, or its equivalent, any rate in excess of that ceiling, except that any such reduction should take place by stages over a period of 3 years.

d. Reductions in rates pursuant to the foregoing should not be cumulative as to any commodity.

e. In the exercise of these powers, the existing prenegotiation procedures, including public notice and hearings before the Tariff Commission and before an interdepartmental committee, should be followed and peril point determinations should be made. Moreover, the provisions of the escape clause should apply to tariff reductions made under this authority.

In extending the tariff-negotiating authority of the President, the Congress should direct that in future negotiations subdivisions of classification categories which would give rise to new confusion or controversy over classification be avoided to the maximum extent possible.

The President should make an annual report to the Congress on the operation of the trade agreements program including information on new negotiations undertaken, changes made in tariff rates, and reciprocal concessions obtained.

The escape clause and the peril point provisions should be retained. However, the statute should be amended expressly to spell out the fact that the President is authorized to disregard findings under these pro-provisions whenever he finds that the national interest of the United States requires it.

To date, the escape clause has been applied by the President with respect to only 3 products, despite the fact that there have been over 50 applications for the use of that clause in the past 5 years. There is no similar body of experience as yet with respect to the application of the peril point provisions. The application of these provisions on the basis of the national interest should provide adequate reassurance as to the stability of United States trade policy.

The same standards of sanitation and health should be applied to imported as to domestic goods. Plant and animal quarantine provisions should be maintained. The desirability of consulting with other countries, with a view to creating greater understanding abroad of the standards being enforced by the United States, should be studied.

RELATED PROBLEMS OF TRADE ADJUSTMENT

While the major solutions to trade and payments imbalance must be found in the fields of foreign investment, currency convertibility, and trade policy discussed elsewhere in this report, important contributions can be made in other fields. Contributions can be made in East-West trade, in shipping, and by tourism, each of which will now be discussed.

EAST-WEST TRADE

On the problem of what the United States should do toward the growing desire of some Western European nations who are our allies to trade with the countries involved in the Communist bloc, two points seem entirely clear.

*First, the present ban on exports by the United States to Communist China and North Korea and our efforts to secure similar action by others must continue until the present threats to our security and that of other free nations in those areas have been removed.*¹

*Secondly, our present efforts to prevent exports to the European-Soviet bloc that might contribute to its military strength must continue until genuine peace is assured.*²

But over and above these two categories of shipments there lies a possible area of trade between the East and the West in Europe in commodities which do not strengthen the forces of military aggression, a trade from which net advantage might accrue to the West.

It is this area of commerce that presents the dilemma to the United States.

For many generations there has existed a broad historic pattern of trade in Central Europe that served to support the economies of countries that are now our allies. These nations traditionally drew from the Soviet Union, Poland, East Germany, and the lower Danube valley, foodstuffs, feeds, fuels, and raw materials. They sold in return the products of their factories.

¹ See supra, pp. 2614-2615 and 2622-2626.

² See supra, pp. 1989-1993 and infra, pp. 3101-3105.

Since the unmasking of the Soviet designs against western civilization, in conjunction with other free nations we have sought to restrict that trade. This weakened the economies of friendly countries and increased their need for our aid.

When we terminate that aid there is grave question as to whether we should attempt longer to prevent such friendly nations from availing themselves of their normal and historic trade pattern.

It may well be, moreover, that more trade in goods for peaceful purposes would in itself serve to penetrate the Iron Curtain and advance the day when normal relationships with the peoples of Eastern Europe may be resumed.

The Commission therefore recommends that, so far as it can be done without jeopardizing military security, and subject to the embargo on Communist China and North Korea, the United States acquiesce in more trade in peaceful goods between Western Europe and the Soviet bloc.

MERCHANT MARINE POLICY

The Merchant Marine Shipping Act of 1936¹ declared it to be necessary "for the national defense and development of its foreign and domestic commerce that the United States shall have a merchant marine (a) sufficient to carry its domestic waterborne commerce and a substantial portion of the waterborne export and import foreign commerce of the United States and to provide shipping services on all routes essential for maintaining the flow of such domestic and foreign waterborne commerce at all times, (b) capable of serving as a naval and military auxiliary in time of war or national emergency, . . ." The act provided for construction-differential subsidies to compensate American owners for the excess of the cost of building ships in the United States over the cost of building them abroad, for operating subsidies for ships employed in regular liner routes between the United States and other countries, upon approval of the Maritime Administration, and for exemption from income tax of earnings allocated to special reserves for ship building by companies receiving the operating subsidies.

A large part of the foreign commerce of the United States always has been carried in foreign vessels. During World War II, the services of the merchant ships of our allies were available to us through the operation of an inter-Allied shipping pool. Participation in the carriage of United States foreign commerce is an important source of dollar earnings to the foreign maritime nations.

The Commission recommends that the determination of the active merchant fleet requirements of the United States for the purposes of the Merchant Marine Shipping Act of 1936 take account of the availability of foreign vessels and of the importance to the balance of payments of foreign maritime nations of their dollar earnings from shipping services.

recommends that such requirements be determined by a high-level interdepartmental committee within the United States Government, based on these considerations as well as those enumerated in the act.

The Commission recommends that the statutory provisions requiring the United States vessels for shipments financed by loans or grants from the United States Government and its agencies be repealed and that support sufficient to maintain a merchant marine adequate to our national requirements be provided by direct means, such as those provided for under the Merchant Marine Shipping Act of 1936.

TOURISM

The Commission recommends consideration of means of facilitating issuance of passports and visas to tourists, and close cooperation with foreign governments through our missions abroad to insure ease of entry and adequacy of accommodation for travelers abroad. The duty-free allowance for tourists which, in effect, now amounts to $500 exercisable once every 6 months, should be increased to $1,000. The President should direct the appropriate departments of the Government to encourage promotion of tourism.

CURRENCY CONVERTIBILITY

There have been two schools of thought concerning the restoration of currency convertibility. One school regards the restoration of convertibility as mainly a matter of curbing inflation abroad. It regards the war-induced disturbances in production and trade as temporary phenomena which have now been surmounted. By this reasoning, all that remains for the introduction of convertibility is appropriate monetary-fiscal and exchange rate policies.

Another school of thought regards the problem as much more complicated. While agreeing that the curbing of inflation and the fixing of appropriate exchange rates are essential for convertibility, it argues that such measures may not be enough. It lays emphasis upon the structural, longer run nature of many of the war-induced distortions in production and trade, and upon even deeper seated changes already apparent before the war. Without repeating what was said earlier in this report about the dollar problem, other factors that should be mentioned are the loss of Europe's overseas investments, the rearrangement of the triangular pattern of world trade—as between the United States, Europe, and the nondollar, non-European areas—and particularly the growing predominance of the United States in the world economy, which has intensified the effects abroad of short-run economic fluctuations here, and the longer run disparities in productivity and real income. Because of these structural developments, this school of thought takes a more cautious attitude toward convertibility.

The Commission adheres to this latter view. It recognizes, however, that there is an important difference between establishing outright convertibility of currencies and taking gradual and prudent steps in that direction; and it recognizes also that the general economic conditions prerequisite to currency convertibility are more nearly in prospect today than at any previous time since the war. The Commission believes that the decisions, the methods, the time table, and the responsibility for introducing currency convertibility should rest on the countries concerned. It recognizes, however, that currency convertibility must be examined in the light of the policies pursued by other countries, particularly the United States; and it believes that the recommendations in the preceding sections of this report, if carried out, would encourage and assist foreign countries in removing restrictions on trade and payments as rapidly as prudence permits.

In the light of these considerations, the Commission wishes to make some general observations regarding currency convertibility. The Commission believes that convertible currencies constitute an indispensable condition for the attainment of world-wide multilateral trade and the maintenance of balanced trade in a relatively free market. It would deplore a merely formal convertibility maintained through trade restrictions. It believes that the removal of restrictions upon payment and upon trade should go hand in hand. It favors gradual but positive progress toward currency convertibility. . . .

The Commission does not favor a "dash" for convertibility, or letting the currency "find its own level," since such a method presents the danger of a vicious circle of inflation, and would require larger reserves than may be available to prevent currency depreciation from getting out of hand. It is, however, sympathetic to the concept of a "floating rate," which provides alternative methods of meeting trade and speculative pressures. Whether a country is strong enough, externally and internally, to administer such a system effectively, involves a judgment which only the country in question could itself responsibly make.

The Commission does, however, wish to emphasize its view that a strong internal economy, willing and able to control its money supply and its budget as safeguards against inflation, sufficiently mobile to make the best use of its resources, and able and willing to save in order to increase its productivity and improve its competitive position in world markets, is a prerequisite to convertibility; and that the attainment over time of these conditions should be the guide as to how rapidly full convertibility could safely be approached.

One further important question is the effect of sterling (and other European currency) convertibility upon the European Payments Union. As the matter now stands after more than a year of study by the European Payments Union Managing Board, the Board has been requested by the OEEC Council to report again in March 1954 on the question of compatibility of currency convertibility (particularly sterling) and the continued functioning of the European Payments Union.¹ The Commission's view is that the European Payments Union, by its own testimony, has always been regarded as a temporary mechanism with limited objectives—an intra-European multilateral system of trade and payments (including overseas areas). But the Union has achieved an impressive measure of success—above all, it has shown that freeing trade and freeing payment go hand in hand—and the Commission feels it should not sponsor any measures that might wreck the Union before there is something better to put in its place. This is a problem for the OEEC countries to work out among themselves, provided their solution does not impede the attainment of a global multilateral system of trade and payments.

Last and most important is the question of adequacy of reserves. It must always be borne in mind that sterling is a key currency, i. e., a currency used to finance the trade of third countries. Even now sterling finances about 40 percent of the total trade of the world, and made convertible it would be exposed to trade, financial, and speculative pressures to a far greater extent than any other European currency. This is indeed why, in proper circumstances, we want sterling to become convertible, in the interests of freer trade and payment in a worldwide multilateral system. To the extent that some other of the major trading countries might be able to make their currencies convertible simultaneously with sterling, the pressure upon sterling might be eased. The Commission believes, however, that to restore full confidence in sterling, Britain's reserves must be strengthened.

After serious consideration, and after study of the testimony of highly qualified and closely interested witnesses both here and abroad, the Commission's view is that for the purposes of a gradual and controlled approach to full convertibility (except for special safeguards against capital transfers and the control of previously accumulated balances) adequate reserves could be found through a much more active utilization than heretofore of the International Monetary Fund's holdings of gold and convertible currencies which now amount to $3.3 billion. To this end, the Commission favors also any reasonable relaxations by the Fund that might be required, such as a relaxation of the time schedule for utilization of quotas and the provision for maintaining fixed parities.

As a second means of strengthening foreign reserves and of providing foreign exchange support operations to assist in the gradual attainment of general convertibility, the Commission recommends that the Federal Reserve System explore with foreign central banks the possibilities of standby credits or line of credit arrangements. There is ample precedent for such arrangements in the interwar period; and the Commission believes that this method is superior to any other which might be devised to provide for additional possible calls on dollars, both because it would avoid an increase in the public debt and because it could be handled more flexibly and informally, and therefore more effectively, than a formal grant of credit by our Treasury.

CONCLUSION

In closing this report and in submitting the foregoing conclusions and recommendations to the President and the Congress, the Commission wishes to stress the importance of consistency and continuity with respect to our foreign economic policy. Our position of leadership in the world requires that we make clear to other countries the principles upon which our policy is based, and that thereafter we seek to maintain stability in our policy in order that the mutual confidence so urgently required in the field of international trade may be advanced. This stability requires high level coordination of policy within the executive branch of the Government, and consistency of action within the legislative branch.

4. RECOMMENDATIONS CONCERNING UNITED STATES FOREIGN ECONOMIC POLICY: Message by the President to the Congress, March 30, 1954¹

I submit herewith for the consideration of the Congress recommendations concerning the foreign economic policy of the United States.

Due to the urgency and significance of our problems in this area, I previously recommended, and the Congress approved, the establishment of the Commission on Foreign Economic Policy.² Its membership, consisting of seventeen elected officials and private citizens, was drawn from all parts of the country and represented diverse points of view. The Commission's report,³ prepared in the American tradition of full debate and vigorous dissent, has been carefully reviewed by the various Executive Departments of the Government and forms the basis for the program I submit in this message.

Before the Commission began its deliberations I said to its members, "I commend to you an attitude both realistic and bold. Above all, I urge you to follow one guiding principle: What is best in the national interest."⁴

The national interest in the field of foreign economic policy is clear. It is to obtain, in a manner that is consistent with our national security and profitable and equitable for all, the highest possible level of trade and the most efficient use of capital and resources. That this would also strengthen our military allies adds urgency. Their strength is of critical importance to the security of our country.

Great mutual advantages to buyer and seller, to producer and consumer, to investor and to the community where investment is made, accrue from high levels of trade and investment. They accrue no less in trade from nation to nation than in trade from community to community within a single country. The internal strength of the American economy has evolved from such a system of mutual advantage.

In the press of other problems and in the haste to meet emergencies, this Nation—and many other nations of the free world—have all too often lost sight of this central fact. Worldwide depression and wars, inflation and resultant economic dislocations, have left a sorry heritage: a patchwork of temporary expedients and a host of restrictions, rigidities, interferences, and barriers which seriously inhibit the expansion of international trade. Thus are impeded the very forces which make for increased production, employment, and incomes.

The tasks of repairing the physical damage caused by the catastrophe of war have been substantially achieved. The creation of an adequate system of defense for the free world is well advanced. Most of the countries which suffered the ravages of war have made remarkable headway toward financial stability and increased production. Their own efforts have been greatly aided by our assistance, and yet, despite this recovery, we and other free nations are still severely limited by the persistence of uneconomic, manmade barriers to mutual trade and the flow of funds among us.

Together we and our friends abroad must work at the task of lowering the unjustifiable barriers—not all at once but gradually and with full regard for our own interests. In this effort, the United States must take the initiative and, in doing so, make clear to the rest of the world that we expect them to follow our lead.

Many foreign restrictions have been imposed as a consequence of the so-called "dollar gap." This phrase has become the symbol of the failure of the free world to find a lasting solution to the imbalance of international payments. We should no longer fill it by major grants to enable other nations to secure what they need but cannot buy. Our aim must not be to fill the dollar gap, but rather to help close it. Our best interest dictates that the dollar gap be closed by raising the level of trade and investment.

The United States stands ready and able to produce and sell more than the rest of the world can buy from us. The inability of many foreign countries to buy our goods in the volume we would like to sell does not arise from any lack of desire for these goods. Such is far from the case. Instead it arises out of an inability of these nations to pay—in dollars—for the volume we have to sell.

Dollar grants are no lasting solution to this impasse.

The solution is a higher level of two-way trade. Thus we can sell and receive payment for our exports and have an increasing volume of investment abroad to assist economic development overseas and field returns to us. Greater freedom from restrictions and controls and the increased efficiencies which arise from expanding markets and the freer play of economic forces are essential to the attainment of this higher trade level.

Failure so to move will directly threaten our domestic economy, for it will doom our efforts to find ways by which others, through their own efforts, can buy our goods. The only practicable alternative is to reduce exports. Our farms would have to sell less, since the products of 40 million acres, amounting to 10 to 12 percent of our agriculture, would have to find their market outside our own country. Moreover, if their export markets were curtailed, American factories now selling their products throughout the world would have to reduce employment. It is a very important fact that over 4 million American workers depend on international trade for their employment.

Beyond our economic interest, the solidarity of the free world and the capacity of the free world to deal with those who would destroy it are threatened by continued unbalanced trade relationships—the inability of nations to sell as much as they desire to buy. By moving boldly to correct the present imbalance, we shall support and increase the level of our exports of both manufactured and agricultural products. We shall, at the same time, increase the economic strength of our allies. Thus shall we enhance our own military security by strengthening our friends abroad. Thus shall we assure those sources of imports that supplement our domestic production and are vital to our defense. Thus shall we raise our standard of living and aid in the development of a better world for all of us and our children.

TARIFFS

I am convinced that the gradual and selective revision of our tariffs, through the tested method of negotiation with other nations, is an essential ingredient of the continuing growth of our domestic economy. An expression of our willingness to negotiate further will offer needed leadership toward the reduction of trade and payments barriers that limit markets for our goods throughout the world.

The Commission on Foreign Economic Policy recommended a three-year extension of the Trade Agreements Act with amendments to authorize:

- a. Reduction, pursuant to trade agreement negotiation, of existing tariff rates on commodities selected for such negotiations by not more than 5 percent of present rates in each of the 3 years of the new act;
- b. Reduction, by not more than one-half over a 3-year period, of tariffs in effect on January 1, 1945, on products which are not being imported or which are being imported only in negligible volume; and
- c. Reduction, over a 3-year period, pursuant to trade agreement negotiation, to 50 percent ad valorem, or its equivalent, of any rate in excess of 50 percent ad valorem, or its equivalent.

I have approved these recommendations of the Commission and urge their adoption by the Congress.¹ I may also recommend special provisions for negotiation with Japan in view of the economic problems of that country.²

² See the announcement by the Department of State concerning special trade negotiations with Japan, Nov. 12, 1954; Department of State Bulletin, Nov. 22, 1954, pp. 767-771.

The foregoing authority does not contemplate across-the-board tariff reductions. The peril point and escape clause procedures would, of course, be preserved, and the three proposed types of rate reduction would not be cumulative. Tariff reductions would be made selectively on specific commodities, and only after notice and hearings in accordance with past practice. This would represent our part in the gradual and careful approach to the whole problem of improved trade which the world so urgently needs. No sudden, sharp, or widespread adjustments within our economy would be involved.

These escape clause and peril point provisions of our tariff legislation are designed to mitigate injury to our domestic producers from tariff reductions. Whenever recourse is had to these provisions, I shall carefully consider the findings and recommendations of the Tariff Commission. My responsibilities for the welfare of the Nation require that I continue to base my decisions at times on broader grounds than the Tariff Commission is empowered to consider. The Commission on Foreign Economic Policy supports this position.

I have approved the Commission's recommendations that the United States withhold reductions in tariffs on products made by workers receiving wages which are substandard in the exporting country. This policy shall be placed in effect. I have also approved the Commission's recommendations concerning raising of labor standards through consultative procedures and cooperation in international conferences such as those sponsored by the International Labor Organization.

These recommendations for renewal and amendment of the Trade Agreements Act are based on the plain truth that if we wish to sell abroad we must buy abroad.

THE GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Since 1948, virtually all the major trading nations of the world, including the United States, have become parties to a General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. This agreement has been the principal arrangement by which we in the United States have sought to carry out the provisions and purposes of the Trade Agreements Act.

The Commission on Foreign Economic Policy has recommended that the United States renegotiate the organizational provisions of the agreement,¹ so that the contracting parties acting collectively would confine their functions to sponsoring multilateral trade negotiations, recommending broad trade policies for individual consideration by the legislative or other appropriate authorities in the various countries, and providing a forum for consultation regarding trade disputes.

I shall act promptly upon this recommendation. At the same time, I shall suggest to other contracting parties revisions of the substantive provisions of the agreement to provide a simpler, stronger instrument contributing more effectively to the development of a workable system of world trade.¹ When the organizational provisions of the agreement have been renegotiated, they will be submitted to the Congress for its approval.²

CUSTOMS ADMINISTRATION AND PROCEDURE

The problems of tariff classification, of proper valuation of imported articles and of procedures for administering the customs are complex and perplexing. Over the years these problems have grown to the point where they now constitute an unwarranted and unintended burden on trade.

The United States may be no worse in this regard than many other nations, but good business practice alone is sufficient to require:

- a. Simplification of commodity definitions, classifications, and rate structure;
- b. Improvement in the methods of valuation of imports; and
- c. Establishment of more efficient procedures for customs administration.

To this end I shall propose legislation providing for the simplification of the commodity definitions and rate structures in the Tariff Act, after a study by the Tariff Commission, and subject to appropriate standards to be established by the Congress. Such legislation should also provide for a better method of classification of articles not enumerated in the tariff schedules, and for such improvement in the statutes governing the administration of customs procedures as can be made at this time. In this connection I am directing the Department of the Treasury to keep customs procedures under continuous review and to report to the Congress annually on the difficulties and delays in processing goods through Customs, together with recommendations for action to eliminate such obstructions. I further recommend that the antidumping law and procedures under it be changed so far as necessary to permit speedier and more efficient disposal of cases and to prevent undue interference with trade during investigation of suspected dumping.

To provide an improved basis for customs valuations I urge adoption of the Treasury's valuation proposals. These are embodied in H. R. 6584, which has already been passed by the House of Representatives.³

UNITED STATES INVESTMENT ABROAD

An increased flow of United States investment abroad could contribute significantly to the needed expansion of international trade. It also could help maintain a high level of economic activity and employment in the United States. Further, such investment contributes to the development abroad of primary resources needed to meet our own ever-increasing needs even while it helps to strengthen the economies of foreign countries. In view of the great importance of private investment to our foreign economic policy, I emphasize the necessity for passage of the administration tax bill¹ already recommended to you and already advanced in your considerations which provides for:

¹ See the President's letter to the chairman of the United States delegation to the Ninth Session of the Contracting Parties to GATT; Department of State Bulletin, Nov. 22, 1954, p. 774.

³ Measure did not reach Senate floor.

- a. Taxation of business income from foreign subsidiaries or from segregated foreign branches which operate and elect to be taxed as subsidiaries at a rate 14 percentage points lower than the regular corporate rate;
- b. Broadening the definition of foreign taxes which may be credited against the United States income tax to include any tax, which is the principal form of taxation on business in a country, except turnover, general sales taxes or excise, and social security taxes;
- c. Removing of the overall limitation on foreign tax credits; and
- d. Permitting regulated investment companies concentrating on foreign investment to pass on to their stockholders the credit for foreign taxes which would be available on direct investment.

Further to encourage the flow of private investment abroad, we shall give full diplomatic support, through our activities here and through our missions and representatives in the field, to the acceptance and understanding by other nations of the prerequisites for the attraction of private foreign investment. We shall continue to use the treaty approach to establish common rules for the fair treatment of foreign investment.

In connection with legislation authorizing the mutual security program, I suggest that the Congress consider the desirability of broadening the existing authority to guarantee against losses on new investment abroad, so as to cover losses caused by war, revolution, and insurrection.²

The Commission has pointed out that uncertainty as to the application of United States antitrust laws to the operations of American firms abroad is a deterrent to foreign investment. It recommended that our antitrust laws be restated in a manner which would clearly acknowledge the right of each country to regulate trade within its own borders. At the same time, the Commission insisted that it should be made clear that foreign laws or established business practices which encourage restrictive price, production, or marketing arrangements will limit the willingness of United States businessmen to invest abroad and will reduce the benefits of such investment to the economies of the host countries.

I have requested the Department of Justice to consider this recommendation in connection with its current study of the antitrust laws.

BUY AMERICAN LEGISLATION

At present certain of our laws require that, in specified Federal or federally financed procurement, preference be given to domestic firms over foreign bidders. Except where considerations of national security, persistent and substantial unemployment, or encouragement of small business require otherwise, I agree with the Commission that it is improper policy, unbusinesslike procedure, and unfair to the taxpayer for the Government to pay a premium on its purchases.

I request, therefore, that legislative authority be provided to exempt from the provisions of this legislation the bidders from nations that treat our bidders on an equal basis with their own nationals.¹ Meanwhile, the executive branch is clarifying the application of these preference principles to Government procurement. It will limit the price differential favoring domestic producers over foreign bidders to a reasonable percent, dependent upon the circumstances over and above whatever tariffs may apply.² Discretionary authority, however, must be continued to permit special consideration in Government procurement for the requirements of national security, for the problems of small business, and of areas where persistent and substantial unemployment exists.

RAW MATERIALS

This country is blessed with abundant mineral resources, but we must make the most of them if we are to satisfy the ever-increasing appetite of an expanding economy and at the same time maintain an adequate defense posture. We must recognize, however, that it is not possible for this Nation, or any other nation, to produce enough of every metal and mineral needed by modern industry. These materials are not evenly distributed throughout the world. We have to depend on one another. Our foreign economic policies, therefore, must encourage the relatively easy flow of these materials in international trade.

The Commission has made two sets of recommendations which I believe will materially assist in achieving an orderly expansion of mineral production both here and abroad.

The first is that the United States Government should make a constructive contribution toward greater stability of world prices of raw materials by moderating or relaxing impediments to international trade, by encouraging diversification of foreign economies, by avoiding procurement practices which disturb world prices, by consultation with other nations, and by tempering the fluctuations in our own economy.

The second calls for increased encouragement of investment in overseas production by our citizens and the nationals of other countries. I heartily endorse these recommendations.

The Commission also recommended that domestic sources for raw materials required for military purposes should be assured by direct means and not by tariffs and import quotas. I believe that normally this is sound.

However, I have appointed a special Cabinet committee which is now surveying the whole field of our minerals policy and have drawn their attention to these recommendations.¹

AGRICULTURE

Perhaps no sector of our economy has a greater stake in foreign trade than American agriculture. In recent years, for example, one-third of our wheat, forty percent of our cotton and rice, and one-fourth of our tobacco and soybeans have been exported. It is highly important to maintain foreign markets for our agricultural products.

Any program designed to serve the interests of American agriculture must take due account of the necessity for export markets. Put in the words of the Commission, "It is necessary to harmonize our agricultural and foreign economic policies without sacrificing the sound objectives of either." I am convinced such reconciliation is possible. Acceptance of the recommendations in my agricultural message of January 11 will, I feel certain, help accomplish this objective.²

MERCHANT MARINE

With respect to our ocean shipping, we must have a merchant marine adequate to our defense requirements. I subscribe to the principle that such support of our merchant fleet as is required for that purpose should be provided by direct means to the greatest possible extent. Such a policy, however, requires a careful analysis of the means available for providing direct support, its possible effects on foreign flag vessel carryings, and its total costs before a specific program can be recommended.

The Department of Commerce has already studied this problem at length. Its findings will be further reviewed within the Executive Branch in order to develop specific recommendations to transmit to the next session of the Congress, in addition to the proposals submitted by the Executive Branch that are now before the Congress.³

INTERNATIONAL TRAVEL

International travel has cultural and social importance in the free world. It also has economic significance. Foreign travel by Americans is a substantial source of dollars for many countries, enabling them to pay for what we sell them.

¹ The Cabinet Committee on Mineral Policy was appointed, Oct. 26, 1953. Its membership consisted of the Secretary of the Interior (Chairman), the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget served as consultants. The committee submitted its final report to the President, Dec. 1, 1954. For a summary of its findings, see the Department of State Bulletin, Dec. 27, 1954, pp. 988-990.

³ See the two amendments to the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 (PL 664 and PL 781, 83d Cong., 2d sess., Aug. 26 and Sept. 3, 1954; 68 Stat. 832 and 1267).

While the promotion of tourism is primarily a responsibility of the countries which welcome visitors, and is a function for private enterprise, there are some specific governmental actions which can be helpful. For example, there is H.R. 8352¹ which increases the duty-free allowance for tourists from $500 to $1,000, exercisable every 6 months. I recommend its passage. From time to time I may have other recommendations for legislative action to stimulate travel.

Meanwhile, in the executive branch, I shall instruct the appropriate agencies and departments, at home and abroad, to consider how they can facilitate international travel. They will be asked to take action to simplify governmental procedures relating to customs, visas, passports, exchange or monetary restrictions and other regulations that sometimes harass the traveler.

ECONOMIC AID AND TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

Assistance extended in the past by the United States to other free nations has played an effective part in strengthening the national security, developing important resources, and opening up significant opportunities, for ourselves and for others. It has also carried with it, in many instances, particularly in technical cooperation and famine relief, a deep humanitarian response by our people. However, economic aid cannot be continued indefinitely. We must distinguish between an emergency and a chronic malady, between a special case and a general rule.

I subscribe, therefore, to the principle that economic aid on a grant basis should be terminated as soon as possible consistent with our national interest. In cases where support is needed to establish and equip military forces of other governments in the interest of our mutual defense, and where this is beyond the economic capacity of another country, our aid should be in the form of grants. As recognized by the Commission, there may be some cases in which modest amounts of grant aid to underdeveloped countries will importantly serve the interest of security. I further agree that in other situations where the interest of the United States requires that dollars not otherwise available to a country should be provided, such support to the maximum extent appropriate should be in the form of loans rather than grants.

In extending such loans, we must be careful not to interfere with the normal lending activities and standards of the Export-Import Bank. The International Bank is the primary institution for the public financing of economic development. The Export-Import Bank will consider on their merits applications for the financing of development projects, which are not being made by the International Bank, and which are in the special interest of the United States, are economically sound, are within the capacity of the prospective borrower to repay and within the prudent loaning capacity of the bank.

I approve the recommendations of the Commission on Foreign Economic Policy that the United States participation in technical operation programs should be pressed forward vigorously. Such programs should concentrate on providing experts and know-how rather than large funds or shipments of goods except for necessary demonstration equipment. They should not provide capital for investment but should be so administered as to fit into the programs development of the assisted countries and they should be related to any private or public investment likely to be forthcoming.

Review of the requirements for the Mutual Security Program has been conducted with these principles in mind and substantial reductions in grant aid have been made by this administration. The legislation which I shall later propose for the Mutual Security Program will reflect these principles.¹

In viewing the problems of other nations of the free world, we are forced to recognize that the economies of some of them have been weakened by the disruption of the broad historic pattern of trade between East and West.

Curtailement of our aid programs will increase the pressures for resumption of such trade. A greater exchange of peaceful goods between East and West—that is, goods not covered by the Battle Act² nor otherwise considered strategic—so far as it can be achieved without jeopardizing national security, and subject to our embargo on Communist China and North Korea,³ should not cause us undue concern. I shall, of course, take appropriate action to ensure that our security is fully safeguarded.

CURRENCY CONVERTIBILITY

The Commission rightly regards positive progress toward currency convertibility as an indispensable condition for a freer and healthier international trade. Steps toward enabling holders of foreign currencies to convert them freely into other currencies deserve our encouragement.

The Commission has correctly observed that the initiative and responsibility for introducing currency convertibility must rest with the countries concerned. I am happy to say that such initiative is being taken. The British and other members of the Commonwealth Nations have met twice, in London and in Sydney, to consider plans for convertibility of the pound sterling.⁴ The United Kingdom and other important nations of Europe have discussed their aims with us. Individually they are taking constructive steps affecting their own currencies. In addition, discussions among them which are now under way in connection with the renewal of the European Payments Union ¹ are being largely influenced by their desire to prepare the way for convertibility.

I have approved the Commission's recommendations for cooperation in strengthening the gold and dollar reserves of countries which have prepared themselves for convertibility by sound internal and external policies. These recommendations do not call for new action by the Congress. Authority and procedures for this purpose already exist. The United States will support the use of the resources of the International Monetary Fund as a bulwark to strengthen the currencies of countries which undertake convertibility. In addition, a study is now being made, as suggested by the Commission, of the possibility of standby credits from the Federal Reserve System.

CONCLUSION

What I have outlined to you is a minimum program which should be judged as a whole. Its various parts are interrelated; each requires the other.

Conceived as a whole, this program consists of four major parts:

- Aid—which we wish to curtail;
- Investment—which we wish to encourage;
- Convertibility—which we wish to facilitate; and
- Trade—which we wish to expand.

I consider it essential that we achieve each of these objectives, which we must clearly understand are closely interlocked: As we curtail our aid, we must help to close the dollar gap by expanding our foreign investment and trade. This expansion will be facilitated by a return to convertibility of foreign currencies. The return by our friends abroad to convertibility will be encouraged if our trade policy leads them to expect expansion of our foreign trade and investment.

Unless we are prepared to adopt the policies I have recommended to expand export and import trade and increase the flow of our capital into foreign investment, our friends abroad may be discouraged in their effort to reestablish a free market for their currencies. If we fail in our trade policy, we may fail in all. Our domestic employment, our standard of living, our security, and the solidarity of the free world—all are involved.

For our own economic growth we must have continuously expanding world markets; for our security we require that our allies become economically strong. Expanding trade is the only adequate solution for these two pressing problems confronting our country.

AN ACT To increase the consumption of United States agricultural commodities in foreign countries, to improve the foreign relations of the United States, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954."

SEC. 2. It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to expand international trade among the United States and friendly nations, to facilitate the convertibility of currency, to promote the economic stability of American agriculture and the national welfare, to make maximum efficient use of surplus agricultural commodities in furtherance of the foreign policy of the United States, and to stimulate and facilitate the expansion of foreign trade in agricultural commodities produced in the United States by providing a means whereby surplus agricultural commodities in excess of the usual marketings of such commodities may be sold through private trade channels, and foreign currencies accepted in payment therefor. It is further the policy to use foreign currencies which accrue to the United States under this Act to expand international trade, to encourage economic development, to purchase strategic materials, to pay United States obligations abroad, to promote collective strength, and to foster in other ways the foreign policy of the United States.

TITLE I—SALES FOR FOREIGN CURRENCY

SEC. 101.⁴ In furtherance of this policy, the President is authorized to negotiate and carry out agreements with friendly nations or organizations of friendly nations to provide for the sale of surplus agricultural commodities for foreign currencies. In negotiating such agreements the President shall—

(a) take reasonable precautions to safeguard usual marketings of the United States and to assure that sales under this Act will not unduly disrupt world prices of agricultural commodities;

(b) take appropriate steps to assure that private trade channels are used to the maximum extent practicable both with respect to sales from privately owned stocks and from stocks owned by the Commodity Credit Corporation;

(c) give special consideration to utilizing the authority and funds provided by this Act, in order to develop and expand continuous market demand abroad for agricultural commodities, with appropriate emphasis on underdeveloped and new market areas;

(d) seek and secure commitments from participating countries that will prevent resale or transshipment to other countries, or use for other than domestic purposes, of surplus agricultural commodities purchased under this Act, without specific approval of the President; and

(e) afford any friendly nation the maximum opportunity to purchase surplus agricultural commodities from the United States, taking into consideration the opportunities to achieve the declared policy of this Act and to make effective use of the foreign currencies received to carry out the purposes of this Act.

SEC. 102. (a) For the purpose of carrying out agreements concluded by the President hereunder, the Commodity Credit Corporation, in accordance with regulations issued by the President pursuant to subsection (b) of this section, (1) shall make available for sale hereunder to domestic exporters surplus agricultural commodities heretofore or hereafter acquired by the Corporation in the administration of its price-support operations, and (2) shall make funds available to finance the sale and exportation of surplus agricultural commodities, whether from private stocks or from stocks of the Commodity Credit Corporation. In supplying such commodities to exporters under this subsection the Commodity Credit Corporation shall not be subject to the sales price restrictions in section 407 of the Agricultural Act of 1949,¹ as amended. The commodity set-aside established for any commodity under section 101 of the Agricultural Act of 1954 (68 Stat. 897) shall be reduced by a quantity equal to the quantity of such commodity financed hereunder which is exported from private stocks.²

(b) In order to facilitate and maximize the use of private channels of trade in carrying out agreements entered into pursuant to this Act,

² This subsection was revised by PL 25, 84th Cong., 1st sess. (69 Stat. 44), approved Apr. 25, 1955. It formerly read as follows:

"For the purpose of carrying out agreements concluded by the President hereunder, the Commodity Credit Corporation, in accordance with regulations issued by the President pursuant to subsection (b) of this section, (1) shall make available for sale hereunder at such points in the United States as the President may direct surplus agricultural commodities heretofore or hereafter acquired by the Corporation in the administration of its price support operations, and (2) shall make funds available to finance the sale and exportation of surplus agricultural commodities from stocks owned by the Corporation or pledged or mortgaged as security for price support loans or from stocks privately owned if the Corporation is not in a position to supply the commodity from its owned stocks: Provided, That to facilitate the use of private trade channels the Corporation, even though it is in a position to supply the commodity, may finance the sale and exportation of privately owned stocks if the Corporation's stocks are reduced through arrangements whereby the private exporter acquires the same commodity of comparable value or quantity from the Commodity Credit Corporation. In supplying commodities to private exporters under such arrangements Commodity Credit Corporation shall not be subject to the sales price restriction in section 407 of the Agricultural Act of 1949, as amended."

the President may, under such regulations and subject to such safeguards as he deems appropriate, provide for the issuance of letters of commitment against funds or guarantees of funds supplied by the Commodity Credit Corporation and for this purpose accounts may be established on the books of any department, agency, or establishment of the Government, or on terms and conditions approved by the Secretary of the Treasury in banking institutions in the United States. Such letters of commitment, when issued, shall constitute obligations of the United States and moneys due or to become due thereunder shall be assignable under the Assignment of Claims Act of 1940.¹ Expenditures of funds which have been made available through accounts so established shall be accounted for on standard documentation required for expenditures of Government funds.

SEC. 103. (a) For the purpose of making payment to the Commodity Credit Corporation to the extent the Commodity Credit Corporation is not reimbursed under section 105 for commodities disposed of and costs incurred under titles I and II of this Act, there are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as are equal to (1) the Corporation's investment in commodities made available for export under this title and title II of this Act, including processing, packaging, transportation, and handling costs, and (2) all costs incurred by the Corporation in making funds available to finance the exportation of surplus agricultural commodities pursuant to this title. Any funds or other assets available to the Commodity Credit Corporation may be used in advance of such appropriation or payments, for carrying out the purposes of this Act.

(b) Transactions shall not be carried out under this title which will call for appropriations to reimburse the Commodity Credit Corporation, pursuant to subsection (a) of this section, in amounts in excess of $1,500,000,000. This limitation shall not be apportioned by year or by country, but shall be considered as an objective as well as a limitation, to be reached as rapidly as possible so long as the purposes of this Act can be achieved within the safeguards established.²

SEC. 104. Notwithstanding section 1415 of the Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1953, or any other provision of law, the President may use or enter into agreements with friendly nations or organizations of nations to use the foreign currencies which accrue under this title for one or more of the following purposes:

(a) To help develop new markets for United States agricultural commodities on a mutually benefiting basis;

(b) To purchase or contract to purchase strategic and critical materials, within the applicable terms of the Strategic and Critical Materials Stockpile Act,³ for a supplemental United States stockpile of such materials as the President may determine from time to time under contracts, including advance payment contracts, for supply extending over periods up to ten years. All strategic and

Materials so acquired shall be released from the supplemental stockpile only under the provisions of section 3 of the Strategic and Critical Materials Stockpile Act;

(c) To procure military equipment, materials, facilities, and services for the common defense;

(d) For financing the purchase of goods or services for other friendly countries;

(e) For promoting balanced economic development and trade among nations;

(f) To pay United States obligations abroad;

(g) For loans to promote multilateral trade and economic development, made through established banking facilities of the friendly nation from which the foreign currency was obtained or in any other manner which the President may deem to be appropriate. Strategic materials, services, or foreign currencies may be accepted in payment of such loans;

(h) For the financing of international educational exchange activities under the programs authorized by section 32 (b) (2) of the Surplus Property Act of 1944,¹ as amended (50 U. S. C. App. 1641 (b)).

Provided, however, That section 1415 of the Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1953,² shall apply to all foreign currencies used for grants under subsections (d) and (e) and for payment of United States obligations involving grants under subsection (f) and to not less than 10 per centum of the foreign currencies which accrue under this title:

Provided, however, That the President is authorized to waive such applicability of section 1415 in any case where he determines that it would be inappropriate or inconsistent with the purposes of this title.

SEC. 105. Foreign currencies received pursuant to this title shall be deposited in a special account to the credit of the United States and shall be used only pursuant to section 104 of this title, and any department or agency of the government using any of such currencies for a purpose for which funds have been appropriated shall reimburse the Commodity Credit Corporation in an amount equivalent to the dollar value of the currencies used.

SEC. 106. As used in this Act, "surplus agricultural commodity" shall mean any agricultural commodity or product thereof, class, kind, type, or other specification thereof, produced in the United States, either privately or publicly owned, which is or may be reasonably expected to be in excess of domestic requirements, adequate carryover, and anticipated exports for dollars, as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture is also authorized to determine the nations with whom agreements shall be negotiated, and to determine the commodities and quantities thereof which may be cluded in the negotiations with each country after advising with her agencies of Government affected and within broad policies laid down by the President for implementing this Act.¹

SEC. 107. As used in this Act, "friendly nation" means any country other than (1) the U. S. S. R., or (2) any nation or area dominated or controlled by the foreign government or foreign organization controlling the world Communist movement.

SEC. 108. The President shall make a report to Congress with respect to the activities carried on under this Act at least once each six months and at such other times as may be appropriate and such reports shall include the dollar value, at the exchange rates in effect at the time of the sale, of the foreign currency for which commodities exported pursuant to section 102 (a) hereof are sold.

SEC. 109. No transactions shall be undertaken under authority of this title after June 30, 1957, except as required pursuant to agreements heretofore entered into pursuant to this title.

TITLE II—FAMINE RELIEF AND OTHER ASSISTANCE

SEC. 201. In order to enable the President to furnish emergency assistance on behalf of the people of the United States to friendly peoples in meeting famine or other urgent relief requirements, the Commodity Credit Corporation shall make available to the President out of its stocks such surplus agricultural commodities (as defined in section 106 of title I) from U. S. S. R. vessels in United States ports, as he may request, for transfer (1) to any nation friendly to the United States in order to meet famine or other urgent relief requirements of such nation, and (2) to friendly but needy populations without regard to the friendliness of their government.

SEC. 202. The President may authorize the transfer on a grant basis of surplus agricultural commodities from Commodity Credit Corporation stocks to assist programs undertaken with friendly governments or through voluntary relief agencies: Provided, That the President shall take reasonable precaution that such transfers will not displace or interfere with sales which might otherwise be made.

SEC. 203. Not more than $300,000,000 (including the Corporation's investment in the commodities) shall be expended for all transfers, including delivery on board vessels in United States ports, under this title. The President may make such transfers through such agencies including intergovernmental organizations, in such manner, and upon such terms and conditions as he deems appropriate; he shall make use of the facilities of voluntary relief agencies to the extent practicable.

SEC. 204. No programs of assistance shall be undertaken under the authority of this title after June 30, 1957.

TITLE III—GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 301. Section 407 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Notwithstanding the foregoing, the Corporation, on such terms and conditions as the Secretary may deem in the public interest, shall make available any farm commodity or product thereof owned or controlled by it for use in relieving distress (1) in any area in the United States declared by the President to be an acute distress area because of unemployment or other economic cause if the President finds that such use will not displace or interfere with normal marketing of agricultural commodities and (2) in connection with any major disaster determined by the President to warrant assistance by the Federal Government under Public Law 875, Eighty-first Congress,¹ as amended (42 U. S. C. 1855). Except on a reimbursable basis, the Corporation shall not bear any costs in connection with making such commodity available beyond the cost of the commodities to the Corporation in store and the handling and transportation costs in making delivery of the commodity to designated agencies at one or more central locations in each State."

SEC. 302. Section 416 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 416. In order to prevent the waste of commodities acquired through price-support operations by the Commodity Credit Corporation before they can be disposed of in normal domestic channels without impairment of the price-support program or sold abroad at competitive world prices, the Commodity Credit Corporation is authorized, on such terms and under such regulations as the Secretary may deem in the public interest: (1) upon application, to make such commodities available to any Federal agency for use in making payment for commodities not produced in the United States; (2) to barter or exchange such commodities for strategic or other materials as authorized by law; (3) in the case of food commodities to donate such commodities to the Bureau of Indian Affairs and to such State, Federal, or private agency or agencies as may be designated by the proper State or Federal authority and approved by the Secretary, for use in the United States in nonprofit school-lunch programs, in the assistance of needy persons, and in charitable institutions, including hospitals, to the extent that needy persons are served; and (4) to donate any such food commodities in excess of anticipated disposition under (1), (2), and (3) above to nonprofit voluntary agencies registered with the Committee on Voluntary Foreign Aid of the Foreign Operations Administration or other appropriate department or agency of the Federal Government and intergovernmental organizations for use in the assistance of needy persons outside the United States. In the case of (3) and (4) above the Secretary shall obtain such assurance as he deems necessary that the recipients thereof will not diminish their normal expenditures for food by reason of such donation. In order to facilitate the appropriate disposal of such commodities, the Secretary may from time to time estimate and announce the quantity of such commodities which he anticipates will become available for distribution under (3) and (4) above. The Commodity Credit Corporation may pay, with respect to commodities disposed of under this section, reprocessing, packaging, transporting, handling, and other charges accruing up to the time of their delivery to a Federal agency or to the designated State or private agency, in the case of commodities made available for use within the United States, or their delivery free alongside ship or free on board export carrier at point of export, in the case of commodities made available for use outside the United States. For the purpose of this section the terms 'State' and 'United States' include the District of Columbia and any Territory or possession of the United States."

SEC. 303. Whenever the Secretary has reason to believe that, in addition to other authorized methods and means of disposing of agricultural commodities owned by the Commodity Credit Corporation, there may be opportunity to protect the funds and assets of the Commodity Credit Corporation by barter or exchange of such agricultural commodities for (a) strategic materials entailing less risk of loss through deterioration or substantially less storage charges, or (b) materials, goods or equipment required in connection with foreign economic and military aid and assistance programs, or (c) materials or equipment required in substantial quantities for offshore construction programs, he is hereby directed to use every practicable means, in cooperation with other Government agencies, to arrange and make, through private trade channels, such barter or exchanges or to utilize the authority conferred on him by section 4 (h) of the Commodity Credit Corporation Charter Act,¹ as amended, to make such barter or exchanges. Agencies of the United States Government procuring such materials, goods or equipment are hereby directed to cooperate with the Secretary in the disposal of surplus agricultural commodities by means of barter or exchange. Strategic materials so acquired by the Commodity Credit Corporation shall be considered as assets of the Corporation and other agencies of the Government, in purchasing strategic materials, shall purchase such materials from Commodity Credit Corporation inventories to the extent available in fulfillment of their requirements. The Secretary is also directed to assist, through such means as are available to him, farmers' cooperatives in effecting exchange of agricultural commodities in their possession for strategic materials.

SEC. 304. The President shall exercise the authority contained herein (1) to assist friendly nations to be independent of trade with the U. S. S. R. or nations dominated or controlled by the U. S. S. R. for food, raw materials and markets, and (2) to assure that agricultural commodities sold or transferred hereunder do not result in increased availability of those or like commodities to unfriendly nations.

SEC. 305. All Commodity Credit Corporation stocks disposed of under title II of this Act and section 416 of the Agricultural Act of 1949, as amended,² shall be clearly identified by, as far as practical, appropriate marking on each package or container as being furnished by the people of the United States of America.

6. FOREIGN ECONOMIC POLICY: Message by the President to the Congress, January 10, 1955¹

The Nation's enlightened self-interest and sense of responsibility as a leader among the free nations require a foreign economic program that will stimulate economic growth in the free world through enlarging opportunities for the fuller operation of the forces of free enterprise and competitive markets. Our own self-interest requires such a program because (1) economic strength among our allies is essential to our security; (2) economic growth in underdeveloped areas is necessary to lessen international instability growing out of the vulnerability of such areas to Communist penetration and subversion; and (3) an increasing volume of world production and trade will help assure our own economic growth and a rising standard of living among our own people.

In the worldwide struggle between the forces of freedom and those of communism, we have wisely recognized that the security of each nation in the free world is dependent upon the security of all other nations in the free world. The measure of that security in turn is dependent upon the economic strength of all free nations, for without economic strength they cannot support the military establishments that are necessary to deter Communist armed aggression. Economic strength is indispensable, as well, in securing themselves against internal Communist subversion.

For every country in the free world, economic strength is dependent upon high levels of economic activity internally and high levels of international trade. No nation can be economically self-sufficient. Nations must buy from other nations, and in order to pay for what they buy they must sell. It is essential for the security of the United States and the rest of the free world that the United States take the leadership in promoting the achievement of those high levels of trade that will bring to all the economic strength upon which the freedom and security of all depends. Those high levels of trade can be promoted by the specific measures with respect to trade barriers recommended in this message, by the greater flow of capital among nations of the free world, by convertibility of currencies, by an expanded interchange of technical counsel, and by an increase in international travel.

From the military standpoint, our national strength has been augmented by the overall military alliance of the nations constituting the free world. This free-world alliance will be most firmly cemented when its association is based on flourishing mutual trade as well as common ideals, interests, and aspirations. Mutually advantageous trade relationships are not only profitable, but they are also more binding and more enduring than costly grants and other forms of aid.

Today numerous uneconomic, man-made barriers to mutually advantageous trade and the flow of investment are preventing the nations of the free world from achieving their full economic potential. International trade and investment are not making their full contribution to production, employment, and income. Over a large area of the world currencies are not yet convertible.

We and our friends abroad must together undertake the lowering of the unjustifiable barriers to trade and investment, and we must do it on a mutual basis so that the benefits may be shared by all.

Such action will add strength to our own domestic economy and help assure a rising standard of living among our people by opening new markets for our farms and factories and mines.

The program that I am here recommending is moderate, gradual, and reciprocal. Radical or sudden tariff reductions would not be to the interest of the United States and would not accomplish the goal we seek. A moderate program, however, can add immeasurably to the security and well-being of the United States and the rest of the free world.

TRADE AGREEMENT AUTHORITY

I request a 3-year extension of Presidential authority to negotiate tariff reductions with other nations on a gradual, selective, and reciprocal basis.¹ This authority would permit negotiations for reductions in those barriers that now limit the markets for our goods throughout the world. I shall ask all nations with whom we trade to take similar steps in their relations with each other.

The 3-year extension of the Trade Agreements Act should authorize, subject to the present peril and escape clause provisions:

1. Reduction, through multilateral and reciprocal negotiations, of tariff rates on selected commodities by not more than 5 percent per year for 3 years;

2. Reduction, through multilateral and reciprocal negotiations, of any tariff rates in excess of 50 percent to that level over a 3-year period; and

3. Reduction, by not more than one-half over a 3-year period, of tariff rates in effect on January 1, 1945, on articles which are not now being imported or which are being imported only in negligible quantities.

THE GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

For approximately 7 years the United States has cooperated with all the major trading nations of the free world in an effort to reduce trade barriers. The instrument of cooperation is the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. Through this agreement the United States has sought to carry out the provisions and purpose of the Trade Agreements Act.

The United States and 33 other trading countries are now reviewing the provisions of the agreement for the purpose of making it a simpler and more effective instrument for the development of a sound system of world trade. When the current negotiations on the revision of the organizational provisions of the General Agreement are satisfactorily completed, the results will be submitted to the Congress for its approval.¹

CUSTOMS ADMINISTRATION AND PROCEDURE

Considerable progress has been made in freeing imports from unnecessary customs administrative burdens. Still more, however, needs to be done in the three areas I mentioned in my message last year: (1) the simplification of commodity definitions, classification, and rate structures; (2) improvement in standards for the valuation of imports; and (3) further improvement of procedures for customs administration.

An important step toward simplification of the tariff structure was taken by the Congress last year with the passage of the Customs Simplification Act, which directs the Tariff Commission to study the difficulties of commodity classification of imports. The interim report of the Tariff Commission to be made by next March 15 should help enable the Congress to determine whether further legislative steps should then be taken or should await submission of the final report.

The uncertainties and confusion arising from the complex system of valuation on imported articles cause unwarranted delays in the determination of customs duties. I urge the Congress to give favorable consideration to legislation² for remedying this situation.

The improvement of customs administration requires continuous effort, as the Congress recognized by enacting the Customs Simplification Acts of 1953 and 1954. The Treasury Department in its annual report to the Congress will review the remaining reasons for delay or difficulty in processing imported articles through customs and will propose still further technical amendments to simplify customs procedures.

UNITED STATES INVESTMENT ABROAD

The whole free world needs capital; America is its largest source. In that light, the flow of capital abroad from our country must be stimulated and in such a manner that it results in investment largely by individuals or private enterprises rather than by government.

An increased flow of United States private investment funds abroad, especially to the underdeveloped areas, could contribute much to the expansion of two-way international trade. The underdeveloped countries would thus be enabled more easily to acquire the capital equipment so badly needed by them to achieve sound economic growth and higher living standards. This would do much to offset the false but alluring promises of the Communists.

To facilitate the investment of capital abroad, I recommend enactment of legislation providing for taxation of business income from foreign subsidiaries or branches at a rate 14 percentage points lower than the corporate rate on domestic income, and a deferral of tax on income of foreign branches until it is removed from the country where it is earned.¹

² H. Res. 6040 passed the House of Representatives during the 84th Cong., 1st sess. Not enacted.

I propose also to explore the further use of tax treaties with the possible recognition of tax concessions made to foreign capital by other countries. Under proper safeguards, credit could be given for foreign income taxes which are waived for an initial limited period, as we now grant credit for taxes which are imposed. This would give maximum effectiveness to foreign tax laws designed to encourage new enterprises.

As a further step to stimulate investment abroad, I recommend approval by the Congress at the appropriate time of membership in the proposed International Finance Corporation,² which will be affiliated with the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. This corporation will be designed to increase private investment in less developed countries by making loans without Government guaranties. Although the corporation will not purchase stock, it will provide venture capital through investing in debentures and similar obligations. Its operation will cover a field not dealt with by an existing institution.

The executive branch will continue through our diplomatic representatives abroad to encourage a climate favorable to the private enterprise concept in investment.

We shall continue to seek other new ways to enlarge the outward flow of capital.

It must be recognized, however, that when American private capital moves abroad, it properly expects to bring home its fair reward. This can only be accomplished in the last analysis by our willingness to purchase more goods and services from abroad in order to provide the dollars for these growing remittances. This fact is a further compelling reason for a fair and forward-looking trade policy on our part.

TECHNICAL COOPERATION

The United States has a vast store of practical and scientific know-how that is needed in the under-developed areas of the world. The United States has a responsibility to make it available. Its flow for peaceful purposes must remain unfettered.

United States participation in technical cooperation programs should be carried forward. These programs should be concerned with know-how rather than large funds. In my budget message next week I shall recommend that the Congress make available the funds required to support the multilateral technical cooperation programs of the United Nations.¹ The bilateral programs of the United States should be pressed vigorously.

INTERNATIONAL TRAVEL

The United States remains committed to the objective of freedom of travel throughout the world. Encouragement given to travel abroad is extremely important, both for its cultural and social importance in the free world and for its economic benefits. Travel abroad by Americans provides an important source of dollars for many countries. The executive branch shall continue to look for ways of facilitating international travel and shall continue to cooperate with private travel agencies.

One legislative action that would be beneficial in this field is the increase of the present duty-free allowances for tourists from $500 to $1,000 exercisable every 6 months. I recommend the passage of such legislation.²

TRADE FAIRS

International trade fairs have been of major importance to foreign countries for many years, and most of the trading nations have strengthened the promotional aspects of their industrial displays in many fairs with a central exhibit designed to emphasize the industrial progress and achievement of the nation.

Soviet and satellite exhibits, for example, have been costly, well planned, and housed in expensive structures designed to convey the impression that the U.S.S.R. is producing on a large scale for peace and is creating a paradise for workers.

The United States, which has a larger volume of international trade than any other nation, until recently has been conspicuous by its absence at these trade fairs. American visitors and participants have pointed out the failure of their Government to tell adequately the story of our free enterprise system and to provide effective international trade promotion cooperation.

As a result, I have undertaken an international trade fair program under the direction of the Department of Commerce. Since the inauguration of this program in August, participation has been authorized in 11 fairs to be held before June 30. Sixteen additional fairs are being considered for exhibition purposes in the latter part of the year. The first fair in which the United States presented a central exhibit is that at Bangkok, which opened December 7, 1954. At it our exhibit was awarded first prize. Over 100 American companies supplied items for inclusion in it.

I shall ask the Congress for funds to continue this program.³

CONVERTIBILITY

Convertibility of currencies is required for the development of a steadily rising volume of world trade and investment. The achievement of convertibility has not been possible in the postwar period due to dislocations caused by the war, inflation, and other domestic economic difficulties in many countries, which have contributed to an imbalance in international trade and payments. However, steady progress, particularly by Western European countries, is being made toward our mutual objective of restoring currency convertibility. The foreign economic program proposed here will make an important contribution to the achievement of convertibility.

AGRICULTURE

No single group within America has a greater stake in a healthy and expanding foreign trade than the farmers. One-fourth to one-third of some major crops, such as wheat, cotton, and tobacco, must find markets abroad in order to maintain farm income at high levels.

If they are to be successful, programs designed to promote the prosperity of agriculture should be consistent with our foreign economic program. We must take due account of the effect of any agricultural program on our foreign economic relations to assure that it contributes to the development of healthy, expanding foreign markets over the years.

CONCLUSION

The series of recommendations I have just made are all components of an integrated program, pointing in a single direction. Each contributes to the whole. Each advances our national security by bringing added strength and self-sufficiency to our allies. Each contributes to our economic growth and a rising standard of living among our people.

7. GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE (GATT): Text of October 30, 1947, as Amended at the Ninth Session of the Contracting Parties, March 10, 1955¹

PART I

Article I

Objectives

1. The contracting parties recognize that their relations in the field of trade and economic endeavour should be conducted with a view to raising standards of living, ensuring full employment and a

I (Revised), Texts of the General Agreement, as Amended, and of the Agreement on the Organization for Trade Cooperation (Geneva, The Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, April 1955), pp. 7-74. GATT was negotiated by 23 nations, signed at Geneva on Oct. 30, 1947, and, under the Protocol of Provisional Application of the same date, entered into force for the United States and seven other important trading nations on Jan. 1, 1948 (see TIAS 1700; 61 Stat., pts. 5 and 6). Adherents to the agreement had increased to 35 by the end of calendar year 1955. Rounds of multilateral tariff large and steadily growing volume of real income and effective demand, developing the full use of the resources of the world and expanding the production and exchange of goods, and promoting the progressive development of the economies of all the contracting parties.

2. The contracting parties desire to contribute to these objectives through this Agreement by entering into reciprocal and mutually advantageous arrangements directed to the substantial reduction of tariffs and other barriers to trade and to the elimination of discriminatory treatment in international commerce.

Article II

General Most-Favoured-Nation Treatment

1. With respect to customs duties and charges of any kind imposed on or in connection with importation or exportation or imposed on the international transfer of payments for imports or exports, and with respect to the method of levying such duties and charges, and with respect to all rules and formalities in connection with importation and exportation, and with respect to the application of internal taxes to exported goods, and with respect to all matters referred to in paragraphs 2 and 4 of Article IV, any advantage, favour, privilege or immunity granted by any contracting party to any product originating in or destined for any other country shall be accorded immediately and unconditionally to the like product originating in or destined for the territories of all other contracting parties.

2. The provisions of paragraph 1 of this Article shall not require the elimination of any preferences in respect of import duties or charges which do not exceed the levels provided for in paragraph 4 of this Article and which fall within the following descriptions:

- (a) preferences in force exclusively between two or more of the territories listed in Annex A, subject to the conditions set forth therein;
- (b) preferences in force exclusively between two or more territories which on 1 July 1939, were connected by common sovereignty or relations of protection or suzerainty and which are listed in Annexes B, C and D, subject to the conditions set forth therein;
- (c) preferences in force exclusively between the United States of America and the Republic of Cuba; negotiations took place at Annecy, France, in 1949, and at Torquay, England, in 1950-1951. Still another negotiating session opened at Geneva on Jan. 18, 1956.

By 1953, it became apparent that the General Agreement, particularly its organizational provisions, needed revision. The Ninth Session of the Contracting Parties at Geneva, Oct. 28, 1954-Mar. 7, 1955, reviewed the document and proposed certain changes, which are incorporated in the text cited above, and prepared an Agreement on the Organization for Trade Cooperation (infra) "to further . . . the achievement of the purposes and objectives" set forth in GATT. The amendments to GATT were accepted by the United States on Mar. 21, 1955. The Agreement on OTC is still before Congress (June 15, 1956). Meanwhile, GATT continues to operate under provisional arrangements. (See H. Rept. 2007, 84th Cong., 2d sess.).

- (d) preferences in force exclusively between neighbouring countries listed in Annex E.

3. The provisions of paragraph 1 shall not apply to preferences between the countries formerly a part of the Ottoman Empire and detached from it on 24 July 1923;¹ Provided that such preferences are approved under paragraph 5 of Article XXV.

4. The margin of preference on any product in respect of which a preference is permitted under paragraph 2 of this Article but is not specifically set forth as a maximum margin of preference in the appropriate Schedule² annexed to this Agreement shall not exceed:

- (a) in respect of duties or charges on any product described in such Schedule, the difference between the most-favoured-nation and preferential rates provided for therein; if no preferential rate is provided for, the preferential rate shall for the purposes of this paragraph be taken to be that in force on 10 April 1947, and, if no most-favoured-nation rate is provided for, the margin shall not exceed the difference between the most-favoured-nation and preferential rates existing on 10 April 1947;
- (b) in respect of duties or charges on any product not described in the appropriate Schedule, the difference between the most-favoured-nation and preferential rates existing on 10 April 1947.

In the case of the contracting parties named in Annex F, the date of 10 April 1947, referred to in sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) of this paragraph shall be replaced by the respective dates set forth in that Annex.

Article III

Schedules of Concessions

1. (a) Each contracting party shall accord to the commerce of the other contracting parties treatment no less favourable than that provided for in the appropriate Part of the appropriate Schedule annexed to this Agreement.

(b) The products described in Part I of the Schedule relating to any contracting party, which are the products of territories of other contracting parties, shall, on their importation into the territory to which the Schedule relates, and subject to the terms, conditions or qualifications set forth in that Schedule, be exempt from ordinary customs duties in excess of those set forth and provided for therein. Such products shall also be exempt from all other duties or charges of any kind imposed on or in connection with importation, including charges of any kind imposed on the international transfer of payments for imports, in excess of those imposed on the date of this Agreement or those directly and mandatorily required to be imposed thereafter by legislation in force in the importing territory on that date.

² Schedules not reprinted.

(c) The products described in Part II of the Schedule relating to any contracting party which are the products of territories entitled under Article II to receive preferential treatment upon importation into the territory to which the Schedule relates shall, on their importation into such territory, and subject to the terms, conditions or qualifications set forth in that Schedule, be exempt from ordinary customs duties in excess of those set forth and provided for in Part II of that Schedule. Such products shall also be exempt from all other duties or charges of any kind imposed on or in connection with importation, including charges of any kind imposed on the international transfer of payments for imports, in excess of those imposed on the date of this Agreement or those directly and mandatorily required to be imposed thereafter by legislation in force in the importing territory on that date. Nothing in this Article shall prevent any contracting party from maintaining its requirements existing on the date of this Agreement as to the eligibility of goods for entry at preferential rates of duty.

2. Nothing in this Article shall prevent any contracting party from imposing at any time on the importation of any product:

- (a) a charge equivalent to an internal tax imposed consistently with the provisions of paragraph 2 of Article IV in respect of the like domestic product or in respect of an article from which the imported product has been manufactured or produced in whole or in part;
- (b) any anti-dumping or countervailing duty applied consistently with the provisions of Article VI;
- (c) fees or other charges commensurate with the cost of services rendered

3. No contracting party shall alter its method of determining dutiable value or of converting currencies so as to impair the value of any of the concessions provided for in the appropriate Schedule annexed to this Agreement.

4. If any contracting party establishes, maintains or authorizes, formally or in effect, a monopoly of the importation of any product described in the appropriate Schedule annexed to this Agreement, such monopoly shall not, except as provided for in that Schedule or as otherwise agreed between the parties which initially negotiated the concession, operate so as to afford protection on the average in excess of the amount of protection provided for in that Schedule. The provisions of this paragraph shall not limit the use by contracting parties of any form of assistance to domestic producers permitted by other provisions of this Agreement.

5. If any contracting party considers that a product is not receiving from another contracting party the treatment which the first contracting party believes to have been contemplated by a concession provided for in the appropriate Schedule annexed to this Agreement, it shall bring the matter directly to the attention of the other contracting party. If the latter agrees that the treatment contemplated was that claimed by the first contracting party, but declares that such treatment cannot be accorded because a court or her proper authority has ruled to the effect that the product involved not be classified under the tariff laws of such contracting party as to permit the treatment contemplated in this Agreement, the contracting parties, together with any other contracting parties substantially interested, shall enter promptly into further negotiations with a view to a compensatory adjustment of the matter.

6. (a) The specific duties and charges included in the Schedules relating to contracting parties members of the International Monetary Fund,¹ and margins of preference in specific duties and charges maintained by such contracting parties, are expressed in the appropriate currency at the par value accepted or at the rate of exchange recognized by the Fund at the date of this Agreement. Accordingly, in case the par value accepted or the rate of exchange recognized by the Fund is reduced consistently with the Articles of Agreement of the Fund by more than twenty per centum, such specific duties and charges and margins of preference may be adjusted to take account of such reduction; Provided that the Organization for Trade Cooperation² hereinafter referred to as "the Organization") concurs that such adjustments will not impair the value of the concessions provided for in the appropriate Schedule or elsewhere in this Agreement, due account being taken of all factors which may influence the need for, and urgency of, such adjustments.

(b) Similar provisions shall apply to any contracting party not a member of the Fund, as from the date on which such contracting party becomes a member of the Fund or enters into a special exchange agreement in pursuance of Article XV.

7. The Schedules³ annexed to this Agreement are hereby made integral part of Part I of this Agreement.

PART II

Article IV

National Treatment on Internal Taxation and Regulation

1. The contracting parties recognize that internal taxes and other internal charges, and laws, regulations and requirements affecting the internal sale, offering for sale, purchase, transportation, distribution or use of products, and internal quantitative regulations requiring the mixture, processing or use of products in specified amounts or proportions, should not be applied to imported or domestic products so as to afford protection to domestic production.

2. The products of the territory of any contracting party imported into the territory of any other contracting party shall not be subject, directly or indirectly, to internal taxes or other internal charges of any kind in excess of those applied, directly or indirectly, to like domestic products. Moreover, no contracting party shall otherwise apply internal taxes or other internal charges to imported or domestic products in a manner contrary to the principles set forth in paragraph 1.

3. With respect to any existing internal tax which is inconsistent with the provisions of paragraph 2, but which is specifically authorized under a trade agreement, in force on 10 April 1947, in which the import duty on the taxed product is bound against increase, the contracting party imposing the tax shall be free to postpone the application of the provisions of paragraph 2 to such tax until such time as it can obtain release from the obligations of such trade agreement in order to permit the increase of such duty to the extent necessary to compensate for the elimination of the protective element of the tax.

4. The products of the territory of any contracting party imported into the territory of any other contracting party shall be accorded treatment no less favourable than that accorded to like products of national origin in respect of all laws, regulations and requirements affecting their internal sale, offering for sale, purchase, transportation, distribution or use. The provisions of this paragraph shall not prevent the application of differential internal transportation charges which are based exclusively on the economic operation of the means of transport and not on the nationality of the product.

5. No contracting party shall establish or maintain any internal quantitative regulation relating to the mixture, processing or use of products in specified amounts or proportions which requires, directly or indirectly, that any specified amount or proportion of any product which is the subject of the regulation must be supplied from domestic sources. Moreover, no contracting party shall otherwise apply internal quantitative regulations in a manner contrary to the principles set forth in paragraph 1.

6. The provisions of paragraph 5 shall not apply to any internal quantitative regulation in force in the territory of any contracting party on 1 July 1939, 10 April 1947, or 24 March 1948, at the option of that contracting party; Provided that any such regulation which is contrary to the provisions of paragraph 5 shall not be modified to the detriment of imports and shall be treated as a customs duty for the purpose of negotiation.

7. No internal quantitative regulation relating to the mixture, processing or use of products in specified amounts or proportions shall be applied in such a manner as to allocate any such amount or proportion among external sources of supply.

8. (a) The provisions of this Article shall not apply to laws, regulations or requirements governing the procurement by governmental agencies of products purchased for governmental purposes and not with a view to commercial resale or with a view to use in the production of goods for commercial sale.

(b) The provisions of this Article shall not prevent the payment of subsidies exclusively to domestic producers, including payments to domestic producers derived from the proceeds of internal taxes or charges applied consistently with the provisions of this Article and subsidies effected through governmental purchases of domestic products.

9. The contracting parties recognize that internal maximum price control measures, even though conforming to the other provisions of this Article, can have effects prejudicial to the interests of contracting parties supplying imported products. Accordingly, contracting parties applying such measures shall take account of the interests of exporting contracting parties with a view to avoiding to the fullest practicable extent such prejudicial effects.

10. The provisions of this Article shall not prevent any contracting party from establishing or maintaining internal quantitative regulations relating to exposed cinematograph films. If any contracting party establishes or maintains such regulations they shall take the form of screen quotas which shall conform to the following requirements:

- (a) screen quotas may require the exhibition of cinematograph films of national origin during a specified minimum proportion of the total screen time actually utilized, over a specified period of not less than one year, in the commercial exhibition of all films of whatever origin, and shall be computed on the basis of screen time per theatre per year or the equivalent thereof;
- (b) with the exception of screen time reserved for films of national origin under a screen quota, screen time including that released by administrative action from screen time reserved for films of national origin, shall not be allocated formally or in effect among sources of supply;
- (c) notwithstanding the provisions of sub-paragraph (b) of this paragraph, any contracting party may maintain screen quotas conforming to the requirements of sub-paragraph (a) of this paragraph which reserve a minimum proportion of screen time for films of a specified origin other than that of the contracting party imposing such screen quotas; Provided that no such minimum proportion of screen time shall be increased above the level in effect on 10 April 1947;
- (d) screen quotas shall be subject to negotiation for their limitation, liberalization or elimination.

Article V

Freedom of Transit

1. Goods (including baggage), and also vessels and other means of transport, shall be deemed to be in transit across the territory of a contracting party when the passage across such territory, with or without trans-shipment, warehousing, breaking bulk, or change in the mode of transport, is only a portion of a complete journey beginning and terminating beyond the frontier of the contracting party across whose territory the traffic passes. Traffic of this nature is termed in this Article "traffic in transit".

2. There shall be freedom of transit through the territory of each contracting party, via the routes most convenient for international transit, for traffic in transit to or from the territory of other contracting parties. No distinction shall be made which is based on the flag of vessels, the place of origin, departure, entry, exit or destination, or on any circumstances relating to the ownership of goods, of vessels or of other means of transport.

3. Any contracting party may require that traffic in transit through its territory be entered at the proper custom house, but, except in cases of failure to comply with applicable customs laws and regulations, such traffic coming from or going to the territory of other contracting parties shall not be subject to any unnecessary delays or restrictions and shall be exempt from customs duties and from all transit duties or other charges imposed in respect of transit, except charges for transportation or those commensurate with administrative expenses entailed by transit or with the cost of services rendered.

4. All charges and regulations imposed by contracting parties on traffic in transit to or from the territories of other contracting parties shall be reasonable, having regard to the conditions of the traffic.

5. With respect to all charges, regulations and formalities in connection with transit, each contracting party shall accord to traffic in transit to or from the territory of any other contracting party treatment no less favourable than the treatment accorded to traffic in transit to or from any third country.

6. Each contracting party shall accord to products which have been in transit through the territory of any other contracting party treatment no less favourable than that which would have been accorded to such products had they been transported from their place of origin to their destination without going through the territory of such other contracting party. Any contracting party shall, however, be free to maintain its requirements of direct consignment existing on the date of this Agreement, in respect of any goods in regard to which such direct consignment is a requisite condition of eligibility for entry of the goods at preferential rates of duty or has relation to the contracting party's prescribed method of valuation for duty purposes.

7. The provisions of this Article shall not apply to the operation of aircraft in transit, but shall apply to air transit of goods (including baggage).

Article VI

Anti-dumping and Countervailing Duties

1. The contracting parties recognize that dumping, by which products of one country are introduced into the commerce of another country at less than the normal value of the products, is to be condemned if it causes or threatens material injury to an established industry in the territory of a contracting party or materially retards the establishment of a domestic industry. For the purposes of this Article, a product is to be considered as being introduced into the commerce of an importing country at less than its normal value, if the price of the product exported from one country to another

- (a) is less than the comparable price, in the ordinary course of trade, for the like product when destined for consumption in the exporting country, or,
- (b) in the absence of such domestic price, is less than either
 - (i) the highest comparable price for the like product for export to any third country in the ordinary course of trade, or
 - (ii) the cost of production of the product in the country of origin plus a reasonable addition for selling cost and profit.

Due allowance shall be made in each case for differences in conditions and terms of sale, for differences in taxation, and for other differences affecting price comparability.

2. In order to offset or prevent dumping, a contracting party may levy on any dumped product an anti-dumping duty not greater in amount than the margin of dumping in respect of such product. For the purposes of this Article, the margin of dumping is the price difference determined in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 1.

3. No countervailing duty shall be levied on any product of the territory of any contracting party imported into the territory of another contracting party in excess of an amount equal to the estimated bounty or subsidy determined to have been granted, directly or indirectly, on the manufacture, production or export of such product in the country of origin or exportation, including any special subsidy to the transportation of a particular product. The term "countervailing duty" shall be understood to mean a special duty levied for the purpose of offsetting any bounty or subsidy bestowed, directly or indirectly, upon the manufacture, production or export of any merchandise.

4. No product of the territory of any contracting party imported into the territory of any other contracting party shall be subject to anti-dumping or countervailing duty by reason of the exemption of such product from duties or taxes borne by the like product when destined for consumption in the country of origin or exportation, or by reason of the refund of such duties or taxes.

5. No product of the territory of any contracting party imported into the territory of any other contracting party shall be subject to both anti-dumping and countervailing duties to compensate for the same situation of dumping or export subsidization.

6. (a) No contracting party shall levy any anti-dumping or countervailing duty on the importation of any product of the territory of another contracting party unless it determines that the effect of the dumping or subsidization, as the case may be, is such as to cause or threaten material injury to an established domestic industry, or is such as to retard materially the establishment of a domestic industry.

(b) The Organization may waive the requirement of subparagraph (a) of this paragraph so as to permit a contracting party to levy an anti-dumping or countervailing duty on the importation of any product for the purpose of offsetting dumping or subsidization which causes or threatens material injury to an industry in the territory of another contracting party exporting the product concerned to the territory of the importing contracting party. The Organization shall waive the requirements of sub-paragraph (a) of this paragraph, so as to permit the levying of a countervailing duty, in cases in which they find that a subsidy is causing or threatening material injury to an industry in the territory of another contracting party exporting the product concerned to the territory of the importing contracting party.

(c) In exceptional circumstances, however, where delay might cause damage which would be difficult to repair, a contracting party may levy a countervailing duty for the purpose referred to in sub-paragraph (b) of this paragraph without the prior approval of the Organization; Provided that such action shall be reported immediately to the Organization and that the countervailing duty shall be withdrawn promptly if the Organization disapproves.

7. A system for the stabilization of the domestic price or of the return to domestic producers of a primary commodity, independently of the movements of export prices, which results at times in the sale of the commodity for export at a price lower than the comparable price charged for the like commodity to buyers in the domestic market, shall be presumed not to result in material injury within the meaning of paragraph 6 if it is determined by consultation among the contracting parties substantially interested in the commodity concerned that:

- (a) the system has also resulted in the sale of the commodity for export at a price higher than the comparable price charged for the like commodity to buyers in the domestic market, and
- (b) the system is so operated, either because of the effective regulation of production, or otherwise, as not to stimulate exports unduly or otherwise seriously prejudice the interests of other contracting parties.

Article VII

Valuation for Customs Purposes

1. The contracting parties recognize the validity of the general principles of valuation set forth in the following paragraphs of this Article, and they undertake to give effect to such principles, in respect of all products subject to duties or other charges or restrictions on importation and exportation based upon or regulated in any manner by value. Moreover, they shall, upon a request by another contracting party, review the operation of any of their laws or regulations relating to value for customs purposes in the light of these principles. The Organization may request from contracting parties reports on steps taken by them in pursuance of the provisions of this Article.

2. (a) The value for customs purposes of imported merchandise should be based on the actual value of the imported merchandise on which duty is assessed, or of like merchandise, and should not be based on the value of merchandise of national origin or on arbitrary or fictitious values.

(b) "Actual value" should be the price at which, at a time and place determined by the legislation of the country of importation, such or like merchandise is sold or offered for sale in the ordinary course of trade under fully competitive conditions. To the extent to which the price of such or like merchandise is governed by the quantity in a particular transaction, the price to be considered should uniformly be related to either (i) comparable quantities, or (ii) quantities not less favourable to importers than those in which the greater volume of the merchandise is sold in the trade between the countries of exportation and importation.

(c) When the actual value is not ascertainable in accordance with sub-paragraph (b) of this paragraph, the value for customs purposes should be based on the nearest ascertainable equivalent of such value.

3. The value for customs purposes of any imported product should not include the amount of any internal tax, applicable within the country of origin or export, from which the imported product has been exempted or has been or will be relieved by means of refund.

4. (a) Except as otherwise provided for in this paragraph, where it is necessary for the purposes of paragraph 2 of this Article for a contracting party to convert into its own currency a price expressed in the currency of another country, the conversion rate of exchange to be used shall be based, for each currency involved, on the par value as established pursuant to the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund or on the rate of exchange recognized by the Fund, or on the par value established in accordance with a special exchange agreement entered into pursuant to Article XV of this Agreement.

(b) Where no such established par value and no such recognized rate of exchange exist, the conversion rate shall reflect effectively the current value of such currency in commercial transactions.

(c) The Organization, in agreement with the International Monetary Fund, shall formulate rules governing the conversion by contracting parties of any foreign currency in respect of which multiple rates of exchange are maintained consistently with the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund. Any contracting party may apply such rules in respect of such foreign currencies for the purposes of paragraph 2 of this Article as an alternative to the use of par values. Until such rules are adopted by the Organization, any contracting party may employ, in respect of any such foreign currency, rules of conversion for the purposes of paragraph 2 of this Article which are designed to reflect effectively the value of such foreign currency in commercial transactions.

(d) Nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to require any contracting party to alter the method of converting currencies for customs purposes which is applicable in its territory on the date of this Agreement, if such alteration would have the effect of increasing generally the amounts of duty payable.

5. The bases and methods for determining the value of products subject to duties or other charges or restrictions based upon or regulated in any manner by value should be stable and should be given sufficient publicity to enable traders to estimate, with a reasonable degree of certainty, the value for customs purposes.

Article VIII

Fees and Formalities connected with Importation and Exportation

1. (a) All fees and charges of whatever character (other than import and export duties and other than taxes within the purview of Article IV) imposed by contracting parties on or in connection with importation or exportation shall be limited in amount to the approximate cost of services rendered and shall not represent an indirect protection to domestic products or a taxation of imports or exports for fiscal purposes.

(b) The contracting parties recognize the need for reducing the number and diversity of fees and charges referred to in subparagraph (a).

(c) The contracting parties also recognize the need for minimizing the incidence and complexity of import and export formalities and for decreasing and simplifying import and export documentation requirements.

2. A contracting party shall, upon request by another contracting party or by the Organization, review the operation of its laws and regulations in the light of the provisions of this Article.

3. No contracting party shall impose substantial penalties for minor breaches of customs regulations or procedural requirements. In particular, no penalty in respect of any omission or mistake in customs documentation which is easily rectifiable and obviously made without fraudulent intent or gross negligence shall be greater than necessary to serve merely as a warning.

4. The provisions of this Article shall extend to fees, charges, formalities and requirements imposed by governmental authorities in connection with importation and exportation, including those relating to:

- (a) consular transactions, such as consular invoices and certificates;
- (b) quantitative restrictions;
- (c) licensing;
- (d) exchange control;
- (e) statistical services;
- (f) documents, documentation and certification;
- (g) analysis and inspection; and
- (h) quarantine, sanitation and fumigation.

Article IX

Marks of Origin

1. Each contracting party shall accord to the products of the territories of other contracting parties treatment with regard to marking requirements no less favourable than the treatment accorded to like products of any third country.

2. The contracting parties recognize that, in adopting and enforcing laws and regulations relating to marks of origin, the difficulties and inconveniences which such measures may cause to the commerce and industry of exporting countries should be reduced to a minimum, due regard being had to the necessity of protecting consumers against fraudulent or misleading indications.

3. Whenever it is administratively practicable to do so, contracting parties should permit required marks of origin to be affixed at the time of importation.

4. The laws and regulations of contracting parties relating to the marking of imported products shall be such as to permit compliance without seriously damaging the products, or materially reducing their value, or unreasonably increasing their cost.

5. As a general rule, no special duty or penalty should be imposed by any contracting party for failure to comply with marking requirements prior to importation unless corrective marking is unreasonably delayed or deceptive marks have been affixed or the required marking has been intentionally omitted.

6. The contracting parties shall co-operate with each other with a view to preventing the use of trade names in such manner as to misrepresent the true origin of a product, to the detriment of such distinctive regional or geographical names of products of the territory of a contracting party as are protected by its legislation. Each contracting party shall accord full and sympathetic consideration to such requests or representations as may be made by any other contracting party regarding the application of the undertaking set forth in the preceding sentence to names of products which have been communicated to it by the other contracting party.

Article X

Publication and Administration of Trade Regulations

1. Laws, regulations, judicial decisions and administrative rulings of general application, made effective by any contracting party, pertaining to the classification or the valuation of products for customs purposes, or to rates of duty, taxes or other charges, or to requirements, restrictions or prohibitions on imports or exports or on the transfer of payments therefor, or affecting their sale, distribution, transportation, insurance, warehousing, inspection, exhibition, processing, mixing or other use, shall be published promptly in such a manner as to enable governments and traders to become acquainted with them. Agreements affecting international trade policy which are in force between the government or a governmental agency of any contracting party and the government or governmental agency of any other contracting party shall also be published. The provisions of this paragraph shall not require any contracting party to disclose confidential information which would impede law enforcement or otherwise be contrary to the public interest or would prejudice the legitimate commercial interests of particular enterprises, public or private.

2. No measure of general application taken by any contracting party effecting an advance in a rate of duty or other charge on imports under an established and uniform practice, or imposing a new or more burdensome requirement, restriction or prohibition on imports, or on the transfer of payments therefor, shall be enforced before such measure has been officially published.

3. (a) Each contracting party shall administer in a uniform, impartial and reasonable manner all its laws, regulations, decisions and rulings of the kind described in paragraph 1 of this Article.

(b) Each contracting party shall maintain, or institute as soon as practicable, judicial, arbitral or administrative tribunals or procedures for the purpose, inter alia, of the prompt review and correction of administrative action relating to customs matters. Such tribunals or procedures shall be independent of the agencies entrusted with administrative enforcement and their decisions shall be implemented by, and shall govern the practice of, such agencies unless an appeal is lodged with a court or tribunal of superior jurisdiction within the time prescribed for appeals to be lodged by importers; Provided that the central administration of such agency may take steps to obtain a review of the matter in another proceeding if there is good cause to believe that the decision is inconsistent with established principles of law or the actual facts.

(c) The provisions of sub-paragraph (b) of this paragraph shall not require the elimination or substitution of procedures in force in the territory of a contracting party on the date of this Agreement which in fact provide for an objective and impartial review of administrative action even though such procedures are not fully or formally independent of the agencies entrusted with administrative enforcement. Any contracting party employing such procedures shall, upon request, furnish the Organization with full information thereon in order that they may determine whether such procedures conform to the requirements of this sub-paragraph.

Article XI

General Elimination of Quantitative Restrictions

1. No prohibitions or restrictions other than duties, taxes or other charges, whether made effective through quotas, import or export licenses or other measures, shall be instituted or maintained by any contracting party on the importation of any product of the territory of any other contracting party or on the exportation or sale for export of any product destined for the territory of any other contracting party.

2. The provisions of paragraph 1 of this Article shall not extend to the following:

- (a) Export prohibitions or restrictions temporarily applied to prevent or relieve critical shortages of foodstuffs or other products essential to the exporting contracting party;
- (b) Import and export prohibitions or restrictions necessary to the application of standards or regulations for the classification, grading or marketing of commodities in international trade;
- (c) Import restrictions on any agricultural or fisheries product, imported in any form, necessary to the enforcement of governmental measures which operate:
 - (i) to restrict the quantities of the like domestic product permitted to be marketed or produced, or, if there is no substantial domestic production of the like product, of a domestic product for which the imported product can be directly substituted; or
 - (ii) to remove a temporary surplus of the like domestic product, or, if there is no substantial domestic production of the like product, of a domestic product for which the imported product can be directly substituted, by making the surplus available to certain groups of domestic consumers free of charge or at prices below the current market level; or
 - (iii) to restrict the quantities permitted to be produced of any animal product the production of which is directly dependent, wholly or mainly, on the imported commodity, if the domestic production of that commodity is relatively negligible.

Any contracting party applying restrictions on the importation of any product pursuant to sub-paragraph (c) of this paragraph shall give public notice of the total quantity or value of the product permitted to be imported during a specified future period and of any change in such quantity or value. Moreover, any restrictions applied under (i) above shall not be such as will reduce the total of imports relative to the total of domestic production, as compared with the proportion which might reasonably be expected to rule between the two in the absence of restrictions. In determining this proportion, the contracting party shall pay due regard to the proportion prevailing during a previous representative period and to any special factors which may have affected or may be affecting the trade in the product concerned.

Article XII

Restrictions to Safeguard the Balance of Payments

1. Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 1 of Article XI, any contracting party, in order to safeguard its external financial position and its balance of payments, may restrict the quantity or value of merchandise permitted to be imported, subject to the provisions of the following paragraphs of this Article.

2. (a) Import restrictions instituted, maintained or intensified by a contracting party under this Article shall not exceed those necessary:

- (i) to forestall the imminent threat of, or to stop, a serious decline in its monetary reserves, or
- (ii) in the case of a contracting party with very low monetary reserves, to achieve a reasonable rate of increase in its reserves.

Due regard shall be paid in either case to any special factors which may be affecting the reserves of such contracting party or its need for reserves, including, where special external credits or other resources are available to it, the need to provide for the appropriate use of such credits or resources.

(b) Contracting parties applying restrictions under sub-paragraph (a) of this paragraph shall progressively relax them as such conditions improve, maintaining them only to the extent that the conditions specified in that sub-paragraph still justify their application. They shall eliminate the restrictions when conditions would no longer justify their institution or maintenance under that sub-paragraph.

3. (a) Contracting parties undertake, in carrying out their domestic policies, to pay due regard to the need for maintaining or restoring equilibrium in their balance of payments on a sound and lasting basis and to the desirability of avoiding an uneconomic employment of productive resources. They recognize that in order to achieve these ends, it is desirable so far as possible to adopt measures which expand rather than contract international trade.

(b) Contracting parties applying restrictions under this Article may determine the incidence of the restrictions on imports of different products or classes of products in such a way as to give priority to the importation of those products which are more essential.

(c) Contracting parties applying restrictions under this Article undertake:

- (i) to avoid unnecessary damage to the commercial or economic interests of any other contracting party;
- (ii) not to apply restrictions so as to prevent unreasonably the importation of any description of goods in minimum commercial quantities the exclusion of which would impair regular channels of trade; and
- (iii) not to apply restrictions which would prevent the importation of commercial samples or prevent compliance with patent, trade mark, copyright, or similar procedures.

(d) The contracting parties recognize that, as a result of domestic policies directed towards the achievement and maintenance of full and productive employment or towards the development of economic resources, a contracting party may experience a high level of demand for imports involving a threat to its monetary reserves of the sort.

referred to in paragraph 2 (a) of this Article. Accordingly, a contracting party otherwise complying with the provisions of this Article shall not be required to withdraw or modify restrictions on the ground that a change in those policies would render unnecessary restrictions which it is applying under this Article.

4. (a) Any contracting party applying new restrictions or raising the general level of its existing restrictions by a substantial intensification of the measures applied under this Article shall immediately after instituting or intensifying such restrictions (or, in circumstances in which prior consultation is practicable, before doing so) consult with the Organization as to the nature of its balance of payments difficulties, alternative corrective measures which may be available, and the possible effect of the restrictions on the economies of other contracting parties.

(b) On a date to be determined by it, the Organization shall review all restrictions still applied under this Article on that date. Beginning one year after that date contracting parties applying import restrictions under this Article shall enter into consultations of the type provided for in sub-paragraph (a) of this paragraph with the Organization annually.

(c) (i) If, in the course of consultations, with a contracting party under sub-paragraph (a) or (b) above, the Organization finds that the restrictions are not consistent with the provisions of this Article or with those of Article XIII (subject to the provisions of Article XIV), it shall indicate the nature of the inconsistency and may advise that the restrictions be suitably modified.

(ii) If, however, as a result of the consultations, the Organization determines that the restrictions are being applied in a manner involving an inconsistency of a serious nature with the provisions of this Article or with those of Article XIII (subject to the provisions of Article XIV) and that damage to the trade of any contracting party is caused or threatened thereby, it shall so inform the contracting party applying the restrictions and shall make appropriate recommendations for securing conformity with such provisions within a specified period of time. If such contracting party does not comply with these recommendations within the specified period, the Organization may release any contracting party the trade of which is adversely affected by the restrictions from such obligations under this Agreement towards the contracting party applying the restrictions as it determines to be appropriate in the circumstances.

(d) The Organization shall invite any contracting party which is applying restrictions under this Article to enter into consultations with it at the request of any contracting party which can establish a prima facie case that the restrictions are inconsistent with the provisions of this Article or with those of Article XIII (subject to the provisions of Article XIV) and that its trade is adversely affected thereby. However, no such invitation shall be issued unless the Organization has ascertained that direct discussions between the contracting parties concerned have not been successful. If, as a result of the consultations with the Organization, no agreement is reached and it determines that the restrictions are being applied inconsistently with such provisions, and that damage to the trade of the contracting party initiating the procedure is caused or threatened thereby, it shall recommend the withdrawal or modification of the restrictions. If the restrictions are not withdrawn or modified within such time as the Organization may prescribe, it may release the contracting party initiating the procedure from such obligations under this Agreement towards the contracting party applying the restrictions as it determines to be appropriate in the circumstances.

(e) In proceeding under this paragraph, the Organization shall have due regard to any special external factors adversely affecting the export trade of the contracting party applying restrictions.

(f) Determinations under this paragraph shall be rendered expeditiously and, if possible, within sixty days of the initiation of the consultations.

5. If there is a persistent and widespread application of import restrictions under this Article, indicating the existence of a general disequilibrium which is restricting international trade, the Organization shall initiate discussions to consider whether other measures might be taken, either by those contracting parties the balances of payments of which are under pressure or by those the balances of payments of which are tending to be exceptionally favourable, or by any appropriate intergovernmental organization, to remove the underlying causes of the disequilibrium. On the invitation of the Organization, contracting parties shall participate in such discussions.

Article XIII

Non-discriminatory Administration of Quantitative Restrictions

1. No prohibition or restriction shall be applied by any contracting party on the importation of any product of the territory of any other contracting party or on the exportation of any product destined for the territory of any other contracting party, unless the importation of the like product of all third countries or the exportation of the like product to all third countries is similarly prohibited or restricted.

2. In applying import restrictions to any product, contracting parties shall aim at a distribution of trade in such product approaching as closely as possible the shares which the various contracting parties might be expected to obtain in the absence of such restrictions, and to this end shall observe the following provisions:

- (a) Wherever practicable, quotas representing the total amount of permitted imports (whether allocated among supplying countries or not) shall be fixed, and notice given of their amount in accordance with paragraph 3 (b) of this Article;
- (b) In cases in which quotas are not practicable, the restrictions may be applied by means of import licences or permits without a quota;

- (c) Contracting parties shall not, except for purposes of operating quotas allocated in accordance with sub-paragraph (d) of this paragraph, require that import licences or permits be utilized for the importation of the product concerned from a particular country or source;
- (d) In cases in which a quota is allocated among supplying countries, the contracting party applying the restrictions may seek agreement with respect to the allocation of shares in the quota with all other contracting parties having a substantial interest in supplying the product concerned. In cases in which this method is not reasonably practicable, the contracting party concerned shall allot to contracting parties having a substantial interest in supplying the product shares based upon the proportions, supplied by such contracting parties during a previous representative period, of the total quantity or value of imports of the product, due account being taken of any special factors which may have affected or may be affecting the trade in the product. No conditions or formalities shall be imposed which would prevent any contracting party from utilizing fully the share of any such total quantity or value which has been allotted to it, subject to importation being made within any prescribed period to which the quota may relate.

3. (a) In cases in which import licences are issued in connection with import restrictions, the contracting party applying the restrictions shall provide, upon the request of any contracting party having an interest in the trade in the product concerned, all relevant information concerning the administration of the restrictions, the import licences granted over a recent period and the distribution of such licences among supplying countries; Provided that there shall be no obligation to supply information as to the names of importing or supplying enterprises.

(b) In the case of import restrictions involving the fixing of quotas, the contracting party applying the restrictions shall give public notice of the total quantity or value of the product or products which will be permitted to be imported during a specified future period and of any change in such quantity or value. Any supplies of the product in question which were en route at the time at which public notice was given shall not be excluded from entry; Provided that they may be counted so far as practicable, against the quantity permitted to be imported in the period in question, and also, where necessary, against the quantities permitted to be imported in the next following period or periods; and Provided further that if any contracting party customarily exempts from such restrictions products entered for consumption or withdrawn from warehouse for consumption during a period of thirty days after the day of such public notice, such practice shall be considered full compliance with this subparagraph.

(c) In the case of quotas allocated among supplying countries, the contracting party applying the restrictions shall promptly inform all other contracting parties having an interest in supplying the product concerned of the shares in the quota currently allocated, by quantity or value, to the various supplying countries and shall give public notice thereof.

4. With regard to restrictions applied in accordance with paragraph 2 (d) of this Article or under paragraph 2 (c) of Article XI, the selection of a representative period for any product and the appraisal of any special factors affecting the trade in the product shall be made initially by the contracting party applying the restriction; Provided that such contracting party shall, upon the request of any other contracting party having a substantial interest in supplying that product or upon the request of the Organization, consult promptly with the other contracting party or the Organization regarding the need for an adjustment of the proportion determined or of the base period selected, or for the reappraisal of the special factors involved, or for the elimination of conditions, formalities or any other provisions established unilaterally relating to the allocation of an adequate quota or its unrestricted utilization.

5. The provisions of this Article shall apply to any tariff quota instituted or maintained by any contracting party, and, in so far as applicable, the principles of this Article shall also extend to export restrictions.

Article XIV

Exceptions to the Rule of Non-discrimination

1. A contracting party which applies restrictions under Article XII or under Section B of Article XVIII may, in the application of such restrictions, deviate from the provisions of Article XIII in a manner having equivalent effect to restrictions on payments and transfers for current international transactions which that contracting party may at that time apply under Article VIII or XIV of the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund, or under analogous provisions of a special exchange agreement entered into pursuant to paragraph 6 of Article XV.

2. A contracting party which is applying import restrictions under Article XII or under Section B of Article XVIII may, with the consent of the Organization, temporarily deviate from the provisions of Article XIII in respect of a small part of its external trade where the benefits to the contracting party or contracting parties concerned substantially outweigh any injury which may result to the trade of other contracting parties.

3. The provisions of Article XIII shall not preclude a group of territories having a common quota in the International Monetary Fund from applying against imports from other countries, but not among themselves, restrictions in accordance with the provisions of Article XII or of Section B of Article XVIII on condition that such restrictions are in all other respects consistent with the provisions of Article XIII.

4. A contracting party applying import restrictions under Article XII or under Section B of Article XVIII shall not be precluded by Articles XI to XV or Section B of Article XVIII of this Agreement from applying measures to direct its exports in such a manner as to increase its earnings of currencies which it can use without deviation from the provisions of Article XIII.

5. A contracting party shall not be precluded by Articles XI to XV, inclusive, or by Section B of Article XVIII, of this Agreement from applying quantitative restrictions:

- (a) having equivalent effect to exchange restrictions authorized under Section 3(b) of Article VII of the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund, or
- (b) under the preferential arrangements provided for in Annex A of this Agreement, pending the outcome of the negotiations referred to therein.

Article XV

Exchange Arrangements

1. The Organization shall seek co-operation with the International Monetary Fund to the end that the Organization and the Fund may pursue a co-ordinated policy with regard to exchange questions within the jurisdiction of the Fund and questions of quantitative restrictions and other trade measures within the jurisdiction of the Organization.

2. In all cases in which the Organization is called upon to consider or deal with problems concerning monetary reserves, balances of payments or foreign exchange arrangements, it shall consult fully with the International Monetary Fund. In such consultations, the Organization shall accept all findings of statistical and other facts presented by the Fund relating to foreign exchange, monetary reserves and balances of payments, and shall accept the determination of the Fund as to whether action by a contracting party in exchange matters is in accordance with the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund, or with the terms of a special exchange agreement between that contracting party and the Organization. The Organization, in reaching its final decision in cases involving the criteria set forth in paragraph 2 (a) of Article XII or in paragraph 9 of Article XVIII, shall accept the determination of the Fund as to what constitutes a serious decline in the contracting party's monetary reserves, a very low level of its monetary reserves or a reasonable rate of increase in its monetary reserves, and as to the financial aspects of other matters covered in consultation in such cases.

3. The Organization shall seek agreement with the Fund regarding procedures for consultation under paragraph 2 of this Article.

4. Contracting parties shall not, by exchange action, frustrate the intent of the provisions of this Agreement, nor, by trade action, the intent of the provisions of the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund.

5. If the Organization considers, at any time, that exchange restrictions on payments and transfers in connection with imports are being applied by a contracting party in a manner inconsistent with the exceptions provided for in this Agreement for quantitative restrictions, it shall report thereon to the Fund.

6. Any contracting party which is not a member of the Fund shall, within a time to be determined by the Organization after consultation with the Fund, become a member of the Fund, or, failing that, enter into a special exchange agreement with the Organization. A contracting party which ceases to be a member of the Fund shall forthwith enter into a special exchange agreement with the Organization. Any special exchange agreement entered into by a contracting party under this paragraph shall thereupon become part of its obligations under this Agreement.

7. (a) A special exchange agreement between a contracting party and the Organization under paragraph 6 of this Article shall provide to the satisfaction of the Organization that the objectives of this Agreement will not be frustrated as a result of action in exchange matters by the contracting party in question.

(b) The terms of any such agreement shall not impose obligations on the contracting party in exchange matters generally more restrictive than those imposed by the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund on members of the Fund.

8. A contracting party which is not a member of the Fund shall furnish such information within the general scope of section 5 of Article VIII of the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund as the Organization may require in order to carry out its functions under this Agreement.

9. Nothing in this Agreement shall preclude:

- (a) the use by a contracting party of exchange controls or exchange restrictions in accordance with the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund or with that contracting party's special exchange agreement with the Organization, or
- (b) the use by a contracting party of restrictions or controls on imports or exports, the sole effect of which, additional to the effects permitted under Articles XI, XII, XIII and XIV, is to make effective such exchange controls or exchange restrictions.

Article XVI

Subsidies

Section A—Subsidies in General

1. If any contracting party grants or maintains any subsidy including any form of income or price support, which operates directly or indirectly to increase exports of any product from, or to reduce imports of any product into, its territory, it shall notify the Organization in writing of the extent and nature of the subsidization, of the estimated effect of the subsidization on the quantity of the affected product or products imported into or exported from its territory and of the circumstances making the subsidization necessary. In any case in which it is determined that serious prejudice to the interests of any other contracting party is caused or threatened by any such subsidization, the contracting party granting the subsidy shall, upon request, discuss with the other contracting party or parties concerned, or with the Organization, the possibility of limiting the subsidization.

Section B—Additional Provisions on Export Subsidies

2. The contracting parties recognize that the granting by a contracting party of a subsidy on the export of any product may have harmful effects for other contracting parties, both importing and exporting, may cause undue disturbance to their normal commercial interests, and may hinder the achievement of the objectives of this Agreement.

3. Accordingly, contracting parties should seek to avoid the use of subsidies on the export of primary products. If, however, a contracting party grants directly or indirectly any form of subsidy which operates to increase the export of any primary product from its territory, such subsidy shall not be applied in a manner which results in that contracting party having more than an equitable share of world export trade in that product, account being taken of the shares of the contracting parties in such trade in the product during a previous representative period, and any special factors which may have affected or may be affecting such trade in the product.

4. Further, as from 1 January 1958 or the earliest practicable date thereafter, contracting parties shall cease to grant either directly or indirectly any form of subsidy on the export of any product other than a primary product which subsidy results in the sale of such product for export at a price lower than the comparable price charged for the like product to buyers in a domestic market. Until 31 December 1957 no contracting party shall extend the scope of any such subsidization beyond that existing on 1 January 1955 by the introduction of new, or the extension of existing, subsidies.

5. The Organization shall review the operation of the provisions of this Article from time to time with a view to examining its effectiveness, in the light of actual experience, in promoting the objectives of this Agreement and avoiding subsidization seriously prejudicial to the trade or interests of contracting parties.

Article XVII

State-trading Enterprises

1. (a) Each contracting party undertakes that if it establishes or maintains a State enterprise, wherever located, or grants to any enterprise, formally or in effect, exclusive or special privileges, such enterprise shall, in its purchases or sales involving either imports or exports, act in a manner consistent with the general principles of non-discriminatory treatment prescribed in this Agreement for governmental measures affecting imports or exports by private traders.

(b) The provisions of sub-paragraph (a) of this paragraph shall be understood to require that such enterprises shall, having due regard to the other provisions of this Agreement, make any such purchases or sales solely in accordance with commercial considerations, including price, quality, availability, marketability, transportation and other conditions of purchase or sale, and shall afford the enterprises of the other contracting parties adequate opportunity, in accordance with customary business practice, to compete for participation in such purchases or sales.

(c) No contracting party shall prevent any enterprise (whether or not an enterprise described in sub-paragraph (a) of this paragraph) under its jurisdiction from acting in accordance with the principles of sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) of this paragraph.

2. The provisions of paragraph 1 of this Article shall not apply to imports of products for immediate or ultimate consumption in governmental use and not otherwise for re-sale or use in the production of goods for sale. With respect to such imports, each contracting party shall accord to the trade of the other contracting parties fair and equitable treatment.

3. The contracting parties recognize that enterprises of the kind described in paragraph 1 (a) of this Article might be operated so as to create serious obstacles to trade; thus negotiations on a reciprocal and mutually advantageous basis designed to limit or reduce such obstacles are of importance to the expansion of international trade.

4. (a) Contracting parties shall notify the Organization of the products which are imported into or exported from their territories by enterprises of the kind described in paragraph 1 (a) of this Article.

(b) A contracting party establishing, maintaining or authorizing an import monopoly of a product, which is not the subject of a concession under Article III, shall, on the request of another contracting party having a substantial trade in the product concerned, inform the Organization of the import mark-up on the product during a recent representative period, or, when it is not possible to do so, of the price charged on the re-sale of the product.

(c) The Organization may, at the request of a contracting party which has reason to believe that its interests under this Agreement are being adversely affected by the operations of an enterprise of the kind described in paragraph 1 (a), request the contracting party establishing, maintaining or authorizing such enterprise to supply information about its operations related to the carrying out of the provisions of this Agreement.

(d) The provisions of this paragraph shall not require any contracting party to disclose confidential information which would impede law enforcement or otherwise be contrary to the public interest or would prejudice the legitimate commercial interests of particular enterprises.

Article XVIII

Governmental Assistance to Economic Development

1. The contracting parties recognize that the attainment of the objectives of this Agreement will be facilitated by the progressive development of their economies, particularly of those contracting parties the economies of which can only support low standards of living and are in the early stages of development.

2. The contracting parties recognize further that it may be necessary for those contracting parties, in order to implement programmes and policies of economic development designed to raise the general standard of living of their people, to take protective or other measures affecting imports, and that such measures are justified in so far as they facilitate the attainment of the objectives of this Agreement. They agree, therefore, that those contracting parties should enjoy additional facilities to enable them (a) to maintain sufficient flexibility in their tariff structure to be able to grant the tariff protection required for the establishment of a particular industry and (b) to apply quantitative restrictions for balance of payments purposes in a manner which takes full account of the continued high level of demand for imports likely to be generated by their programmes of economic development.

3. The contracting parties recognize finally that with those additional facilities which are provided for in Sections A and B of this Article, the provisions of this Agreement would normally be sufficient to enable contracting parties to meet the requirements of their economic development. They agree, however, that there may be circumstances where no measure consistent with those provisions is practicable to permit a contracting party in the process of economic development to grant the governmental assistance required to promote the establishment of particular industries with a view to raising the general standard of living of its people. Special procedures are laid down in Sections C and D of this Article to deal with those cases.

4. (a) Consequently, a contracting party the economy of which can only support low standards of living and is in the early stages of development shall be free to deviate temporarily from the provisions of the other Articles of this Agreement, as provided in Sections A, B and C of this Article.

(b) A contracting party the economy of which is in the process of development but which does not come within the scope of subparagraph (a) above, may submit applications to the Organization under Section D of this Article.

5. The contracting parties recognize that the export earnings of contracting parties the economies of which are of the type described in paragraph 4 (a) and (b) above, and which depend on exports of a small number of primary commodities may be seriously reduced by a decline in the sale of such commodities. Accordingly, when the exports of primary commodities by such a contracting party are seriously affected by measures taken by another contracting party, it may have resort to the consultation provisions of Article XXII of this Agreement.

6. The organization shall review annually all measures applied pursuant to the provisions of Sections C and D of this Article.

Section A

7. (a) If a contracting party coming within the scope of paragraph 4 (a) of this Article considers it desirable, in order to promote the establishment of a particular industry with a view to raising the general standard of living of its people, to modify or withdraw a concession included in the appropriate schedule annexed to this Agreement, it shall notify the Organization to this effect and enter into negotiations with any contracting party with which such concession was initially negotiated, and with any other contracting party determined by the Organization to have a substantial interest therein. If agreement is reached between such contracting parties concerned, they shall be free to modify or withdraw concessions under the appropriate Schedules to this Agreement in order to give effect to such agreement, including any compensatory adjustments involved.

(b) If agreement is not reached within sixty days after the notification provided for in sub-paragraph (a) above, the contracting party which proposes to modify or withdraw the concession may refer the matter to the Organization, which shall promptly examine it. If it finds that the contracting party which proposes to modify or withdraw the concession has made every effort to reach an agreement and that the compensatory adjustment offered by it is adequate, that contracting party shall be free to modify or withdraw the concession if, at the same time, it gives effect to the compensatory adjustment. If the Organization does not find that the compensation offered by a contracting party proposing to modify or withdraw the concession is adequate, but finds that it has made every reasonable effort to offer adequate compensation, that contracting party shall be free to proceed with such modification or withdrawal. If such action is taken, any other contracting party referred to in sub-paragraph (a) above shall be free to modify or withdraw substantially equivalent concessions initially negotiated with the contracting party which has taken the action.

Section B

8. The contracting parties recognize that contracting parties coming within the scope of paragraph 4 (a) of this Article tend, when they are in rapid process of development, to experience balance of payments difficulties arising mainly from efforts to expand their internal markets as well as from the instability in their terms of trade.

9. In order to safeguard its external financial position and to ensure a level of reserves adequate for the implementation of its programme of economic development, a contracting party coming within the scope of paragraph 4 (a) of this Article may, subject to the provisions of paragraphs 10 to 12, control the general level of its imports by restricting the quantity or value of merchandise permitted to be imported; Provided that the import restrictions instituted, maintained or intensified shall not exceed those necessary:

- (a) to forestall the threat of, or to stop, a serious decline in its monetary reserves, or

(b) in the case of a contracting party with inadequate monetary reserves, to achieve a reasonable rate of increase in its reserves. Due regard shall be paid in either case to any special factors which may be affecting the reserves of the contracting party or its need for reserves, including, where special external credits or other resources are available to it, the need to provide for the appropriate use of such credits or resources.

10. In applying these restrictions, the contracting party may determine their incidence on imports of different products or classes of products in such a way as to give priority to the importation of those products which are more essential in the light of its policy of economic development; Provided that the restrictions are so applied as to avoid unnecessary damage to the commercial or economic interests of any other contracting party and not to prevent unreasonably the importation of any description of goods in minimum commercial quantities the exclusion of which would impair regular channels of trade; and Provided further that the restrictions are not so applied as to prevent the importation of commercial samples or to prevent compliance with patent, trade-mark, copyright or similar procedures.

11. In carrying out its domestic policies, the contracting party concerned shall pay due regard to the need for restoring equilibrium in its balance of payments on a sound and lasting basis and to the desirability of assuring an economic employment of productive resources. It shall progressively relax any restrictions applied under this Section as conditions improve, maintaining them only to the extent necessary under the terms of paragraph 9 of this Article, and shall eliminate them when conditions no longer justify such maintenance; Provided that no contracting party shall be required to withdraw or modify restrictions on the ground that a change in its development policy would render unnecessary the restrictions which it is applying under this Section.

12. (a) Any contracting party applying new restrictions or raising the general level of its existing restrictions by a substantial intensification of the measures applied under this Section, shall immediately after instituting or intensifying such restrictions (or, in circumstances in which prior consultation is practicable, before doing so (consult with the Organization as to the nature of its balance of payments difficulties, alternative corrective measures which may be available, and the possible effect of the restrictions on the economies of other contracting parties.

(b) On a date to be determined by it, the Organization shall review all restrictions still applied under this Section on that date. Beginning two years after that date, contracting parties applying restrictions under this Section shall enter into consultations of the type provided for in sub-paragraph (a) above with the Organization at intervals of approximately, but not less than, two years according to a programme to be drawn up each year by the Organization; Provided that no consultation under this sub-paragraph shall take place within two years after the conclusion of a consultation of a general nature under any other provision of this paragraph.

(c) (i) If, in the course of consultations with a contracting party under sub-paragraph (a) or (b) of this paragraph, the Organization finds that the restrictions are not consistent with the provisions of this Section or with those of Article XIII (subject to the provisions of Article XIV), they shall indicate the nature of the inconsistency and may advise that the restrictions be suitably modified.

(ii) If, however, as a result of the consultations, the Organization determines that the restrictions are being applied in a manner involving an inconsistency of a serious nature with the provisions of this Section or with those of Article XIII (subject to the provisions of Article XIV) and that damage to the trade of any contracting party is caused or threatened thereby, they shall so inform the contracting party applying the restrictions and shall make appropriate recommendations for securing conformity with such provisions within a specified period. If such contracting party does not comply with these recommendations within the specified period, the Organization may release any contracting party the trade of which is adversely affected by the restrictions from such obligations under this Agreement towards the contracting party applying the restrictions as they determine to be appropriate in the circumstances.

(d) The Organization shall invite any contracting party which is applying restrictions under this Section to enter into consultations with them at the request of any contracting party which can establish a prima facie case that the restrictions are inconsistent with the provisions of this Section or with those of Article XIII (subject to the provisions of Article XIV) and that its trade is adversely affected thereby. However, no such invitation shall be issued unless the Organization has ascertained that direct discussions between the contracting parties concerned have not been successful. If, as a result of the consultations with the Organization, no agreement is reached and it determines that the restrictions are being applied inconsistently with such provisions, and that damage to the trade of the contracting party initiating the procedure is caused or threatened thereby, it shall recommend the withdrawal or modification of the restrictions. If the restrictions are not withdrawn or modified within such time as the Organization may prescribe, it may release the contracting party initiating the procedure from such obligations under this Agreement towards the contracting party applying the restrictions as it determines to be appropriate in the circumstances.

(e) If a contracting party against which action has been taken in accordance with the last sentence of sub-paragraph (c) (ii) or (d) of this paragraph, finds that the release of obligations authorized by the Organization adversely affects the operation of its programme and policy of economic development, it shall be free, not later than sixty days after such action is taken, to give written notice to the Director-

General of the Organization of its intention to withdraw from this Agreement and such withdrawal shall take effect on the sixtieth day following the day on which the notice is received by him.

(f) In proceeding under this paragraph, the Organization shall have due regard to the factors referred to in paragraph 2 of this Article. Determinations under this paragraph shall be rendered expeditiously and, if possible, within sixty days of the initiation of the consultations.

Section C

13. If a contracting party coming within the scope of paragraph 4 (a) of this Article finds that governmental assistance is required to promote the establishment of a particular industry with a view to raising the general standard of living of its people, but that no measure consistent with the other provisions of this Agreement is practicable to achieve that objective, it may have recourse to the provisions and procedures set out in this Section.

14. The contracting party concerned shall notify the Organization of the special difficulties which it meets in the achievement of the objective outlined in paragraph 13 of this Article and shall indicate the specific measure affecting imports which it proposes to introduce in order to remedy these difficulties. It shall not introduce that measure before the expiration of the time-limit laid down in paragraph 15 or 17, as the case may be, or if the measure affects imports of a product which is the subject of a concession included in the appropriate Schedule annexed to this Agreement, unless it has secured the concurrence of the Organization in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 18; Provided that, if the industry receiving assistance has already started production, the contracting party may, after informing the Organization, take such measures as may be necessary to prevent, during that period, imports of the product or products concerned from increasing substantially above a normal level.

15. If, within thirty days of the notification of the measure, the Organization does not request the contracting party concerned to consult with it, that contracting party shall be free to deviate from the relevant provisions of the other Articles of this Agreement to the extent necessary to apply the proposed measure.

16. If it is requested by the Organization to do so, the contracting party concerned shall consult with it as to the purpose of the proposed measure, as to alternative measures which may be available under this Agreement, and as to the possible effect of the measure proposed on the commercial and economic interests of other contracting parties. If, as a result of such consultation, the Organization agrees that there is no measure consistent with the other provisions of this Agreement which is practicable in order to achieve the objective outlined in paragraph 13 of this Article, and concurs in the proposed measure, the contracting party concerned shall be released from its obligations under the relevant provisions of the other Articles of this Agreement to the extent necessary to apply that measure.

17. If, within ninety days after the date of the notification of the proposed measure under paragraph 14 of this Article, the Organization has not concurred in such measure, the contracting party concerned may introduce the measure proposed after informing the Organization.

18. If the proposed measure affects a product which is the subject of a concession included in the appropriate Schedule annexed to this Agreement, the contracting party concerned shall enter into consultations with any other contracting party with which the concession was initially negotiated, and with any other contracting party determined by the Organization to have a substantial interest therein. The Organization shall concur in the measure if it agrees that there is no measure consistent with the other provisions of this Agreement which is practicable in order to achieve the objective set forth in paragraph 13 of this Article, and if it is satisfied:

- (a) that agreement has been reached with such other contracting parties as a result of the consultations referred to above, or
- (b) if no such agreement has been reached within sixty days after the notification provided for in paragraph 14 has been received by the Organization, that the contracting party having recourse to this Section has made all reasonable efforts to reach an agreement and that the interests of other contracting parties are adequately safeguarded.

The contracting party having recourse to this Section shall thereupon be released from its obligations under the relevant provisions of the other Articles of this Agreement to the extent necessary to permit it to apply the measure.

19. If a proposed measure of the type described in paragraph 13 of this Article concerns an industry the establishment of which has in the initial period been facilitated by incidental protection afforded by restrictions imposed by the contracting party concerned for balance of payments purposes under the relevant provisions of this Agreement, that contracting party may resort to the provisions and procedures of this Section; Provided that it shall not apply the proposed measure without the concurrence of the Organization.

20. Nothing in the preceding paragraphs of this Section shall authorize any deviation from the provisions of Articles II, III and XIII of this Agreement. The provisos to paragraph 10 of this Article shall also be applicable to any restriction under this Section.

21. At any time while a measure is being applied under paragraph 17 of this Article, any contracting party substantially affected by it may suspend the application to the trade of the contracting party having recourse to this Section of such substantially equivalent concessions or other obligations under this Agreement the suspension of which the Organization does not disapprove; Provided that sixty days' notice of such suspension is given to the Organization not later than six months after the measure has been introduced or changed substantially to the detriment of the contracting party affected. Any such contracting party shall afford adequate opportunity for consultation in accordance with the provisions of Article XXII of this Agreement.

Section D

22. A contracting party coming within the scope of sub-paragraph 4 (b) of this Article desiring, in the interest of the development of its economy, to introduce a measure of the type described in paragraph 13 of this Article in respect of the establishment of a particular industry may apply to the Organization for approval of such measure. The Organization shall promptly consult with such contracting party and shall, in making its decision, be guided by the considerations set out in paragraph 16. If the Organization concurs in the proposed measure the contracting party concerned shall be released from its obligations under the relevant provisions of the other Articles of this Agreement to the extent necessary to permit it to apply the measure. If the proposed measure affects a product which is the subject of a concession included in the appropriate Schedule annexed to this Agreement, the provisions of paragraph 18 shall apply.

23. Any measure applied under this Section shall comply with the provisions of paragraph 20 of this Article.

Article XIXEmergency Action on Imports of Particular Products

1. (a) If, as a result of unforeseen developments and of the effect of the obligations incurred by a contracting party under this Agreement, including tariff concessions, any product is being imported into the territory of that contracting party in such increased quantities and under such conditions as to cause or threaten serious injury to domestic producers in that territory of like or directly competitive products, the contracting party shall be free, in respect of such product, and to the extent and for such time as may be necessary to prevent or remedy such injury, to suspend the obligation in whole or in part or to withdraw or modify the concession.

(b) If any product, which is the subject of a concession with respect to a preference, is being imported into the territory of a contracting party in the circumstances set forth in sub-paragraph (a) of this paragraph, so as to cause or threaten serious injury to domestic producers of like or directly competitive products in the territory of a contracting party which receives or received such preference, the importing contracting party shall be free, if that other contracting party so requests, to suspend the relevant obligation in whole or in part or to withdraw or modify the concession in respect of the product, to the extent and for such time as may be necessary to prevent or remedy such injury.

2. Before any contracting party shall take action pursuant to the provisions of paragraph 1 of this Article, it shall give notice in writing to the Organization as far in advance as may be practicable and shall afford the Organization and those contracting parties having a substantial interest as exporters of the product concerned an opportunity to consult with it in respect of the proposed action. When such notice is given in relation to a concession with respect to a preference, the notice shall name the contracting party which has requested the action. In critical circumstances, where delay would cause damage which it would be difficult to repair, action under paragraph 1 of this Article may be taken provisionally without prior consultation, on the condition that consultation shall be effected immediately after taking such action.

3. (a) If agreement among the interested contracting parties with respect to the action is not reached, the contracting party which proposes to take or continue the action shall, nevertheless, be free to do so, and if such action is taken or continued, the affected contracting parties shall then be free, not later than ninety days after such action is taken, to suspend, upon the expiration of thirty days from the day on which written notice of such suspension is received by the Organization, the application to the trade of the contracting party taking such action, or, in the case envisaged in paragraph 1 (b) of this Article, to the trade of the contracting party requesting such action, of such substantially equivalent concessions or other obligations under this Agreement the suspension of which the Organization does not disapprove.

(b) Notwithstanding the provisions of sub-paragraph (a) of this paragraph, where action is taken under paragraph 2 of this Article without prior consultation and causes or threatens serious injury in the territory of a contracting party to the domestic producers of products affected by the action, that contracting party shall, where delay would cause damage difficult to repair, be free to suspend, upon the taking of the action and throughout the period of consultation, such concessions or other obligations as may be necessary to prevent or remedy the injury.

Article XX

General Exceptions

Subject to the requirement that such measures are not applied in a manner which would constitute a means of arbitrary or unjustifiable discrimination between countries where the same conditions prevail, or a disguised restriction on international trade, nothing in this Agreement shall be construed to prevent the adoption or enforcement by any contracting party of measures:

- (a) necessary to protect public morals;
- (b) necessary to protect human, animal or plant life or health;
- (c) relating to the importation or exportation of gold or silver;
- (d) necessary to secure compliance with laws or regulations which are not inconsistent with the provisions of this Agreement, including those relating to customs enforcement, the enforcement of monopolies operated under paragraph 4 of Article III and Article XVII, the protection of patents, trade marks and copyrights, and the prevention of deceptive practices;
- (e) relating to the products of prison labour;

- (f) imposed for the protection of national treasures of artistic, historic or archaeological value;
- (g) relating to the conservation of exhaustible natural resources if such measures are made effective in conjunction with restrictions on domestic production or consumption;
- (h) undertaken in pursuance of obligations under any intergovernmental commodity agreement which conforms to criteria submitted to the Organisation and not disapproved by it or which is itself so submitted and not so disapproved;
- (i) involving restrictions on exports of domestic materials necessary to assure essential quantities of such materials to a domestic processing industry during periods when the domestic price of such materials is held below the world price as part of a governmental stabilization plan; Provided that such restrictions shall not operate to increase the exports of or the protection afforded to such domestic industry, and shall not depart from the provisions of this Agreement relating to nondiscrimination;
- (j) essential to the acquisition or distribution of products in general or local short supply; Provided that any such measures shall be consistent with the principle that all contracting parties are entitled to an equitable share of the international supply of such products, and that any such measures which are inconsistent with the other provisions of this Agreement shall be discontinued as soon as the conditions giving rise to them have ceased to exist. The Organization shall review the need for this sub-paragraph not later than 30 June 1960.

Article XXI

Security Exceptions

Nothing in this Agreement shall be construed

- (a) to require any contracting party to furnish any information the disclosure of which it considers contrary to its essential security interests; or
- (b) to prevent any contracting party from taking any action which it considers necessary for the protection of its essential security interests
 - (i) relating to fissionable materials or the materials from which they are derived;
 - (ii) relating to the traffic in arms, ammunition and implements of war and to such traffic in other goods and materials as is carried on directly or indirectly for the purpose of supplying a military establishment;
 - (iii) taken in time of war or other emergency in international relations; or
- (c) to prevent any contracting party from taking any action in pursuance of its obligations under the United Nations Charter for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Article XXII

Consultation

1. Each contracting party shall accord sympathetic consideration to, and shall afford adequate opportunity for consultation regarding, such representations as may be made by another contracting party with respect to any matter affecting the operation of this Agreement.

2. The Organization may, at the request of a contracting party, consult with any contracting party or parties in respect of any matter for which it has not been possible to find a satisfactory solution through consultation under paragraph 1.

Article XXIII

Nullification or Impairment

1. If any contracting party should consider that any benefit accruing to it directly or indirectly under this Agreement is being nullified or impaired or that the attainment of any objective of the Agreement is being impeded as the result of (a) the failure of another contracting party to carry out its obligations under this Agreement, or (b) the application by another contracting party of any measure, whether or not it conflicts with the provisions of this Agreement, or (c) the existence of any other situation, the contracting party may, with a view to the satisfactory adjustment of the matter, make written representations or proposals to the other contracting party or parties which it considers to be concerned. Any contracting party thus approached shall give sympathetic consideration to the representations or proposals made to it.

2. If no satisfactory adjustment is effected between the contracting parties concerned within a reasonable time, or if the difficulty is of the type described in paragraph 1 (c) of this Article, the matter may be referred to the Organization.

PART III

Article XXIV

Territorial Application—Frontier Traffic—Customs Unions and Free-trade Areas

1. The provisions of this Agreement shall apply to the metropolitan customs territories of the contracting parties and to any other customs territories in respect of which this Agreement has been accepted under Article XXVI or is being applied under Article XXXIII or pursuant to the Protocol of Provisional Application.¹ Each such customs territory shall, exclusively for the purposes of the territorial application of this Agreement, be treated as though it were a contracting party; Provided that the provisions of this paragraph shall not be construed to create any rights or obligations as between two or more customs territories in respect of which this Agreement has been accepted under Article XXVI or is being applied under Article XXXIII or pursuant to the Protocol of Provisional Application by a single contracting party.

2. For the purposes of this Agreement a customs territory shall be understood to mean any territory with respect to which separate tariffs or other regulations of commerce are maintained for a substantial part of the trade of such territory with other territories.

3. The provisions of this Agreement shall not be construed to prevent:

- (a) advantages accorded by any contracting party to adjacent countries in order to facilitate frontier traffic;
- (b) advantages accorded to the trade with the Free Territory of Trieste by countries contiguous to that territory, provided that such advantages are not in conflict with the Treaties of Peace arising out of the Second World War.

4. The contracting parties recognize the desirability of increasing freedom of trade by the development, through voluntary agreements, of closer integration between the economies of the countries parties to such agreements. They also recognize that the purpose of a customs union or of a free-trade area should be to facilitate trade between the constituent territories and not to raise barriers to the trade of other contracting parties with such territories.

5. Accordingly, the provisions of this Agreement shall not prevent, as between the territories of contracting parties, the formation of a customs union or of a free-trade area or the adoption of an interim agreement necessary for the formation of a customs union or of a free-trade area; Provided that:

- (a) with respect to a customs union, or an interim agreement leading to the formation of a customs union, the duties and other regulations of commerce imposed at the institution of any such union or interim agreement in respect of trade with contracting parties not parties to such union or agreement shall not on the whole be higher or more restrictive than the general incidence of the duties and regulations of commerce applicable in the constituent territories prior to the formation of such union or the adoption of such interim agreement, as the case may be;
- (b) with respect to a free-trade area, or an interim agreement leading to the formation of a free-trade area, the duties and other regulations of commerce maintained in each of the constituent territories and applicable at the formation of such free-trade area or the adoption of such interim agreement to the trade of contracting parties not included in such area or not parties to such agreement shall not be higher or more restrictive than the corresponding duties and other regulations of commerce existing in the same constituent territories prior to the formation of the free-trade area, or interim agreement, as the case may be; and

- (c) any interim agreement referred to in sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) shall include a plan and schedule for the formation of such a customs union or of such a free-trade area within a reasonable length of time.

6. If, in fulfilling the requirements of sub-paragraph 5 (a), a contracting party proposes to increase any rate of duty inconsistently with the provisions of Article III, the procedure set forth in Article XXVIII shall apply. In providing for compensatory adjustment, due account shall be taken of the compensation already afforded by the reductions brought about in the corresponding duty of the other constituents of the union.

7. (a) Any contracting party deciding to enter into a customs union or free-trade area, or an interim agreement leading to the formation of such a union or area, shall promptly notify the Organization and shall make available to it such information regarding the proposed union or area as will enable it to make such reports and recommendations to contracting parties as it may deem appropriate.

(b) If, after having studied the plan and schedule included in an interim agreement referred to in paragraph 5 in consultation with the parties to that agreement and taking due account of the information made available in accordance with the provisions of sub-paragraph (a), the Organization finds that such agreement is not likely to result in the formation of a customs union or of a free-trade area within the period contemplated by the parties to the agreement or that such period is not a reasonable one, the Organization shall make recommendations to the parties to the agreement. The parties shall not maintain or put into force, as the case may be, such agreement if they are not prepared to modify it in accordance with these recommendations.

(c) Any substantial change in the plan or schedule referred to in paragraph 5 (c) shall be communicated to the Organization, which may request the contracting parties concerned to consult with it if the change seems likely to jeopardize or delay unduly the formation of the customs union or of the free-trade area.

8. For the purposes of this Agreement:

- (a) A customs union shall be understood to mean the substitution of a single customs territory for two or more customs territories, so that

- (i) duties and other restrictive regulations of commerce (except, where necessary, those permitted under Articles XI, XII, XIII, XIV, XV and XX) are eliminated with respect to substantially all the trade between the constituent territories of the union or at least with respect to substantially all the trade in products originating in such territories, and,

- (ii) subject to the provisions of paragraph 9, substantially the same duties and other regulations of commerce are applied by each of the members of the union to the trade of territories not included in the union;

- (b) A free-trade area shall be understood to mean a group of two or more customs territories in which the duties and other restrictive regulations of commerce (except, where necessary, those permitted under Articles XI, XII, XIII, XIV, XV and XX) are eliminated on substantially all the trade between the constituent territories in products originating in such territories.

9. The preferences referred to in paragraph 2 of Article II shall not be affected by the formation of a customs union or of a free-trade area but may be eliminated or adjusted by means of negotiations with contracting parties affected. This procedure of negotiations with affected contracting parties shall, in particular, apply to the elimination of preferences required to conform with the provisions of paragraph 8 (a) (i) and paragraph 8 (b).

10. The Organization may by a two-thirds majority approve proposals which do not fully comply with the requirements of paragraphs 5 to 9 inclusive, provided that such proposals lead to the formation of a customs union or a free-trade area in the sense of this Article.

11. Taking into account the exceptional circumstances arising out of the establishment of India and Pakistan as independent [independent] States and recognizing the fact that they have long constituted an economic unit, the contracting parties agree that the provisions of this Agreement shall not prevent the two countries from entering into special arrangements with respect to the trade between them, pending the establishment of their mutual trade relations on a definitive basis.

12. Each contracting party shall take such reasonable measures as may be available to it to ensure observance of the provisions of this Agreement by the regional and local governments and authorities within its territory.

Article XXV

The Organization for Trade Cooperation

1. The Organization for Trade Cooperation, established by the Agreement bearing the date of 10 March 1955,¹ shall give effect to those provisions of this Agreement, which provide for action by the Organization and such other provisions as involve joint action, and may carry on any other activities with respect to the General Agreement which are provided for by the Agreement establishing the Organization.

2. All contracting parties shall, as soon as possible, become Members of the Organization.

¹ Infra.

3. Those contracting parties which have accepted the Agreement on the Organization for Trade Cooperation may decide at any time after the entry into force of that Agreement that any contracting party which has not accepted it shall cease to be a contracting party.

Article XXVI

Acceptance, Entry into Force and Registration

1. The date of this Agreement shall be 30 October 1947.

2. This Agreement shall be open for acceptance by any contracting party which, on 1 March 1955, was a contracting party or was negotiating with a view to accession to this Agreement.

3. This Agreement, done in a single English original and in a single French original, both texts authentic, shall be deposited with the Director-General of the Organization, who shall furnish certified copies thereof to all interested governments.

4. Each government accepting this Agreement shall deposit an instrument of acceptance with the Director-General of the Organization, who will inform all interested governments of the date of deposit of each instrument of acceptance and of the day on which this Agreement enters into force under paragraph 6 of this Article.

5. (a) Each government accepting this Agreement does so in respect of its metropolitan territory and of the other territories for which it has international responsibility, except such separate customs territories as it shall notify to the Director-General of the Organization at the time of its own acceptance.

(b) Any government, which has so notified the Director-General under the exceptions in sub-paragraph (a) of this paragraph, may at any time give notice to the Director-General that its acceptance shall be effective in respect of any separate customs territory or territories so excepted and such notice shall take effect on the thirtieth day following the day on which it is received by the Director-General.

(c) If any of the customs territories, in respect of which a contracting party has accepted this Agreement, possesses or acquires full autonomy in the conduct of its external commercial relations and of the other matters provided for in this Agreement, such territory shall, upon sponsorship through a declaration by the responsible contracting party establishing the above-mentioned fact, be deemed to be a contracting party and shall also be deemed to be a Member of the Organization.

6. This Agreement shall enter into force, as among the governments which have accepted it, on the thirtieth day following the day on which instruments of acceptance have been deposited with the Director-General of the Organization on behalf of governments named in Annex G, the territories of which account for 85 per centum of the total external trade of the territories of such governments, computed in accordance with the applicable column of percentages set forth therein. The instrument of acceptance of each other government shall take effect on the thirtieth day following the day on which such instrument has been deposited.

7. The United Nations is authorized to effect registration of this Agreement as soon as it enters into force.

Article XXVII

Withholding or Withdrawal of Concessions

Any contracting party shall at any time be free to withhold or to withdraw in whole or in part any concession, provided for in the appropriate Schedule annexed to this Agreement, in respect of which such contracting party determines that it was initially negotiated with a government which has not become, or has ceased to be, a contracting party. A contracting party taking such action shall notify the Organization and, upon request, consult with contracting parties which have a substantial interest in the product concerned.

Article XXVIII

Modification of Schedules

1. On the first day of each three-year period, the first period beginning on 1 January 1958 (or on the first day of any other period that may be specified by the Organization by two-thirds of the votes cast) a contracting party (hereafter in this Article referred to as the "applicant contracting party") may, by negotiation and agreement with any contracting party with which such concession was initially negotiated and with any other contracting party determined by the Organization to have a principal supplying interest (which two preceding categories of contracting parties, together with the applicant contracting party, are in this Article hereinafter referred to as the "contracting parties primarily concerned"), and subject to consultation with any other contracting party determined by the Organization to have a substantial interest in such concession, modify or withdraw a concession included in the appropriate Schedule annexed to this Agreement.

2. In such negotiations and agreement, which may include provision for compensatory adjustment with respect to other products, the contracting parties concerned shall endeavour to maintain a general level of reciprocal and mutually advantageous concessions not less favourable to trade than that provided for in this Agreement prior to such negotiations.

3. (a) If agreement between the contracting parties primarily concerned cannot be reached before 1 January 1958 or before the expiration of a period envisaged in paragraph 1 of this Article, the contracting party which proposes to modify or withdraw the concession shall, nevertheless, be free to do so and if such action is taken any contracting party with which such concession was initially negotiated, any contracting party determined under paragraph 1 to have a principal supplying interest and any contracting party determined under paragraph 1 to have a substantial interest shall then be free not later than six months after such action is taken, to withdraw, upon the expiration of thirty days from the day on which written notice of such withdrawal is received by the Organization, substantially equivalent concessions initially negotiated with the applicant contracting party.

(b) If agreement between the contracting parties primarily concerned is reached but any other contracting party determined under paragraph 1 of this Article to have a substantial interest is not satisfied, such other contracting party shall be free, not later than six months after action under such agreement is taken, to withdraw, upon the expiration of thirty days from the day on which written notice of such withdrawal is received by the Organization, substantially equivalent concessions initially negotiated with the applicant contracting party.

4. The Organization may, at any time, in special circumstances, authorize a contracting party to enter into negotiations for modification or withdrawal of a concession included in the appropriate Schedule annexed to this Agreement subject to the following procedures and conditions:

- (a) Such negotiations and any related consultations shall be conducted in accordance with the provisions of paragraphs 1 and 2 of this Article.
- (b) If agreement between the contracting parties primarily concerned is reached in the negotiations, the provisions of paragraph 3 (b) of this Article shall apply.
- (c) If agreement between the contracting parties primarily concerned is not reached within a period of sixty days after negotiations have been authorized, or within such longer period as the Organization may have prescribed, the applicant contracting party may refer the matter to the Organization.
- (d) Upon such reference, the Organization shall promptly examine the matter and submit their views to the contracting parties primarily concerned with the aim of achieving a settlement. If a settlement is reached, the provisions of paragraph 3 (b) shall apply as if agreement between the contracting parties primarily concerned had been reached. If no settlement is reached between the contracting parties primarily concerned, the applicant contracting party shall be free to modify or withdraw the concession, unless the Organization determines that the applicant contracting party has unreasonably failed to offer adequate compensation. If such action is taken, any contracting party with which the concession was initially negotiated, any contracting party determined under paragraph 4 (a) to have a principal supplying interest and any contracting party determined under paragraph 4 (a) to have a substantial interest, shall be free, not later than six months after such action is taken, to modify or withdraw, upon the expiration of thirty days from the day on which written notice of such withdrawal is received by the Organization, substantially equivalent concessions initially negotiated with the applicant contracting party.

5. Before 1 January 1958 and before the end of any period envisaged in paragraph 1 a contracting party may elect by notifying the Organization to reserve the right, for the duration of the next period, to modify the appropriate Schedule in accordance with the procedures of paragraphs 1 to 3. If a contracting party so elects, other contracting parties shall have the right, during the same period, to modify or withdraw, in accordance with the same procedures, concessions initially negotiated with that contracting party.

Article XXIX

Tariff Negotiations

1. The contracting parties recognize that customs duties often constitute serious obstacles to trade; thus negotiations on a reciprocal and mutually advantageous basis, directed to the substantial reduction of the general level of tariffs and other charges on imports and exports and in particular to the reduction of such high tariffs as discourage the importation even of minimum quantities, and conducted with due regard to the objectives of this Agreement and the varying needs of individual contracting parties, are of great importance to the expansion of international trade. The Organization may therefore sponsor such negotiations from time to time.

2. (a) Negotiations under this Article may be carried out on a selective product-by-product basis or by the application of such multilateral procedures as may be accepted by the contracting parties concerned. Such negotiations may be directed towards the reduction of duties, the binding of duties at then existing levels or undertakings that individual duties or the average duties on specified categories of products shall not exceed specified levels. The binding against increase of low duties or of duty-free treatment shall, in principle, be recognized as a concession equivalent in value to the reduction of high duties.

(b) The contracting parties recognize that in general the success of multilateral negotiations would depend on the participation of all contracting parties which conduct a substantial proportion of their external trade with one another.

3. Negotiations shall be conducted on a basis which affords adequate opportunity to take into account:

- (a) the needs of individual contracting parties and individual industries;
- (b) the needs of less-developed countries for a more flexible use of tariff protection to assist their economic development and the special needs of these countries to maintain tariffs for revenue purposes; and

- (c) all other relevant circumstances, including the fiscal, developmental, strategic and other needs of the contracting parties concerned.

Article XXX

Amendments

1. (a) Except as provided for in paragraph 3 of this Article, amendments to the provisions of this Agreement shall be made in accordance with the provisions of this paragraph.

(b) Amendments to the provisions of this Agreement shall be submitted to the contracting parties for acceptance in accordance with sub-paragraphs (c) and (d) below; Provided that such amendments have been approved by the Organization by a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast.

(c) Amendments to the provisions of Part I of this Agreement or of this Article shall become effective on the thirtieth day following the day on which they have been accepted by all the contracting parties.

(d) Other amendments to this Agreement shall become effective in respect of those contracting parties which have accepted them on the thirtieth day following the day on which they have been accepted by two-thirds of the contracting parties, and thereafter for each other contracting party on the thirtieth day following the day on which they have been accepted by it.

2. (a) The Organization may decide that any amendment made effective under paragraph 1 (d) of this Article is of such a nature that any contracting party which has not accepted it within a period specified by the Organization shall be free to withdraw from this Agreement or to remain a contracting party with the consent of the Organization.

(b) A withdrawal from this Agreement under sub-paragraph (a) of this paragraph shall take effect upon the expiration of the sixtieth day following the day on which written notice of withdrawal is received by the Director-General of the Organization. A contracting party which, in the circumstances described in sub-paragraph (a), fails to accept the amendment or to give notice of withdrawal, shall cease to be a contracting party upon the expiration of the period referred to in that sub-paragraph or on the sixtieth day following the day on which the Organization shall have decided to withhold their consent to the contracting party remaining a contracting party, whichever date is the later.

3. Any amendment to the schedules annexed to this Agreement which records rectifications of a purely formal character or modifications resulting from action taken under paragraph 6 of Article III, Article XVIII, Article XXIV, Article XXVII or Article XXVIII, shall become effective on the thirtieth day following certification to this effect by the Organization; Provided that prior to such certification, all contracting parties have been notified of the proposed amendment and no objection has been raised, within thirty days of such notification by any contracting party, on the ground that the proposed amendments are not within the terms of this paragraph.

Article XXXI

Withdrawal

Without prejudice to the provisions of paragraph 12 of Article XVIII or of paragraph 2 of Article XXX, any contracting party may withdraw from this Agreement, or may separately withdraw on behalf of any of the separate customs territories for which it has international responsibility and which at the time possesses full autonomy in the conduct of its external commercial relations and of the other matters provided for in this Agreement. The withdrawal shall take effect upon the expiration of six months from the day on which written notice of withdrawal is received by the Director-General of the Organization.

Article XXXII

Contracting Parties

1. The contracting parties to this Agreement shall be understood to mean those governments which are applying the provisions of this Agreement under Articles XXVI or XXXIII or pursuant to the Protocol of Provisional Application.

2. At any time after the entry into force of this Agreement pursuant to paragraph 6 of Article XXVI, those contracting parties which have accepted this Agreement pursuant to paragraph 4 of Article XXVI may decide that any contracting party which has not so accepted it shall cease to be a contracting party.

Article XXXIII

Accession

A government not a contracting party to this Agreement may accede thereto on terms to be agreed between such government and the Organization; Provided that such government has accepted the Agreement on the Organization for Trade Cooperation. Decisions of the Organization under this paragraph shall be taken by a majority comprising two-thirds of the contracting parties.

Article XXXIV

Annexes

The annexes to this Agreement are hereby made an integral part of this Agreement.

Article XXXV

Non-application of the Agreement between particular Contracting Parties

1. This Agreement, or alternatively Article III of this Agreement shall not apply as between any contracting party and any other contracting party if:

- (a) the two contracting parties have not entered into tariff negotiations with each other, and
- (b) either of the contracting parties, at the time either becomes a contracting party, does not consent to such application.

2. The Organization may review the operation of this Article in particular cases at the request of any contracting party and make appropriate recommendations.

Dependent territories of the Commonwealth of Australia
New Zealand
Dependent territories of New Zealand
Union of South Africa including South West Africa Ireland
India
Pakistan
Southern Rhodesia Burma
Ceylon

Certain of the territories listed above have two or more preferential rates in force for certain products. Any such territory may, by agreement with the other contracting parties which are principal suppliers of such products at the most-favoured-nation rate, substitute for such preferential rates a single preferential rate which shall not on the whole be less favourable to suppliers at the most-favoured-nation rate than the preferences in force prior to such substitution.

The imposition of an equivalent margin of tariff preference to replace a margin of preference in an internal tax existing on 10 April 1947, exclusively between two or more of the territories listed in this Annex or to replace the preferential quantitative arrangements described in the following paragraph, shall not be deemed to constitute an increase in a margin of tariff preference.

The preferential arrangements referred to in paragraph 5 (b) of Article XIV are those existing in the United Kingdom on 10 April 1947 under contractual agreements with the Governments of Canada, Australia and New Zealand, in respect of chilled and frozen beef and veal, frozen mutton and lamb, chilled and frozen pork, and bacon. It is the intention, without prejudice to any action taken under subparagraph (h) of Article XX, that these arrangements shall be eliminated or replaced by tariff preferences, and that negotiations to this end shall take place as soon as practicable among the countries substantially concerned or involved.

The film hire tax in force in New Zealand on 10 April 1947, shall, for the purposes of this Agreement, be treated as a customs duty under Article II. The renters' film quota in force in New Zealand on 10 April 1947, shall, for the purposes of this Agreement, be treated as a screen quota under Article IV.

PERCENTAGE SHARES OF TOTAL EXTERNAL TRADE TO BE USED FOR THE PURPOSE OF MAKING THE DETERMINATION REFERRED TO IN

(based on the average of 1949-1953)

If, prior to the accession of the Government of Japan to the General Agreement, the present Agreement has been accepted by contracting parties the external trade of which under column I accounts for the percentage of such trade specified in paragraph 6 of Article XXVI, column I shall be applicable for the purposes of that paragraph. If the present Agreement has not been so accepted prior to the accession of the Government of Japan, column II shall be applicable for the purposes of that paragraph.

ANNEX H

NOTES AND SUPPLEMENTARY PROVISIONS

Ad Article IIParagraph 1.

The obligations incorporated in paragraph 1 of Article II by reference to paragraphs 2 and 4 of Article IV and those incorporated in paragraph 2 (b) of Article III by reference to Article VI shall be considered as falling within Part II for the purposes of the Protocol of Provisional Application.

Paragraph 4.

The term "margin of preference" means the absolute difference between the most-favoured-nation rate of duty and the preferential rate of duty for the like product, and not the proportionate relations between those rates. As examples:

- (1) If the most-favoured-nation rate were 36 per cent ad valorem and the preferential rate were 24 per cent ad valorem, the margin of preference would be 12 per cent ad valorem, and not one-third of the most-favoured-nation rate;
- (2) If the most-favoured-nation rate were 36 per cent ad valorem and the preferential rate were expressed as two-thirds of the most-favoured-nation rate, the margin of preference would be 12 per cent ad valorem;
- (3) If the most-favoured-nation rate were 2 francs per kilogramme and the preferential rate were 1.50 francs per kilogramme, the margin of preference would be 0.50 francs per kilogramme.

The following kinds of customs action, taken in accordance with established uniform procedures, would not be contrary to a general binding of margins of preference:

- (i) The re-application to an imported product of a tariff classification or rate of duty, properly applicable to such product, in cases in which the application of such classification or rate to such product was temporarily suspended or inoperative on April 10, 1947; and
- (ii) The classification of a particular product under a tariff item other than that under which importations of that product were classified on April 10, 1947, in cases in which the tariff law clearly contemplates that such product may be classified under more than one tariff item.

Ad Article IIIParagraph 2 (b).

See the note relating to paragraph 1 of Article II.

Paragraph 4.

The provisions of this paragraph will be applied in the light of the following:

1. The protection afforded through the operation of an import monopoly in respect of products described in the appropriate schedule shall be limited by means of:

- (a) a maximum import duty that may be applied in respect of the product concerned; or
- (b) any other mutually satisfactory arrangement consistent with the provisions of this Agreement; any contracting party entering into negotiations with a view to concluding such arrangement shall afford to other interested contracting parties an opportunity for consultation.

2. The import duty mentioned in 1 (a) above shall represent the margin by which the price charged by the import monopoly for the imported product (exclusive of internal taxes conforming to the provisions of Article IV, transportation, distribution, and other expenses incident to the purchase, sale or further processing, and a reasonable margin of profit) exceeds the landed cost; Provided that regard may be had to average landed costs and selling prices over recent periods; and Provided further that, where the product concerned is a primary commodity which is the subject of a domestic price stabilization arrangement, provisions may be made for adjustment to take account of wide fluctuations or variations in world prices, subject to agreement between the countries parties to the negotiations.

Ad Article IV

Any internal tax or other internal charge, or any law, regulation or requirement of the kind referred to in paragraph 1 which applies to an imported product and to the like domestic product and is collected or enforced in the case of the imported product at the time or point of importation, is nevertheless to be regarded as an internal tax or other internal charge, or a law, regulation or requirement of the kind referred to in paragraph 1, and is accordingly subject to the provisions of Article IV.

Paragraph 1.

The application of paragraph 1 to internal taxes imposed by local governments and authorities within the territory of a contracting party is subject to the provisions of the final paragraph of Article XXIV. The term "reasonable measures" in the last-mentioned paragraph would not require, for example, the repeal of existing national legislation authorizing local governments to impose internal taxes which, although technically inconsistent with the letter of Article IV, are not in fact inconsistent with its spirit, if such repeal would result in a serious financial hardship for the local governments or authorities concerned. With regard to taxation by local governments or authorities which is inconsistent with both the letter and spirit of Article IV, the term "reasonable measures" would permit a contracting party to eliminate the inconsistent taxation gradually over a transition period, if abrupt action would create serious administrative and financial difficulties.

Paragraph 2.

A tax conforming to the requirements of the first sentence of paragraph 2 would be considered to be inconsistent with the provisions of the second sentence only in cases where competition was involved between, on the one hand, the taxed product and, on the other hand, a directly competitive or substitutable product which was not similarly taxed.

Paragraph 5.

Regulations consistent with the provisions of the first sentence of paragraph 5 shall not be considered to be contrary to the provisions of the second sentence in any case in which all of the products subject to the regulations are produced domestically in substantial quantities. A regulation cannot be justified as being consistent with the provisions of the second sentence on the ground that the proportion or amount allocated to each of the products which are the subject of the regulation constitutes an equitable relationship between imported and domestic products.

Ad Article V

Paragraph 5.

With regard to transportation charges, the principle laid down in paragraph 5 refers to like products being transported on the same route under like conditions.

Ad Article VI

Paragraph 1.

1. Hidden dumping by associated houses (that is, the sale by an importer at a price below that corresponding to the price invoiced by an exporter with whom the importer is associated, and also below the price in the exporting country) constitutes a form of price dumping with respect to which the margin of dumping may be calculated on the basis of the price at which the goods are resold by the importer.

2. It is recognized that, in the case of imports from a country which has a complete or substantially complete monopoly of its trade and where all domestic prices are fixed by the State, special difficulties may exist in determining price comparability for the purposes of paragraph 1, and in such cases importing contracting parties may find it necessary to take into account the possibility that a strict comparison with domestic prices in such a country may not always be appropriate.

Paragraphs 2 and 3.

1. As in many other cases in customs administration, a contracting party may require reasonable security (bond or cash deposit) for the payment of anti-dumping or countervailing duty pending final determination of the facts in any case of suspected dumping or subsidization.

2. Multiple currency practices can in certain circumstances constitute a subsidy to exports which may be met by countervailing duties under paragraph 3 or can constitute a form of dumping by means of a partial depreciation of a country's currency which may be met by action under paragraph 2. By "multiple currency practices" is meant practices by governments or sanctioned by governments.

Paragraph 6 (b).

Waivers under the provisions of this sub-paragraph shall be granted only on application by the contracting party proposing to levy an anti-dumping or countervailing duty, as the case may be.

Ad Article VII

Paragraph 1.

The expression "or other charges" is not to be regarded as including internal taxes or equivalent charges imposed on or in connection with imported products.

Paragraph 2.

1. It would be in conformity with Article VII to presume that "actual value" may be represented by the invoice price, plus any non-included charges for legitimate costs which are proper elements of "actual value" and plus any abnormal discount or other reduction from the ordinary competitive price.

2. It would be in conformity with Article VII, paragraph 2 (b), for a contracting party to construe the phrase "in the ordinary course of trade . . . under fully competitive conditions", as excluding any transaction wherein the buyer and seller are not independent of each other and price is not the sole consideration.

3. The standard of "fully competitive conditions" permits a contracting party to exclude from consideration prices involving special discounts limited to exclusive agents.

4. The wording of sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) permits a contracting party to determine the value for customs purposes uniformly either (1) on the basis of a particular exporter's prices of the imported merchandise, or (2) on the basis of the general price level of like merchandise.

Ad Article VIII

1. While Article VIII does not cover the use of multiple rates of exchange as such, paragraphs 1 and 4 condemn the use of exchange taxes or fees as a device for implementing multiple currency practices; if, however, a contracting party is using multiple currency exchange fees for balance of payments reasons with the approval of the International Monetary Fund, the provisions of paragraph 9 (a) of Article XV fully safeguard its position.

2. It would be consistent with paragraph 1 if, on the importation of products from the territory of a contracting party into the territory of another contracting party, the production of certificates of origin should only be required to the extent that is strictly indispensable.

Ad Articles XI, XII, XIII and XIV

Throughout Articles XI, XII, XIII and XIV the terms "import restrictions" or "export restrictions" include restrictions made effective through state-trading operations.

Ad Article XI

Paragraph 2 (c).

The term "in any form" in this paragraph covers the same products when in an early stage of processing and still perishable, which compete directly with the fresh product and if freely imported would tend to make the restriction on the fresh product ineffective.

Paragraph 2, last sub-paragraph.

The term "special factors" include changes in relative productive efficiency as between domestic and foreign producers, or as between different foreign producers, but not changes artificially brought about by means not permitted under the Agreement.

Ad Article XII

The Organization shall make provision for the utmost secrecy in the conduct of any consultation under the provisions of this Article.

Paragraph 3 (c) (i).

Contracting parties applying restrictions shall endeavour to avoid causing serious prejudice to exports of a commodity on which the economy of a contracting party is largely dependent.

Paragraph 4 (b).

It is agreed that the date shall be within ninety days after the entry into force of the amendments of this Article effected by the Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III of this Agreement. However, should the Organization find that conditions were not suitable for the application of the provisions of this sub-paragraph at the time envisaged, it may determine a later date; Provided that such date is not more than thirty days after such time as the obligations of Article VIII, Sections 2, 3 and 4 of the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund become applicable to contracting parties, members of the Fund, the combined foreign trade of which constitutes at least fifty per centum of the aggregate foreign trade of all contracting parties.

Paragraph 4 (e).

It is agreed that paragraph 4 (e) does not add any new criteria for the imposition or maintenance of quantitative restrictions for balance of payments reasons. It is solely intended to ensure that all external factors such as changes in the terms of trade, quantitative restrictions, excessive tariffs and subsidies, which may be contributing to the balance of payments difficulties of the contracting party applying restrictions will be fully taken into account.

Ad Article XIII

Paragraph 2 (d).

No mention was made of "commercial considerations" as a rule for the allocation of quotas because it was considered that its application by governmental authorities might not always be practicable. Moreover, in cases where it is practicable, a contracting party could apply these considerations in the process of seeking agreement, consistently with the general rule laid down in the opening sentence of paragraph 2.

Paragraph 4.

See note relating to "special factors" in connection with the last sub-paragraph of paragraph 2 of Article XI.

Ad Article XIV

Paragraph 1.

The provisions of this paragraph shall not be so construed as to preclude full consideration by the Organization, in the consultations provided for in paragraph 4 of Article XII and in paragraph 12 of Article XVIII, of the nature, effects and reasons for discrimination in the field of import restrictions.

Paragraph 2.

One of the situations contemplated in paragraph 2 is that of a contracting party holding balances acquired as a result of current transactions which it finds itself unable to use without a measure of discrimination.

Ad Article XV

Paragraph 4.

The word "frustrate" is intended to indicate, for example, that infringements of the letter of any Article of this Agreement by exchange action shall not be regarded as a violation of that Article if, in practice, there is no appreciable departure from the intent of the Article. Thus, a contracting party which, as part of its exchange control operated in accordance with the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund, requires payment to be received for its exports in its own currency or in the currency of one or more members of the International Monetary Fund will not thereby be deemed to contravene Article XI or Article XIII. Another example would be that of a contracting party which specifies on an import licence the country from which the goods may be imported, for the purpose not of introducing any additional element of discrimination in its import licensing system but of enforcing permissible exchange controls.

Ad Article XVI

The exemption of an exported product from duties or taxes borne by the like product when destined for domestic consumption, or the remission of such duties or taxes in amounts not in excess of those which have accrued, shall not be deemed to be a subsidy.

Section B.

1. Nothing in Section B shall preclude the use by a contracting party of multiple rates of exchange in accordance with the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund.

2. For the purposes of Section B, a "primary product" is understood to be any product of farm, forest or fishery, or any mineral, in its natural form or which has undergone such processing as is customarily required to prepare it for marketing in substantial volume in international trade.

Paragraph 3.

1. The fact that a contracting party has not exported the product in question during the previous representative period would not in itself preclude that contracting party from establishing its right to obtain a share of the trade in the product concerned.

2. A system for the stabilization of the domestic price or of the return to domestic producers of a primary product independently of the movements of export prices, which results at times in the sale of the product for export at a price lower than the comparable price charged for the like product to buyers in the domestic market, shall be considered not to involve a subsidy on exports within the meaning of paragraph 3 if the Organization determines that:

- (a) the system has also resulted, or is so designed as to result, in the sale of the product for export at a price higher than the comparable price charged for the like product to buyers in the domestic market; and
- (b) the system is so operated, or is designed so to operate, either because of the effective regulation of production or otherwise, as not to stimulate exports unduly or otherwise seriously to prejudice the interests of other contracting parties.

Notwithstanding such determination by the Organization, operations under such a system shall be subject to the provisions of paragraph 3 where they are wholly or partly financed out of government funds in addition to the funds collected from producers in respect of the product concerned.

Paragraph 4.

The intention of paragraph 4 is that the contracting parties should seek before the end of 1957 to reach agreement to abolish all remaining subsidies as from 1 January 1958; or, failing this, to reach agreement to extend the application of the standstill until the earliest date thereafter by which they can expect to reach such agreement.

Ad Article XVIIParagraph 1.

The operations of Marketing Boards, which are established by contracting parties and are engaged in purchasing or selling, are subject to the provisions of sub-paragraphs (a) and (b).

The activities of Marketing Boards which are established by contracting parties and which do not purchase or sell but lay down regulations covering private trade are governed by the relevant Articles of this Agreement.

The charging by a state enterprise of different prices for its sales of a product in different markets is not precluded by the provisions of this Article, provided that such different prices are charged for commercial reasons, to meet conditions of supply and demand in export markets.

Paragraph 1 (a).

Governmental measures imposed to ensure standards of quality and efficiency in the operation of external trade, or privileges granted for the exploitation of national natural resources but which do not empower the government to exercise control over the trading activities of the enterprise in question, do not constitute "exclusive or special privileges".

Paragraph 1 (b).

A country receiving a "tied loan" is free to take this loan into account as a "commercial consideration" when purchasing requirements abroad.

Paragraph 2.

The term "goods" is limited to products as understood in commercial practice, and is not intended to include the purchase or sale of services.

Paragraph 3.

Negotiations which contracting parties agree to conduct under this paragraph may be directed towards the reduction of duties and other charges on imports and exports or towards the conclusion of any other mutually satisfactory arrangement consistent with the provisions of this Agreement. (See paragraph 4 of Article III and the note to that paragraph.)

Paragraph 4 (b).

The term "import mark-up" in this paragraph shall represent the margin by which the price charged by the import monopoly for the imported product (exclusive of internal taxes within the purview of Article IV, transportation, distribution, and other expenses incident to the purchase, sale or further processing, and a reasonable margin of profit) exceeds the landed cost.

Ad Article XVIII

The Organization and the contracting parties concerned shall preserve the utmost secrecy in respect of matters arising under this Article.

Paragraphs 1 and 4.

1. When they consider whether the economy of a contracting party "can only support low standards of living", the Organization shall take into consideration the normal position of that economy and shall not base their determination on exceptional circumstances such as those which may result from the temporary existence of exceptionally favourable conditions for the staple export product or products of such contracting party.

2. The phrase "in the early stages of development" is not meant to apply only to contracting parties which have just started their economic development, but also to contracting parties the economies of which are undergoing a process of industrialization to correct an excessive dependence on primary production.

Paragraphs 2, 3, 7, 13 and 22.

The reference to the establishment of particular industries shall apply not only to the establishment of a new industry, but also to the establishment of a new branch of production in an existing industry and to the substantial transformation of an existing industry, and to the substantial expansion of an existing industry supplying a relatively small proportion of the domestic demand. It shall also cover the reconstruction of an industry destroyed or substantially damaged as a result of hostilities or natural disasters.

Paragraph 7 (b).

A modification or withdrawal, pursuant to paragraph 7 (b), by a contracting party, other than the applicant contracting party, referred to in paragraph 7 (a), shall be made within six months of the day on which the action is taken by the applicant contracting party, and shall become effective on the thirtieth day following the day on which such modification or withdrawal has been notified to the Organization.

Paragraph 11.

The second sentence in paragraph 11 shall not be interpreted to mean that a contracting party is required to relax or remove restrictions if such relaxation or removal would thereupon produce conditions justifying the intensification or institution, respectively, of restrictions under paragraph 9 of Article XVIII.

Paragraph 12 (b).

The date referred to in paragraph 12 (b) shall be the date determined by the Organization in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 4 (b) of Article XII of this Agreement.

Paragraphs 13 and 14.

It is recognized that, before deciding on the introduction of a measure and notifying the Organization in accordance with paragraph 14, a contracting party may need a reasonable period of time to assess the competitive position of the industry concerned.

Paragraphs 15 and 16.

It is understood that the Organization shall invite a contracting party proposing to apply a measure under Section C to consult with it pursuant to paragraph 16 if it is requested to do so by a contracting party the trade of which would be appreciably affected by the measure in question.

Paragraphs 16, 18, 19 and 22.

1. It is understood that the Organization may concur in a proposed measure subject to specific conditions or limitations. If the measure as applied does not conform to the terms of the concurrence it will to that extent be deemed a measure in which the Organization has not concurred. In cases in which the Organization has concurred in a measure for a specified period, the contracting party concerned, if it finds that the maintenance of the measure for a further period of time is required to achieve the objective for which the measure was originally taken, may apply to the Organization for an extension of that period in accordance with the provisions and procedures of Section C or D, as the case may be.

2. It is expected that the Organization will, as a rule, refrain from concurring in a measure which is likely to cause serious prejudice to exports of a commodity on which the economy of a contracting party is largely dependent.

Paragraphs 18 and 22.

The phrase "that the interests of other contracting parties are adequately safeguarded" is meant to provide latitude sufficient to permit consideration in each case of the most appropriate method of safeguarding those interests. The appropriate method may, for instance, take the form of an additional concession to be applied by the contracting party having recourse to Section C or D during such time as the deviation from the other Articles of the Agreement would remain in force or of the temporary suspension by any other contracting party referred to in paragraph 18 of a concession substantially equivalent to the impairment due to the introduction of the measure in question. Such contracting party would have the right to safeguard its interests through such a temporary suspension of a concession; Provided that this right will not be exercised when, in the case of a measure imposed by a contracting party coming within the scope of paragraph 4 (a), the Organization has determined that the extent of the compensatory concession proposed was adequate.

Paragraph 19.

The provisions of paragraph 19 are intended to cover the cases where an industry has been in existence beyond the "reasonable period of time" referred to in the note to paragraphs 13 and 14, and should not be so construed as to deprive a contracting party coming within the scope of paragraph 4 (a) of Article XVIII, of its right to resort to the other provisions of Section C, including paragraph 17, with regard to a newly established industry even though it has benefited from incidental protection afforded by balance of payments import restrictions.

Paragraph 21.

Any measure taken pursuant to the provisions of paragraph 21 shall be withdrawn forthwith if the action taken in accordance with paragraph 17 is withdrawn or if the Organization concurs in the measure proposed after the expiration of the ninety-day time limit specified in paragraph 17.

Ad Article XXSub-paragraph (h).

The exception provided for in this sub-paragraph extends to any commodity agreement which conforms to the principles approved by the Economic and Social Council in its Resolution 30 (IV) of 28 March 1947.¹

Ad Article XXIVParagraph 9.

It is understood that the provisions of Article II would require that, when a product which has been imported into the territory of a member of a customs union or free-trade area at a preferential rate of duty is reexported to the territory of another member of such union or area, the latter member should collect a duty equal to the difference between the duty already paid and any higher duty that would be payable if the product were being imported directly into its territory.

Paragraph 11.

Measures adopted by India and Pakistan in order to carry out definitive trade arrangements between them, once they have been agreed upon, might depart from particular provisions of this Agreement, but these measures would in general be consistent with the objectives of the Agreement.

Ad Article XXVIII

The Organization and each contracting party concerned should arrange to conduct the negotiations and consultations with the greatest possible secrecy in order to avoid premature disclosure of details of prospective tariff changes. The Organization shall be informed immediately of all changes in national tariffs resulting from recourse to this Article.

Paragraph 1.

1. If the Organization specifies a period other than a three-year period, a contracting party may act pursuant to paragraph 1 or paragraph 3 of Article XXVIII on the first day following the expiration of such other period and, unless the Organization has again specified another period, subsequent periods will be three-year periods following the expiration of such specified period.

2. The provision that on 1 January 1958, and on other days determined pursuant to paragraph 1, a contracting party "may . . . modify or withdraw a concession" means that on such day, and on the first day after the end of each period, the legal obligation of such contracting party under Article III is altered; it does not mean that the changes in its customs tariff should necessarily be made effective on that day. If a tariff change resulting from negotiations undertaken pursuant to this Article is delayed, the entry into force of any compensatory concessions may be similarly delayed.

3. Not earlier than six months, nor later than three months, prior to 1 January 1958, or to the termination date of any subsequent period, a contracting party wishing to modify or withdraw any concession embodied in the appropriate Schedule, should notify the Organization to this effect. The Organization shall then determine the contracting party or contracting parties with which the negotiations or consultations referred to in paragraph 1 shall take place. Any contracting party so determined shall participate in such negotiations or consultations with the applicant contracting party with the aim of reaching agreement before the end of the period. Any extension of the assured life of the Schedules shall relate to the Schedules as modified after such negotiations, in accordance with paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 of Article XXVIII. If the Organization is arranging for multilateral tariff negotiations to take place within the period of six months before 1 January 1958, or before any other day determined pursuant to paragraph 1, it shall include in the arrangements for such negotiations suitable procedures for carrying out the negotiations referred to in this paragraph.

4. The object of providing for the participation in the negotiations of any contracting party with a principal supplying interest, in addition to any contracting party with which the concession was initially negotiated, is to ensure that a contracting party with a larger share in the trade affected by the concession than a contracting party with which the concession was initially negotiated shall have an effective opportunity to protect the contractual right which it enjoys under this Agreement. On the other hand, it is not intended that the scope of the negotiations should be such as to make negotiations and agreement under Article XXVIII unduly difficult nor to create complications in the application of this Article in the future to concessions which result from negotiations thereunder. Accordingly, the Organization should only determine that a contracting party has a principal supplying interest if that contracting party has had, over a reasonable period of time prior to the negotiations, a larger share in the market of the applicant contracting party than a contracting party with which the concession was initially negotiated or would, in the judgment of the Organization, have had such a share in the absence of discriminatory quantitative restrictions maintained by the applicant contracting party. It would therefore not be appropriate for the Organization to determine that more than one contracting party, or in those exceptional cases where there is near equality more than two contracting parties, had a principal supplying interest.

5. Notwithstanding the definition of a principal supplying interest in note 4 to paragraph 1, the Organization may exceptionally determine that a contracting party has a principal supplying interest if the concession in question affects trade which constitutes a major part of the total exports of such contracting party.

6. It is not intended that provision for participation in the negotiations of any contracting party with a principal supplying interest, and for consultation with any contracting party having a substantial interest in the concession which the applicant contracting party is seeking to modify or withdraw, should have the effect that it should have to pay compensation or suffer retaliation greater than the withdrawal or modification sought, judged in the light of the conditions of trade at the time of the proposed withdrawal or modification, making allowance for any discriminatory quantitative restrictions maintained by the applicant contracting party.

7. The expression "substantial interest" is not capable of a precise definition and accordingly may present difficulties for the Organization. It is, however, intended to be construed to cover only those contracting parties which have, or in the absence of discriminatory quantitative restrictions affecting their exports could reasonably be expected to have, a significant share in the market of the contracting party seeking to modify or withdraw the concession.

Paragraph 4.

1. Any request for authorization to enter into negotiations shall be accompanied by all relevant statistical and other data. A decision on such request shall be made within thirty days of its submission.

2. It is recognized that to permit certain contracting parties, depending in large measure on a relatively small number of primary commodities and relying on the tariff as an important aid for furthering diversification of their economies or as an important source of revenue, normally to negotiate for the modification or withdrawal of concessions only under paragraph 1 of Article XXVIII, might cause them at such a time to make modifications or withdrawals which in the long run would prove unnecessary. To avoid such a situation the Organization shall authorize any such contracting party, under paragraph 4, to enter into negotiations unless they consider this would result in, or contribute substantially towards, such an increase in tariff levels as to threaten the stability of the Schedules to this Agreement or lead to undue disturbance of international trade.

3. It is expected that negotiations authorized under paragraph 4 for modification or withdrawal of a single item, or a very small group of items, could normally be brought to a conclusion in sixty days. It is recognized, however, that such a period will be inadequate for cases involving negotiations for the modification or withdrawal of a larger number of items and in such cases, therefore, it would be appropriate for the Organization to prescribe a longer period.

4. The determination referred to in paragraph 4 (d) shall be made by the Organization within thirty days of the submission of the matter to it, unless the applicant contracting party agrees to a longer period.

5. In determining under paragraph 4 (d) whether an applicant contracting party has unreasonably failed to offer adequate compensation, it is understood that the Organization will take due account of the special position of a contracting party which has bound a high proportion of its tariffs at very low rates of duty and to this extent has less scope than other contracting parties to make compensatory adjustment.

Ad Article XXIX

Paragraph 3.

It is understood that the reference to fiscal needs would include the revenue aspect of duties and particularly duties imposed primarily for revenue purposes or duties imposed on products which can be substituted for products subject to revenue duties to prevent the avoidance of such duties.

Ad Article XXX

The acceptance of amendments pursuant to this paragraph shall be in such form as may be determined by the Organization.

Ad Article XXXIII

Similarly, a government, acting on behalf of a separate customs territory possessing full autonomy in the conduct of its external commercial relations and of other matters provided for in this Agreement, may accede to this Agreement on behalf of that territory on terms applicable thereto.

8. ORGANIZATION FOR TRADE COOPERATION (OTC): Agreement Between the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, March 10, 1955¹

PART I

GENERAL

Article 1—Establishment.

The Organization for Trade Cooperation (hereinafter referred to as "the Organization") is hereby established to further, as provided for in the General Agreement and herein, the achievement of the purposes and objectives set forth in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade² (herein referred to as "the General Agreement").

Article 2—Membership.

The Members of the Organization shall be the contracting parties to the General Agreement. Governments which become or cease to be contracting parties to the General Agreement shall become or cease to be Members of the Organization. The Organization may, by a two-thirds majority of the votes cast, invite governments which are not or which cease to be contracting parties to the General Agreement to participate in such activities of the Organization and on such terms as it shall decide; Provided that in no case shall such participation involve the right to vote or to be counted in determining the fulfilment of the relevant voting requirements when the Organization is exercising any function relating directly to the General Agreement.

Article 3—Functions.

(a) The Organization shall administer the General Agreement and generally facilitate the operation of that Agreement.

(b) In addition, the Organization shall have the following functions:

- (i) to facilitate intergovernmental consultations on questions relating to international trade;
- (ii) to sponsor international trade negotiations;

- (iii) to study questions of international trade and commercial policy and, where appropriate, make recommendations thereon;
- (iv) to collect, analyze and publish information and statistical data relating to international trade and commercial policy, due regard being paid to the activities in this field of other international bodies.

(c) The Organization shall, in carrying out these functions, endeavour to give full effect to the provisions of Article 1 of this Agreement.

(d) The Organization shall have no authority to amend the provisions of the General Agreement; no decision or other action of the Assembly or any subsidiary body of the Organization shall have the effect of imposing on a Member any new obligation which the Member has not specifically agreed to undertake.

PART II

STRUCTURE AND ADMINISTRATION OF THE ORGANIZATION

Article 4—Structure in General.

The Organization shall have an Assembly, an Executive Committee and a Secretariat.

Article 5—The Assembly.

(a) The Assembly shall consist of all the Members of the Organization.

(b) It shall be the responsibility of the Assembly to carry out the functions of the Organization.

(c) The Assembly shall determine the seat of the Organization.

(d) The Assembly shall meet in regular annual session and in such special sessions as may be convened in accordance with the rules of procedure.

(e) The Assembly shall establish its own rules of procedure and shall approve the rules of procedure of the Executive Committee and of any other subsidiary body.

Article 6—The Executive Committee.

(a) The Executive Committee shall consist of seventeen Members of the Organization elected periodically by the Assembly. Each election shall be for a single term and each Member shall be eligible for re-election. In such elections, the Assembly shall be guided by the following criteria:

- (i) the Executive Committee shall include the five Members of chief economic importance, in the determination of which particular regard shall be paid to their shares in international trade;
- (ii) the Executive Committee shall be representative of the broad geographical areas to which the Members belong;

(iii) the Executive Committee shall be representative of different degrees of economic development, different types of economies and different economic interests.

(b) The Executive Committee shall exercise the powers and perform the duties assigned to it by the Assembly by a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast. Decisions or recommendations of the Executive Committee shall be subject to a right of appeal to the Assembly by any Member in accordance with rules to be prescribed by the Assembly.

(c) Any Member of the Organization which is not a member of the Executive Committee shall be entitled to participate, without the right to vote, in the discussion by the Executive Committee of any matter of concern to it.

Article 7—The Secretariat.

(a) The Assembly shall appoint a Director-General as chief administrative officer of the Organization. The powers, duties, conditions of service and term of office of the Director-General shall conform to regulations approved by the Assembly.

(b) The Director-General or his representative shall be entitled to participate, without the right to vote, in all meetings of the Assembly and subsidiary bodies of the Organization.

(c) The Director-General shall appoint the members of the staff, and shall fix their duties and conditions of service in accordance with regulations approved by the Assembly.

(d) The selection of the members of the staff shall as far as possible be made on a wide geographical basis and with due regard to the various types of economy represented by Member countries. The paramount consideration in the selection of candidates and in determining the conditions of service of the staff shall be the necessity of securing the highest standards of efficiency, competence, impartiality and integrity.

(e) The responsibilities of the Director-General and of the members of the staff shall be exclusively international in character. In the discharge of their duties, they shall not seek or receive instructions from any government or from any other authority external to the Organization. They shall refrain from any action which might reflect on their position as international officials. The Members shall respect the international character of the responsibilities of these persons and shall not seek to influence them in the discharge of their duties.

Article 8—Voting.

(a) At meetings of the Assembly each Member of the Organization shall be entitled to have one vote and, except as otherwise provided for in the General Agreement or in this Agreement, decisions of the Assembly shall be taken by a majority of the votes cast.

(b) Each member of the Executive Committee and of other subsidiary bodies shall have one vote therein; Provided that the rules of procedure may require that parties to a dispute shall abstain from voting.

Article 9—Budget and Contributions.

(a) The Director-General shall present to the Assembly, through the Executive Committee, the annual budget estimates and financial statement of the Organization. The Assembly shall approve the accounts and the budget.

(b) The Assembly shall apportion the expenditures of the Organization among the Members, in accordance with a scale of contributions to be fixed by the Assembly, and each Member shall contribute promptly to the Organization its share of these expenditures.

(c) If a Member is in arrears in the payment of its contributions by an amount which equals or exceeds the amount of contributions due from it in respect of the preceding two completed financial years, the Member shall have no vote, and shall not be counted in the determining of the fulfilment of the relevant voting requirements, in the organs of the Organization. If the Assembly is satisfied that the failure to pay is due to circumstances beyond the control of the Member, it may, nevertheless, permit such a Member to vote, and then such Member shall be counted accordingly.

Article 10—Status.

(a) The Organization shall have legal personality.

(b) The Organization shall enjoy in the territory of each of the Members such legal capacity, privileges and immunities as may be necessary for the exercise of its functions.

(c) The representatives of the Members, and the officials of the Organization shall similarly enjoy such privileges and immunities as may be necessary for the independent exercise of their functions in connection with the Organization.

(d) The privileges and immunities to be accorded by a Member to the Organization, to its officials and to the representatives of its Members shall be similar to those accorded by that Member to specialized agencies of the United Nations, to their officials and to the representatives of their members, under the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the Specialized Agencies, or under similar arrangements.

Article 11—Relations with other Organizations.

(a) The Organization shall make arrangements with intergovernmental bodies and agencies which have related responsibilities to provide for effective cooperation and the avoidance of unnecessary duplication of activities.

(b) In pursuance of the provisions of the preceding paragraph, the Organization may, by an agreement approved by the Assembly, be brought into relationship with the United Nations, as one of the specialized agencies referred to in Article 57 of the Charter of the United Nations.

(c) The Organization may make suitable arrangements for consultation and cooperation with non-governmental organizations concerned with matters within the scope of the Organization.

PART III

SPECIAL PROVISIONS RELATING TO THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE GENERAL AGREEMENT*Article 12—Administration in General.*

The Organization shall give effect to those provisions of the General Agreement which provide for action by the Organization, and shall carry out such other activities in relation to the General Agreement which involve joint action. This shall include the taking of decisions, the sponsorship of negotiations and consultations, the conduct of studies, the circulation of proposals and the receipt of reports, in any case in which such action is required or appropriate to carry out the purposes of the General Agreement.

Article 13—Waivers in Exceptional Circumstances.

In exceptional circumstances, not elsewhere provided for in this Agreement, nor provided for in the General Agreement, the Assembly may waive an obligation imposed upon a contracting party by the General Agreement; Provided that any such decision shall be approved by a two-thirds majority of the votes cast and that such majority shall comprise more than half of the Members. The Assembly may also by such a vote (i) define certain categories of exceptional circumstances to which other voting requirements shall apply for the waiver of obligations imposed by the General Agreement upon a contracting party thereto, and (ii) prescribe such criteria as may be necessary for the application of this Article.

Article 14—Nullification and Impairment.

(a) If a claim that a benefit accruing directly or indirectly under the General Agreement is being nullified or impaired, or that the attainment of any objective of that Agreement is being impeded, is referred to the Organization in accordance with the provisions of that Agreement, the Organization shall promptly investigate the matter and shall make appropriate recommendations to the contracting parties to the General Agreement which it considers to be concerned, or give a ruling on the matter, as appropriate. The Organization may consult with contracting parties, with the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations, and with any appropriate intergovernmental organization in cases where it considers such consultation necessary.

(b) If the Organization considers that the circumstances are serious enough to justify such action, it may authorize a contracting party or parties to suspend the application to any other contracting party or parties of such concessions or other obligations under the General Agreement as it determines to be appropriate in the circumstances. If the application to any contracting party of any concession or other obligation is in fact suspended, that contracting party shall then be free, not later than sixty days after such action is taken, to give written notice to the Director-General of the Organization of its intention to withdraw from the General Agreement and such withdrawal shall take effect on the sixtieth day following the day on which such notice is received by him.

Article 15—Continued Application of Provisions of this Part.

The Members shall not, acting as contracting parties to the General Agreement, amend the General Agreement so as to provide therein for procedures, other than consultation, negotiation or recommendation, applicable to the general situations to which Articles 13 and 14 relate.

PART IV

OTHER PROVISIONS

Article 16—Amendments.

Amendments to this Agreement shall become effective, in respect of those Members which accept them, upon acceptance by two-thirds of the Members of the Organization and thereafter in respect of each other Member upon acceptance by it.

Article 17—Entry into Force.

(a) This Agreement shall be deposited, subject to the provisions of Article 21, with the Director-General of the Organization.

(b) This Agreement shall be opened at Geneva on 10 March 1955 for acceptance, by signature or otherwise, by contracting parties to the General Agreement and by any other government which has, in accordance with such rules of procedure as may be established by the Organization, notified the Director-General of its intention to accede.

(c) Without prejudice to the principle laid down in Article 2, this Agreement shall enter into force, as among those governments which are then contracting parties to the General Agreement and which have accepted this Agreement, on the thirtieth day following the day on which it has been accepted by governments named in the Annex to this Agreement the territories of which account for 85 per centum of the total external trade of the territories of such governments, computed in accordance with the appropriate column of percentage set forth therein. This Agreement shall enter into force for each other government which is a contracting party to the General Agreement on the thirtieth day following the day on which it has been accepted thereby. It shall enter into force for each other government which has accepted it when such government accedes to the General Agreement.

Article 18—Notification and Registration.

(a) The Director-General of the Organization shall promptly furnish a certified copy of this Agreement and a notification of its entry into force, and of each acceptance thereof, to each contracting party to the General Agreement.

(b) This Agreement shall be registered in accordance with the provisions of Article 102 of the Charter of the United Nations.

PART V

TRANSITIONAL PROVISIONS

Article 19—Relation to Amendments to the General Agreement.

If this agreement enters into force before the entry into force of amendments to the General Agreement contained in the Protocol of Organizational Amendments to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade dated 10 March 1955,¹ this Agreement shall, until the entry into force of such amendments, be applied as if all references in the General Agreement to "the CONTRACTING PARTIES" were references to the Organization.

Article 20—Provisional Application.

Without prejudice to the principle laid down in Article 2, if by 15 November 1955 this Agreement shall not have entered into force pursuant to paragraph (c) of Article 17, those governments, being contracting parties to the General Agreement, which are prepared to do so may nevertheless decide to apply it; Provided that the territories of such governments account for the percentage of trade required for the entry into force of this Agreement under paragraph (c) of Article 17.

Article 21—Temporary Exercise of Depository Functions.

Pending the entry into force of this Agreement, the title "Director-General of the Organization" in paragraph (b) of Article 14, paragraphs (a) and (b) of Article 17 and paragraph (a) of Article 18, shall read "Executive Secretary to the CONTRACTING PARTIES to the General Agreement".

IN WITNESS WHEREOF the respective representatives, duly authorized to that effect, have signed the present Agreement.

DONE at Geneva, in a single copy, in the English and French languages, both texts authentic, this tenth day of March, one thousand nine hundred and fifty-five.

PERCENTAGE SHARES OF TOTAL EXTERNAL TRADE TO BE USED FOR THE PURPOSE OF MAKING THE DETERMINATION REFERRED TO IN ARTICLE 17

(based on the average of 1949-1953)

If, prior to the accession of the Government of Japan to the General Agreement, the present Agreement has been accepted by contracting parties the external trade of which under column I accounts for the percentage of such trade specified in paragraph (c) of Article 17, column I shall be applicable for the purposes of that paragraph. If

9. TRADE AGREEMENTS EXTENSION ACT OF 1955: Public Law 86 (84th Congress, 1st Session), June 21, 1955¹

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1955".

SEC. 2. The period during which the President is authorized to enter into foreign trade agreements under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930,² as amended (19 U. S. C., sec. 1351), is hereby extended from June 12, 1955, until the close of June 30, 1958.

SEC. 3. (a) Subsection (a) of section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended (19 U. S. C., sec. 1351 (a)), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(a) (1) For the purpose of expanding foreign markets for the products of the United States (as a means of assisting in establishing and maintaining a better relationship among various branches of American agriculture, industry, mining, and commerce) by regulating the admission of foreign goods into the United States in accordance with the characteristics and needs of various branches of American production so that foreign markets will be made available to those branches of American production which require and are capable of developing such outlets by affording corresponding market opportunities for foreign products in the United States, the President, whenever he finds as a fact that any existing duties or other import restrictions of the United States or any foreign country are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States and that the purpose above declared will be promoted by the means hereinafter specified, is authorized from time to time—

"(A) To enter into foreign trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof: Provided, That the enactment of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1955 shall not be construed to determine or indicate the approval or disapproval by the Congress of the executive agreement known as the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.³

"(B) To proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions, or such continuance, and for such minimum periods, of existing customs or excise treatment of any article covered by foreign trade agreements, as are required or appropriate to carry out any foreign trade agreement that the President has entered into hereunder.

"(2) No proclamation pursuant to paragraph (1) (B) of this subsection shall be made—

"(A) Increasing by more than 50 per centum any rate of duty existing on January 1, 1945.

"(B) Transferring any article between the dutiable and free lists.

³ Agreement of Oct. 30, 1947, as amended Mar. 10, 1955; supra., doc. 7.

“(C) In order to carry out a foreign trade agreement entered into by the President before June 12, 1955, or with respect to which notice of intention to negotiate was published in the Federal Register on November 16, 1954,¹ decreasing by more than 50 per centum any rate of duty existing on January 1, 1945.

“(D) In order to carry out a foreign trade agreement entered into by the President on or after June 12, 1955, decreasing (except as provided in subparagraph (C) of this paragraph) any rate of duty below the lowest of the following rates:

“(i) The rate 15 per centum below the rate existing on January 1, 1955.

“(ii) In the case of any article subject to an ad valorem rate of duty above 50 per centum (or a combination of ad valorem rates aggregating more than 50 per centum), the rate 50 per centum ad valorem (or a combination of ad valorem rates aggregating 50 per centum). In the case of any article subject to a specific rate of duty (or a combination of rates including a specific rate) the ad valorem equivalent of which has been determined by the President to have been above 50 per centum during a period determined by the President to be a representative period, the rate 50 per centum ad valorem or the rate (or a combination of rates), however stated, the ad valorem equivalent of which the President determines would have been 50 per centum during such period. The standards of valuation contained in section 402 of this Act (as in effect during the representative period) shall be utilized by the President, to the maximum extent he finds such utilization practicable, in making the determinations under the preceding sentence.

“(3) (A) Subject to the provisions of subparagraphs (B) and (C) of this paragraph, the provisions of any proclamation made under paragraph (1) (B) of this subsection, and the provisions of any proclamation of suspension under paragraph (4) of this subsection, shall be in effect from and after such time as is specified in the proclamation.

“(B) In the case of any decrease in duty to which paragraph (2) (D) of this subsection applies—

“(i) if the total amount of the decrease under the foreign trade agreement does not exceed 15 per centum of the rate existing on January 1, 1955, the amount of decrease becoming initially effective at one time shall not exceed 5 per centum of the rate existing on January 1, 1955;

“(ii) except as provided in clause (i), not more than one-third of the total amount of the decrease under the foreign trade agreement shall become initially effective at one time; and

“(iii) no part of the decrease after the first part shall become initially effective until the immediately previous part shall have been in effect for a period or periods aggregating not less than one year.

"(C) No part of any decrease in duty to which the alternative specified in paragraph (2) (D) (i) of this subsection applies shall become initially effective after the expiration of the three-year period which begins on July 1, 1955. If any part of such decrease has become effective, then for purposes of this subparagraph any time thereafter during which such part of the decrease is not in effect by reason of legislation of the United States or action thereunder shall be excluded in determining when the three-year period expires.

"(D) If (in order to carry out a foreign trade agreement entered into by the President on or after June 12, 1955) the President determines that such action will simplify the computation of the amount of duty imposed with respect to an article, he may exceed any limitation specified in paragraph (2) (C) or (D) of this subsection or subparagraph (B) of this paragraph by not more than whichever of the following is lesser:

"(i) The difference between the limitation and the next lower whole number, or

"(ii) One-half of 1 per centum ad valorem.

In the case of a specific rate (or of a combination of rates which includes a specific rate), the one-half of 1 per centum specified in clause (ii) of the preceding sentence shall be determined in the same manner as the ad valorem equivalent of rates not stated wholly in ad valorem terms is determined for the purposes of paragraph (2) (D) (ii) of this subsection.

"(4) Subject to the provisions of section 5 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951¹ (19 U. S. C., sec. 1362), duties and other import restrictions proclaimed pursuant to this section shall apply to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of all foreign countries, whether imported directly or indirectly: Provided, That the President shall, as soon as practicable, suspend the application to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of any country because of its discriminatory treatment of American commerce or because of other acts (including the operations of international cartels) or policies which in his opinion tend to defeat the purpose of this section.

"(5) The President may at any time terminate, in whole or in part, any proclamation made pursuant to this section."

(b) The last sentence of section 350 (b) of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended (19 U. S. C., sec. 1351 (b)), is hereby amended to read as follows: "No rate of duty on products of Cuba shall be decreased—

"(1) In order to carry out a foreign trade agreement entered into by the President before June 12, 1955, by more than 50 per centum of the rate of duty existing on January 1, 1945, with respect to products of Cuba.

"(2) In order to carry out a foreign trade agreement entered into by the President on or after June 12, 1955, below the applicable alternative specified in subsection (a) (2) (C) or (D) (subject to the provisions of subsection (a) (3) (B), (C), and (D)), each such alternative to be read for the purposes of this paragraph as relating to the rate of duty applicable to products of Cuba. With respect to products of Cuba, the limitation of subsection (a) (2) (D) (ii) may be exceeded to such extent as may be required to maintain an absolute margin of preference to which such products are entitled."

(c) Subsection (c) of section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended (19 U. S. C., sec. 1351 (c)), is hereby amended by inserting "(1)" after "(c)", by striking out "(1)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(A)", by striking out "(2)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(B)", and by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(2) For purposes of this section—

"(A) Except as provided in subsection (d), the terms 'existing on January 1, 1945' and 'existing on January 1, 1955' refer to rates of duty (however established, and even though temporarily suspended by Act of Congress or otherwise) existing on the date specified, except rates in effect by reason of action taken pursuant to section 5 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951 (19 U. S. C., sec. 1362).

"(B) The term 'existing' without the specification of any date, when used with respect to any matter relating to the conclusion of, or proclamation to carry out, a foreign trade agreement, means existing on the day on which that trade agreement is entered into."

(d) Section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended (19 U. S. C., sec. 1351), is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) (1) The President shall submit to the Congress an annual report on the operation of the trade agreements program, including information regarding new negotiations, modifications made in duties and import restrictions of the United States, reciprocal concessions obtained, modifications of existing trade agreements in order to effectuate more fully the purposes of the trade agreements legislation (including the incorporation therein of escape clauses), and other information relating to that program and to the agreements entered into thereunder.

"(2) The Tariff Commission shall at all times keep informed concerning the operation and effect of provisions relating to duties or other import restrictions of the United States contained in trade agreements heretofore or hereafter entered into by the President under the authority of this section. The Tariff Commission, at least once a year, shall submit to the Congress a factual report on the operation of the trade-agreements program."

SEC. 4. Subsection (b) of section 6 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951, as amended (19 U. S. C., sec. 1363 (b)), is hereby amended by striking out the second sentence thereof.

SEC. 5. The last sentence of subsection (a) of section 7 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951, as amended (19 U. S. C., sec. 1364 (a)), is amended to read as follows: "The Tariff Commission shall immediately make public its findings and recommendations to the President, including any dissenting or separate findings and recommendations, and shall cause a summary thereof to be published in the Federal Register.”.

SEC. 6. (a) Subsection (b) of section 7 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951, as amended (19 U. S. C., sec. 1364 (b)), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: “Increased imports, either actual or relative, shall be considered as the cause or threat of serious injury to the domestic industry producing like or directly competitive products when the Commission finds that such increased imports have contributed substantially towards causing or threatening serious injury to such industry.”.

(b) Section 7 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951, as amended (19 U. S. C., sec. 1364), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

“(e) As used in this Act, the terms ‘domestic industry producing like or directly competitive products’ and ‘domestic industry producing like or directly competitive articles’ mean that portion or subdivision of the producing organizations manufacturing, assembling, processing, extracting, growing, or otherwise producing like or directly competitive products or articles in commercial quantities. In applying the preceding sentence, the Commission shall (so far as practicable) distinguish or separate the operations of the producing organizations involving the like or directly competitive products or articles referred to in such sentence from the operations of such organizations involving other products or articles.”.

SEC. 7. Section 2 of the Act entitled “An Act to extend the authority of the President to enter into trade agreements under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended”, approved July 1, 1954 ¹ (19 U. S. C., sec. 1352a), is hereby amended by inserting “(a)” after “SEC. 2.” and by adding at the end thereof a new subsection as follows:

“(b) In order to further the policy and purpose of this section, whenever the Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization has reason to believe that any article is being imported into the United States in such quantities as to threaten to impair the national security, he shall so advise the President, and if the President agrees that there is reason for such belief, the President shall cause an immediate investigation to be made to determine the facts. If, on the basis of such investigation, and the report to him of the findings and recommendations made in connection therewith, the President finds that the article is being imported into the United States in such quantities as to threaten to impair the national security, he shall take such action as he deems necessary to adjust the imports of such article to a level that will not threaten to impair the national security.”

10. FOREIGN ECONOMIC POLICY: Recommendations of the Joint Congressional Committee on the Economic Report, January 5, 1956¹

1. The President must continue to coordinate the diverse interests represented in the executive branch, and bear responsibility for foreign economic policy within that arm of Government. In the nature of our constitutional practices, there is not the same opportunity in the Congress for centralized coordination of all foreign economic policy, viewed in the broad sense. This puts a special responsibility upon individual members, the party leadership, and the standing committees of the Congress to consider the impact of their legislative proposals and their speeches on both home opinion and foreign behavior.

2. We should keep in mind in greater degree the psychological impact, as well as the purely economic, of domestic decisions which affect our foreign economic relations. We should keep in mind that our day-to-day actions often speak much louder than do pronouncements of overall good intentions, with consequent effect on the attitudes and behavior of friendly nations with whom we must cooperate in our own interest.

3. The United States should continue to champion multilateral trade on a most-favored-nation basis, insisting on reciprocal reductions in tariffs as well as the removal of other trade controls even without special concessions. Our reductions of trade barriers should be the occasion for hard bargaining with other countries to ease trade throughout the free world. The instrumentalities of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, the Organization for Trade Cooperation, the International Monetary Fund, and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development offer the best immediate opportunities for multilateral negotiation to make the greatest progress possible.

4. The United States should approve the agreement calling for its membership and participation in the Organization for Trade Cooperation.²

5. The United States should continue to press for the earliest resumption of currency convertibility consistent with finding stable and maintainable rates. Our interest in such convertibility is to minimize trade discrimination and to spur international investment. It would be our hope that in particular the countries of Western Europe and the sterling area could meet the necessary conditions for de jure convertibility before too long. Although such convertibility should not be forced prematurely, neither should it be consigned to the indefinite future.

6. Tariff and trade policy of the United States should be dictated by the national interest, rather than in terms of specific industries or products. Where individual industries cannot meet foreign competition, other solutions than new trade barriers should be sought.

¹ Report of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report to the Congress of the United States (S. Rept. No. 1312, 84th Cong., 2d sess.), pp. 30-32.

² See supra, doc. 8.

7. Further cuts in United States tariffs are in the national interest. The disruptive effect of such reductions can be minimized by making these cuts gradual, selective, reciprocal, and timed to fit the condition of business. Resort to quotas should be allowed only under extreme emergency conditions when other solutions are not available. Further simplification of the customs laws and related administrative matters should be carried out at the earliest possible date to streamline their operation and minimize arbitrary elements.

8. If aid is to be given to distressed areas or industries to meet the problems caused by new imports, such policies should be part of a broader program to meet similar problems of any source, not those of foreign trade alone. Such aid should not be aimed at blanket coverage, but to meet the specific hardships of people actually in distress. Aid should be viewed as temporary, and should be designed to contribute to the permanent correction of the distress so that aid can be terminated. It should not delay the solution of uneconomic arrangements which would continue to drag down the rest of the economy indefinitely.

9. No basic change in our controls on trade with the Communist countries is required at the present time. Trade in strategic goods would not be in the interest of the free world. But peaceful trade is not excluded from the realm of possibility any time that it is in the interest of the free world. Because East-West trade policy requires the cooperation of all countries of the free world, our policies must be coordinated with theirs. If we would limit trade important to our allies with the Communist countries, this policy carries a responsibility to provide alternate markets for their trade.

10. International investment and technical aid, both public and private, need further encouragement. Each case requires individual study and the solutions should be tailored to fit the circumstances. It should be kept in mind that this aid and investment is more than purely economic in character, and this will influence the choices made. Although broader considerations are involved, such aid, whether loans or grants, represents the positive and long-term equivalent of the negative and short-term restrictions on trade with the Communist bloc. This is a time when the Communists are using our own aid devices to further their ends, and we must be prepared to meet this challenge with a coordinated program which combines all the aspects of countering the problems created by the Communists. Only thus will the free world hold its margin of strength over the Sino-Soviet bloc.

11. Further study of domestic agricultural policy should take into account in greater degree the foreign economic policy aspects of these domestic measures.

12. Further study is required of the whole concept of defense essentiality if it is not to dominate over other necessary factors in trade policy. Not only should impartial criteria be discovered, but the whole concept of the mobilization base in the light of evolving military strategy should be reviewed.

13. New criteria should be developed to restrict application of the escape clause and peril points to industries where failure to apply these provisions would result in real hardship to individuals, whether workers or businessmen.

14. The problem of interpretation of antidumping penalties is a complicated one which deserves careful study rather than precipitate action; the need for change is recognized as its interpretation threatens to negate our foreign economic policy goals, but the remedies must be sought only with thorough investigation. At the very least, the President should be given authority to override Tariff Commission decisions when the national interest requires this.

15. We should give added encouragement to the preparation of international statistics, with attention both to the breadth of coverage and the quality of the information; data on national income and its distribution are particularly needed.

16. We need more study of what makes for economic growth both at home and abroad, if we are to choose policies which promote this development in the interests of attaining our national goals.

17. The work of this subcommittee should be continued for at least another year to explore more thoroughly some of the problems raised this year which were only partially answered. This study should include more specific analyses of individual situations than was possible within the general frame of reference of the current study.

A. THE LEND-LEASE PROGRAM, 1941-1955

1. STATUS OF SETTLEMENTS UNDER THE LEND-LEASE PROGRAM: Report to Congress on Lend-Lease Operations for the Year Ending December 31, 1955 (Excerpts) ¹

Preamble

At the close of business on December 31, 1955, settlement undertakings which had been signed by most of the lend-lease governments reflected an aggregate original creditor position of the United States of $1,577,458,847.50 in principal account, exclusive of "cash reimbursement" lend-lease, silver, and miscellaneous other obligations.

Principal payments and credits already made total $409,730,250.58 or approximately 26 percent of these repayment obligations. In addition, $164,552,611.70 has been paid to the Government of the United States as interest on these debts. The combined principal and interest credits of $574,282,862.28 represent more than 36 percent of the principal amount of these settlement obligations.

As yet, settlement agreements covering lend-lease furnished prior to V-J Day have not been reached with the U.S.S.R., China, Greece, and Saudi Arabia. A settlement with Poland is nearly completed.

² The historic document entitled The Declaration by United Nations for a cooperative war effort (not to be confused with the Charter of the United Nations signed in San Francisco in 1945) originally was signed on Jan. 1, 1942, by representatives of 26 nations and, on later dates, by 19 others. (See Twenty-first Report to Congress on Lend-Lease Operations, pp. 44-45.) It confirmed and accepted the principles of the Atlantic Charter, a Joint Declaration (Aug. 14, 1941) by the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom (EAS 236; 55 Stat. 1663).

⁴ Territory under the jurisdiction of the French National Committee was declared eligible to receive lend-lease aid on Nov. 11, 1941, and all French territory not under the control of the Axis was declared eligible on Nov. 13, 1942.

⁵ Wind-up of residual accounts and claims.

ADDENDUM

Aid was furnished, under special circumstances and specific conditions, to certain countries which never had formally been declared eligible for formal lend-lease treatment. These are Burma (see above table), Denmark, Finland, Greenland, Italy, Panama, Sweden, and Thailand.

Transfers to Denmark were made pursuant to arrangements described in the Twenty-first Report to Congress on Lend-Lease Operations, and those made to Italy were pursuant to arrangements described in the Twenty-third Report to Congress on Lend-Lease Operations. In respect to the others named, a modus operandi, very similar to that used for lend-lease cash-reimbursement transactions but not under the Lend-Lease Act, was used to help these governments to acquire approved essential goods and services.

B. THE MUTUAL DEFENSE ASSISTANCE PROGRAM, 1949-1951

[The Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949 (Public Law 329, 81st Congress, 1st Session; 63 Stat. 714) and the subsequent appropriation on October 28, 1949, of $1,314,010,000 in cash and contract authority for fiscal 1950 brought the Mutual Defense Assistance Program into being. Due to the turn of world events, and especially to the attack on the Republic of Korea, Congress amended the basic law to increase its coverage and effectiveness and to authorize its extension (Public Law 621, 81st Congress, 2d Session, September 26, 1950; infra, doc. 3), and made available an additional $5,222,500,000 through regular and supplemental appropriation legislation for fiscal 1951 (Public Laws 759 and 843, 81st Congress, 2d Session; 64 Stat. 595 and 1044). The Mutual Security Act of 1951 (Public Law 165, 82d Congress, 1st Session, approved October 10, 1951; 65 Stat. 373) marked the end of a 2 year period during which the emphasis of United States assistance shifted gradually from economic rehabilitation to military assistance, began the effort toward integration of economic recovery and military assistance programs, and symbolized the reorientation of United States foreign policy with regard to the foreign aid programs.]¹

2. ADMINISTERING AUTHORITY UNDER THE MUTUAL DEFENSE ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1949: Executive Order No. 10099, January 27, 1950²

By virtue of the authority vested in me by section 404 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, approved October 6, 1949 (Public Law 329, 81st Congress),³ hereinafter referred to as the Act, and as President of the United States, it is hereby ordered as follows:

1. (a) The Secretary of State is authorized and directed to perform the functions and exercise the powers and authority vested in the President by the Act, except by section 303, section 405, subsection (e) of section 406, clause 2 of subsection (b) of section 407, and subsection (b) of section 411 thereof.

(b) Within the scope of the authority delegated to him by this order, the Secretary of State shall (1) have responsibility and authority for the direction of the programs authorized by the Act, (2) make full and effective use of agencies, departments, establishments, and wholly owned corporations of the Government, with the consent of the respective heads thereof, in the conduct of operations under such programs, and coordinate the operations of such programs among them, and (3) advise and consult with the Secretary of Defense and the Administrator for Economic Cooperation in order to assure the coordination of the mutual-defense-assistance activities with the national defense and economic-recovery programs.

2. All assistance provided to recipient countries under the authority delegated by this order shall be in conformity with programs approved by the Secretary of State after consultation with the Secretary of Defense and the Administrator for Economic Cooperation. As provided in section 401 of the Act, no equipment or material may be transferred out of military stocks if the Secretary of Defense, after consultation with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, determines that such transfer would be detrimental to the national security of the United States or that such equipment or material is needed by the reserve components of the armed forces to meet their training requirements. The Administrator for Economic Cooperation shall advise the Secretary of State concerning the effect of programs approved by the Secretary of State under the authority delegated to him by this order upon the achievement of the purposes of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948,¹ as amended, and of the purposes of the United States program of economic assistance in Korea.²

3. Funds appropriated or otherwise made available for the purposes of carrying out the portions of the Act pertinent to the authority delegated by this order may be allocated by the Secretary of State to any agency, department, establishment, or wholly owned corporation of the Government for obligation and expenditure in accordance with programs approved by the Secretary of State under such authority.

3. ACT TO AMEND THE MUTUAL DEFENSE ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1949: Public Law 621 (81st Congress, 2d Session) July 26, 1950 (Excerpts)³

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 101 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949⁴ is hereby amended to read as follows:

SEC. 101. In view of the coming into force of the North Atlantic Treaty and the establishment thereunder of the Council and the Defense Committee which will recommend measures for the common defense of the North Atlantic area,⁵ and in view of the fact that the task of the Council and the Defense Committee can be facilitated by immediate steps to increase the integrated defensive armed strength of the parties to the treaty, the President is hereby authorized to furnish military assistance in the form of equipment, materials, and services to such nations as are parties to the treaty and request such assistance. Any such assistance furnished under this title shall be subject to agreements, further referred to in section 402, designed to assure that the assistance will be used to promote an integrated defense of the North Atlantic area and to facilitate the development of defense plans by the Council and the Defense Committee under article 9 of the North Atlantic Treaty and to realize unified direction and effort; and after the agreement by the Government of the United States with defense plans as recommended by the Council and the Defense Committee, military assistance hereunder shall be furnished only in accordance therewith.

⁴ A Decade of American Foreign Policy, pp. 1356-1364.

SEC. 2. Section 102 of such Act is hereby amended by designating such section as subsection (a) and by adding thereto subsection (b) to read as follows:

(b) In addition to the amounts heretofore authorized to be appropriated, there are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the year ending June 30, 1951, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for carrying out the provisions and accomplishing the policies and purposes of this title, not to exceed $1,000,000,000.

SEC. 3. Section 104 of such Act is hereby amended to read as follows:

SEC. 104. None of the funds made available for carrying out the provisions of this Act or the Act of May 22, 1947,¹ as amended, shall be utilized (a) to construct or aid in the construction of any factory or other manufacturing establishment outside of the United States or to provide equipment (other than production equipment, including machine tools) for any such factory or other manufacturing establishment, (b) to defray the cost of maintaining any such factory or other manufacturing establishment, (c) directly or indirectly to compensate any nation or any governmental agency or person therein for any diminution in the export trade of such nation resulting from the carrying out of any program of increased military production or to make any payment, in the form of a bonus, subsidy, indemnity, guaranty, or otherwise, to any owner of any such factory or other manufacturing establishment as an inducement to such owner to undertake or increase production of arms, ammunition, implements of war, or other military supplies, or (d) for the compensation of any person for personal services rendered in or for any such factory or other manufacturing establishment, other than personal services of a technical nature rendered by officers and employees of the United States for the purpose of establishing or maintaining production by such factories or other manufacturing establishments to effectuate the purposes of this Act and in conformity with desired standards and specifications.

SEC. 11. Section 404 of such Act is hereby amended to read as follows:

SEC. 404. The President may exercise any power or authority conferred on him by this Act through such agency or officer of the United States as he shall direct, except such powers or authority conferred on him in section 405, in clause (2) of subsection (b) of section 407, and in subsection (c) of section 408.

SEC. 12. (a) Section 408 (c) of such Act is hereby amended to read as follows:

(c) Whenever he determines that such action is essential for the effective carrying out of the purposes of this Act, the President may from time to time utilize not to exceed in the aggregate 10 per centum of the funds and contract authority made available for the purposes of any title of this Act for the purposes of any other title, or in the event of a development seriously affecting the security of the North Atlantic area for the purpose of providing military assistance to any other European nation whose strategic location makes it of direct importance to the defense of the North Atlantic area and whose immediately increased ability to defend itself, the President, after consultation with the governments of the other nations which are members of the North Atlantic Treaty, finds contributes to the preservation of the peace and security of the North Atlantic area and is vital to the security of the United States. Whenever the President makes any such determination he shall forthwith notify the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, and the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives.

(b) Section 408 (d) of such Act is hereby amended to read as follows:

(d) Upon approval by the President, any currency of any nation received by the United States for its own use in connection with the furnishing of assistance under this Act may be used for expenditures for essential administrative and operating expenses of the United States incident to operation under this Act and the amount, if any, remaining after the payment of such expenses shall be used only for purposes specified by Act of Congress.

(c) Section 408 (e) of such Act is hereby amended to read as follows:

(e) (1) The President may, from time to time, in the interest of achieving standardization of military equipment and in order to provide procurement assistance without cost to the United States, transfer, or enter into contracts for the procurement for transfer of, equipment, materials or services to: (A) nations eligible for assistance under title I, II, or III of this Act, (B) a nation which has joined with the United States in a collective defense and regional arrangement, or (C) any other nation not eligible to join a collective defense and regional arrangement referred to in clause (B) above, but whose ability to defend itself or to participate in the defense of the area of which it is a part, is important to the security of the United States: Provided, That, prior to the transfer of any equipment, materials, or services to a nation under this clause (C), it shall provide the United States with assurance that such equipment, materials, or services are required for and will be used solely to maintain its internal security, its legitimate self-defense, or to permit it to participate in the defense of the area of which it is a part, and that it will not undertake any act of aggression against any other state: Provided further, That, in the case of any such transfer, the President shall forthwith notify the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, and the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives.

(2) Whenever equipment or material is transferred from the stocks of, or services are rendered by, any agency, to any nation as provided in paragraph (1) above, such nation shall first make available the fair value, as determined by the President, of such equipment, materials, or services. The fair value shall not be less for the various categories of equipment or materials than the "value" as defined in subsection (c) of section 403: Provided, That with respect to excess equipment or materials the fair value may not be determined to be less than the value specified in paragraph 1 of that subsection plus (a) 10 per centum of the original gross cost of such equipment or materials; (b) the scrap value; or (c) the market value, if ascertainable, whichever is the greater. Before a contract is entered into, such nation shall (A) provide the United States with a dependable undertaking to pay the full amount of such contract which will assure the United States against any loss on the contract, and (B) shall make funds available in such amounts and at such times as may be necessary to meet the payments required by the contract in advance of the time such payments are due, in addition to the estimated amount of any damages and costs that may accrue from the cancellation of such contract: Provided, That the total amount of outstanding contracts under this subsection, less the amounts which have been paid the United States by such nations, shall at no time exceed $100,000,000.

SEC. 13. The present section 405 (d) of such Act is renumbered as section 405 (e) and a new subsection 405 (d) is added to read as follows:

(d) if, in the case of any nation, which is a party to the North Atlantic Treaty, the President determines after consultation with the North Atlantic Treaty Council that such nation is not making its full contribution through self-help and mutual assistance in all practicable forms to the common defense of the North Atlantic area; and in the case of any other nation, if the President determines that such nation is not making its full contribution to its own defense or to the defense of the area of which it is a part.

4. ESTABLISHMENT OF THE (INTERDEPARTMENTAL) INTERNATIONAL SECURITY AFFAIRS COMMITTEE (ISAC): Memorandum of Understanding Between the Departments of State, Treasury, Defense, and the Economic Cooperation Administration, Approved by the President, December 19, 1950¹

1. The tremendous step-up in our foreign and domestic programs for increasing our own national security and that of the other free nations makes it imperative that we carefully examine the organizational arrangements within the United States Government for carrying out these programs. Certain aspects of these arrangements require urgent consideration and immediate decision.

2. The most urgent organizational problem which we now face involves the proper framework in which the questions relating to the North Atlantic Treaty and economic and military assistance programs can properly be coordinated. With respect to the organization in Washington, two basic decisions need to be made: (a) The proper relationship among State, Defense, the Economic Cooperation Administration, and the Treasury, on an interdepartmental basis; and (b) the adjustments which must be made within each of these agencies as a basis for an effective and coordinated Government-wide effort. The following arrangements are agreed to as a first step in resolving these questions.

3. (a) A Director for International Security and Assistance Affairs² will be appointed in the Department of State.³ He shall occupy the senior position authorized by section 406 (e) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949 as amended.⁴

(b) The Director for International Security and Assistance Affairs, on behalf of the Secretary of State, shall represent and speak for the Department of State on matters of policy and program relating to the North Atlantic Treaty, other similar international programs, and military and economic assistance for mutual defense. He shall be responsible for coordinating all activities within the department related thereto. He shall have the authority, responsibility, and staff necessary to assure that he can speak positively and expeditiously on behalf of the Department of State.

(c) In addition, the Director for International Security and Assistance Affairs, on behalf of the Secretary of State, shall be responsible for providing continuing leadership in the interdepartmental coordination of policy and program with respect to the North Atlantic

The memorandum bears the title "Organizational Arrangements Within the United States Government for Policy Formulation and Implementation With Respect to International Security Arrangements and Military and Economic Assistance for Mutual Defense."

² In a covering memorandum transmitting this approved paper to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget on this same date, the President suggested the deletion of the words "and Assistance" from the title of the Director. (Footnote in H. Doc. 179.)

Treaty, other similar international programs, and military and economic assistance for mutual defense. In performing this function on behalf of the Secretary of State, the Director for International Security and Assistance Affairs will be exercising responsibility for the Government as a whole.

4. (a) There shall be appointed an Assistant to the Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs. He should occupy one of the three positions, other than the senior position, authorized by section 406 (e) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949 as amended.

(b) The Assistant to the Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs shall have the same responsibility and authority within the Department of Defense as is provided in paragraph 3 (b) for the Director for International Security and Assistance Affairs with respect to the Department of State.

5. The Economic Cooperation Administrator and the Secretary of the Treasury shall each designate an official who shall have the same authority and responsibility with respect to his agency as is provided in paragraph 3 (b) for the Director for International Security and Assistance Affairs with respect to the Department of State.

6. (a) The review and coordination of policy and program as between the several departments and agencies shall be carried on by [a] senior staff committee to be known as the Committee on International Security Affairs. The State Department Director for International Security and Assistance Affairs shall be the Chairman. In addition, the membership shall consist of the Assistant to the Secretary of Defense for International [Security] Affairs, a representative of the Special Assistant to the President, Mr. Harriman, and the ECA and Treasury officials provided for in paragraph 5. Representatives of other departments and agencies may be asked to sit with the Committee as appropriate.

(b) The Committee on International Security Affairs shall establish such permanent or temporary working groups as it finds necessary and shall develop such arrangements as are necessary for guiding inter-agency coordination outside of the Committee.

7. It is essential that operating responsibility be delegated to the greatest possible extent to those agencies which are equipped to handle it. This means that with respect to mutual defense and within the framework of established policies, the Department of Defense has primary responsibility for determining the military character of international programs, for developing and implementing the end item and military training programs, and for developing United States determinations as to military requirements in the formulation of programs for military production abroad; and the Economic Cooperation Administration shall have primary responsibility for developing and implementing plans for economic assistance required to support an adequate defense effort abroad, and for implementing approved programs for additional military production abroad.

8. The foregoing administrative arrangements shall be carried on with due regard for the established responsibilities of the National Security Council and other officials and agencies of the Executive Office of the President, and of the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems, and the existing authorities and responsibilities of these officials and agencies are in no wise modified by this agreement. This means that the National Security Council shall continue to be the agency "to advise the President with respect to the integration of domestic, foreign, and military policies relating to the national security."

9. Arrangements should likewise be made as quickly as feasible for improved coordination between United States Government officials and representatives at both the regional and country levels.

5. ESTABLISHMENT OF THE OFFICE OF INTERNATIONAL SECURITY AFFAIRS IN THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE: Departmental Announcement 248, December 27, 1950¹

Effective January 8, 1951, there will be established in the Department of State the position of Director, International Security Affairs. The Office of the Director, Mutual Defense Assistance established October 25, 1949,² is abolished and its personnel, records, and functions, including the functions vested in the Secretary of State by Executive Order 10099,³ as amended, have been transferred to the Director, International Security Affairs.

The Director, Thomas Dudley Cabot, will occupy the senior position authorized by section 406 (e) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949,⁴ as amended. The Director shall perform his functions under the direction of the Secretary of State. He shall have authority over, and be responsible for, the general direction and coordination of all activities within the Department of State relating to:

- a. The North Atlantic Treaty and other similar regional and bilateral arrangements concerned primarily with collective defense or mutual defense assistance;
- b. the military security phases of other regional or bilateral arrangements, such as the Organization of American States;
- c. military assistance programs;
- d. programs of economic assistance which are designed to support programs of military assistance;
- e. the export or foreign sale of military materiel or the release to other nations of classified military information. In addition, the commitment of United States military resources for United Nations purposes shall be coordinated with the Director. As to all such matters, he shall represent and speak for the Department of State. In performing these several functions, he shall be responsible for appropriately relating his performance to the development and execution of other foreign policies and programs.

The Director shall have such staff as may be necessary for the effective execution of his responsibilities but shall, to the extent consistent with the effective discharge of his responsibilities, utilize the resources of the regional and functional bureaus and offices. The regional and functional bureaus and offices of the Department shall give to the Director all appropriate assistance and shall be responsible to the Director for all activities within the field of his responsibility. The Director within the area of his responsibility set forth shall:

a. Coordinate and direct the development of objectives, policies, and programs for international security and assistance affairs.

b. Approve programs for military and economic assistance for mutual defense, and review, coordinate, and expedite the implementation of approved programs.

c. Assure the establishment and maintenance of effective working relationships concerning international security and assistance matters with all Government agencies having policy, advisory, or operational responsibilities within this area.

d. Evaluate the effectiveness and progress of policies and programs in the field of international security and assistance and prepare or direct the preparation of all necessary reports with respect thereto.

e. See that appropriate instructions to United States representatives abroad concerned with international security and assistance matters are developed and issued.

f. Assure development, coordination, and implementation of policies to control, under appropriate provisions of law, the export and import of arms, ammunition, and implements of war.

g. Assure formulation of Department of State policy on all questions relating to disclosure to foreign powers of classified information in the field of international security and assistance affairs.

h. Have primary responsibility, subject to the budget and fiscal policies and procedures of the Department of State, for the control, allocation, and utilization of funds made available for aid and assistance programs and related activities, including responsibility for budget formulation, for budget justification before the Bureau of the Budget and Congress, and for budget execution.

i. Assure the development, through existing organizational arrangements, of domestic and overseas programs of public information with respect to international security and assistance affairs.

The Director shall be the Department of State representative on and chairman of the Committee on International Security Affairs.¹ The Director shall determine, in consultation with the Deputy Under Secretary for Administration, State Department representation on, and shall be responsible for and generally supervise State Department

6. ACT FOR INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT (TITLE IV, FOREIGN ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1950): Public Law 535 (81st Congress, 2d Session), June 5, 1950¹

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Foreign Economic Assistance Act of 1950".

TITLE IV

SEC. 401. This title may be cited as the "Act for International Development".

SEC. 402. The Congress hereby finds as follows:

(a) The peoples of the United States and other nations have a common interest in the freedom and in the economic and social progress of all peoples. Such progress can further the secure growth of democratic ways of life, the expansion of mutually beneficial commerce, the development of international understanding and good will, and the maintenance of world peace.

(b) The efforts of the peoples living in economically underdeveloped areas of the world to realize their full capabilities and to develop the resources of the lands in which they live can be furthered through the cooperative endeavor of all nations to exchange technical knowledge and skills and to encourage the flow of investment capital.

¹ Title IV of the Foreign Economic Assistance Act of 1950 (64 Stat. 198). Title IV was subsequently amended by the Mutual Security Act of 1951 (PL 165, 82d Cong., 1st sess., Oct. 10, 1951; 65 Stat. 373), by the Mutual Security Act of 1952 (PL 400, 82d Cong., 2d sess., June 20, 1952; 66 Stat. 141), and by the Mutual Security Act of 1953 (PL 118, 83d Cong., 1st sess., July 16, 1953; 67 Stat. 152). Title IV was repealed by the Mutual Security Act of 1954 (PL 665, 83d Cong., 2d sess., Aug. 26, 1954; 68 Stat. 832), which act effected a recodification of all foreign assistance programs.

(c) Technical assistance and capital investment can make maximum contribution to economic development only where there is understanding of the mutual advantages of such assistance and investment and where there is confidence of fair and reasonable treatment and due respect for the legitimate interests of the peoples of the countries to which the assistance is given and in which the investment is made and of the countries from which the assistance and investments are derived. In the case of investment this involves confidence on the part of the people of the underdeveloped areas that investors will conserve as well as develop local resources, will bear a fair share of local taxes and observe local laws, and will provide adequate wages and working conditions for local labor. It involves confidence on the part of investors, through intergovernmental agreements or otherwise, that they will not be deprived of their property without prompt, adequate, and effective compensation; that they will be given reasonable opportunity to remit their earnings and withdraw their capital; that they will have reasonable freedom to manage, operate, and control their enterprises; that they will enjoy security in the protection of their persons and property, including industrial and intellectual property, and nondiscriminatory treatment in taxation and in the conduct of their business affairs.

SEC. 403. (a) It is declared to be the policy of the United States to aid the efforts of the peoples of economically underdeveloped areas to develop their resources and improve their working and living conditions by encouraging the exchange of technical knowledge and skills and the flow of investment capital to countries which provide conditions under which such technical assistance and capital can effectively and constructively contribute to raising standards of living, creating new sources of wealth, increasing productivity and expanding purchasing power.

(b) It is further declared to be the policy of the United States that in order to achieve the most effective utilization of the resources of the United States, private and public, which are or may be available for aid in the development of economically underdeveloped areas, agencies of the United States Government, in reviewing requests of foreign governments for aid for such purposes, shall take into consideration (1) whether the assistance applied for is an appropriate part of a program reasonably designed to contribute to the balanced and integrated development of the country or area concerned; (2) whether any works or facilities which may be projected are actually needed in view of similar facilities existing in the area and are otherwise economically sound; and (3) with respect to projects for which capital is requested, whether private capital is available either in the country or elsewhere upon reasonable terms and in sufficient amounts to finance such projects.

SEC. 404. (a) In order to accomplish the purposes of this title, the United States is authorized to participate in multilateral technical cooperation programs carried on by the United Nations, the Organization of American States, and their related organizations, and by other international organizations, wherever practicable.

(b) Within the limits of appropriations made available to carry out the purposes of this title, the President is authorized to make contributions to the United Nations for technical cooperation programs carried on by it and its related organizations which will contribute to accomplishing the purposes of this title as effectively as would participation in comparable programs on a bilateral basis. The President is further authorized to make contributions for technical cooperation programs carried on by the Organization of American States, its related organizations, and by other international organizations.

(c) Agencies of the United States Government on request of international organizations are authorized, upon approval by the President, to furnish services and such facilities as may be necessary in connection therewith, on an advance of funds or reimbursement basis, for such organizations in connection with their technical cooperation programs. Amounts received as reimbursements from such organizations shall be credited, at the option of the appropriate agency, either to the appropriation, fund, or account utilized in incurring the obligation, or to an appropriate appropriation, fund, or account currently available for the purposes for which expenditures were made.

SEC. 405. The President is authorized to plan, undertake, administer, and execute bilateral technical cooperation programs carried on by any United States Government agency and, in so doing—

(a) To coordinate and direct existing and new technical cooperation programs.

(b) To assist other interested governments in the formulation of programs for the balanced and integrated development of the economic resources and productive capacities of economically underdeveloped areas.

(c) To receive, consider, and review reports of joint commissions set up as provided in section 410 of this title.

(d) To make, within appropriations made available for the purpose, advances and grants in aid of technical cooperation programs to any person, corporation, or other body of persons, or to any foreign government or foreign government agency.

(e) To make and perform contracts or agreements in respect of technical cooperation programs on behalf of the United States Government with any person, corporation, or other body of persons however designated, whether within or without the United States, or with any foreign government or foreign government agency: Provided, That with respect to contracts or agreements which entail commitments for the expenditure of funds appropriated pursuant to the authority of this title, such contracts or agreements, within the limits of appropriations or contract authorizations hereafter made available may, subject to any future action of the Congress, run for not to exceed three years in any one case.

(f) To provide for printing and binding outside the contimental limits of the United States, without regard to section 11 of the Act of March 1, 1919 (44 U.S.C. 111).¹

(g) To provide for the publication of information made available by the joint commissions referred to in section 410, and from other sources, regarding resources, opportunities for private investment capital, and the need for technical knowledge and skill in each participating country.

SEC. 406. Agreements made by the United States under the authority of this title with other governments and with international organizations shall be registered with the Secretariat of the United Nations in accordance with the provisions of article 102 of the United Nations Charter.

SEC. 407. In carrying out the programs authorized in section 405 of this title—

(a) The participation of private agencies and persons shall be sought to the greatest extent practicable.

(b) Due regard shall be given, in reviewing requests for assistance, to the possibilities of achieving satisfactory results from such assistance as evidenced by the desire of the country requesting it (1) to take steps necessary to make effective use of the assistance made available, including the encouragement of the flow of productive local and foreign investment capital where needed for development; and (2) to endeavor to facilitate the development of the colonies, possessions, dependencies, and non-self-governing territories administered by such requesting country so that such areas may make adequate contribution to the effectiveness of the assistance requested.

(c) Assistance shall be made available only where the President determines that the country being assisted—

(1) Pays a fair share of the cost of the program.

(2) Provides all necessary information concerning such program and gives the program full publicity.

(3) Seeks to the maximum extent possible full coordination and integration of technical cooperation programs being carried on in that country.

(4) Endeavors to make effective use of the results of the program.

(5) Cooperates with other countries participating in the program in the mutual exchange of technical knowledge and skills.

SEC. 408. The President is authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper to carry out the provisions of this title.

SEC. 409. The President shall create an advisory board, hereinafter referred to as the "board", which shall advise and consult with the President or such other officer as he may designate to administer the program herein authorized, with respect to general or basic policy matters arising in connection with operation of the program. The board shall consist of not more [than] thirteen members to be appointed by the President, one of whom, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be appointed by him as chairman. The members of the board shall be broadly representative of voluntary agencies and other groups interested in the program, including business, labor, agriculture, public health, and education. All members of the board shall be citizens of the United States; none except the chairman shall be an officer or an employee of the United States (including any agency or instrumentality of the United States) who as such regularly receives compensation for current services. Members of the board, other than the chairman if he is an officer of the United States Government, shall receive out of funds made available for the purposes of this title a per diem allowance of $50 for each day spent away from their homes or regular places of business for the purpose of attendance at meetings of the board or at conferences held upon the call of the chairman, and in necessary travel, and while so engaged they may be paid actual travel expenses and not to exceed $10 per diem in lieu of subsistence and other expenses. The President may appoint such committees in special fields of activity as he may determine to be necessary or desirable to effectuate the purposes of this title. The members of such committees shall receive the same compensation as that provided for members of the board.

SEC. 410. (a) At the request of a foreign country, there may be established a joint commission for economic development to be composed of persons named by the President and persons to be named by the requesting country, and may include representatives of international organizations mutually agreed upon.

(b) The duties of each such joint commission shall be mutually agreed upon, and may include, among other things, examination of the following:

(1) The requesting country's requirements with respect to technical assistance.

(2) The requesting country's resources and potentialities, including mutually advantageous opportunities for utilization of foreign technical knowledge and skills and investment.

(3) Policies which will remove deterrents to and otherwise encourage the introduction, local development, and application of technical skills and the creation and effective utilization of capital, both domestic and foreign; and the implementation of such policies by appropriate measures on the part of the requesting country and the United States, and of other countries, when appropriate, and after consultation with them.

(c) Such joint commissions shall prepare studies and reports which they shall transmit to the appropriate authorities of the United States and of the requesting countries. In such reports the joint commissions may include recommendations as to any specific projects which they conclude would contribute to the economic development of the requesting countries.

(d) The costs of each joint commission shall be borne by the United States and the requesting country in the proportion that may be agreed upon between the President and that country.

SEC. 411. All or part of United States support for and participation in any technical cooperation program carried on under this title shall be terminated by the President—

(a) If he determines that such support and participation no longer contribute effectively to the purposes of this title, are contrary to a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations that the continuance of such technical cooperation programs is unnecessary or undesirable, or are not consistent with the foreign policy of the United States.

(b) If a concurrent resolution of both Houses of the Congress finds such termination is desirable.

SEC. 412. The President may exercise any power or authority conferred on him by this title through the Secretary of State or through any other officer or employee of the United States Government.

SEC. 413. In order to carry out the purposes of this title—

(a) The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a person who, under the direction of the President or such other officer as he may designate pursuant to section 412 hereof to exercise the powers conferred upon him by this title, shall be responsible for planning, implementing, and managing the programs authorized in this title. He shall be compensated at a rate fixed by the President without regard to the Classification Act of 1949¹ but not in excess of $15,000 per annum.

(b) Officers, employees, agents, and attorneys may be employed for duty within the continental limits of the United States in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1949.

(c) Persons employed for duty outside the continental limits of the United States and officers and employees of the United States Government assigned for such duty, may receive compensation at any of the rates provided for the Foreign Service Reserve and Staff by the Foreign Service Act of 1946 (60 Stat. 999), as amended, may receive allowances and benefits not in excess of those established thereunder, and may be appointed to any class in the Foreign Service Reserve or Staff in accordance with the provisions of such Act.

(d) Alien clerks and employees employed for the purpose of performing functions under this title shall be employed in accordance with the provisions of the Foreign Service Act of 1946, as amended.

(e) Officers and employees of the United States Government may be detailed to offices or positions to which no compensation is attached with any foreign government or foreign government agency or with any international organization: Provided, That while so detailed any such person shall be considered, for the purpose of preserving his privileges, rights, seniority, or other benefits, an officer or employee of the United States Government and of the United States Government agency from which detailed and shall receive therefrom his regular compensation, which shall be reimbursed to such agency from funds available under this title: Provided further, That such acceptance of office shall in no case involve the taking of an oath of allegiance to another government.

(f) Experts and consultants or organizations thereof may be employed as authorized by section 15 of the Act of August 2, 1946 (5 U. S. C. 55a), and individuals so employed may be compensated at a rate not in excess of $75 per diem.

(g) Such additional civilian personnel may be employed without regard to subsection (a) of section 14 of the Federal Employees Pay Act of 1946 (60 Stat. 219), as amended,¹ as may be necessary to carry out the policies and purposes of this title.

SEC. 414. No citizen or resident of the United States, whether or not now in the employ of the Government, may be employed or assigned to duties by the Government under this Act until such individual has been investigated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and a report thereon has been made to the Secretary of State: Provided, however, That any present employee of the Government, pending the report as to such employee by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, may be employed or assigned to duties under this Act for the period of three months from the date of its enactment. This section shall not apply in the case of any officer appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

SEC. 415. The President shall transmit to the Congress an annual report of operations under this title.

SEC. 416. (a) In order to carry out the provisions of this title, there shall be made available such funds as are hereafter authorized and appropriated from time to time for the purposes of this title: Provided, however, That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this title through June 30, 1951, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated a sum not to exceed $35,000,000,² including any sums appropriated to carry on the activities of the Institute of Inter-American Affairs, and technical cooperation programs as defined in section 418 herein under the United States Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948 (62 Stat. 6).³ Activities provided for under this title may be prosecuted under such appropriations or under authority granted in appropriation Acts to enter into contracts pending enactment of such appropriations. Unobligated balances of such appropriations for any fiscal year may, when so specified in the appropriation Act concerned, be carried over to any succeeding fiscal year or years. The President may allocate to any United States Government agency any part of any appropriation available for carrying out the purposes of this title. Such funds shall be available for obligation and expenditure for the purposes of this title in accordance with authority granted hereunder or under authority governing the activities of the Government agencies to which such funds are allocated.

(b) Nothing in this title is intended nor shall it be construed as an expressed or implied commitment to provide any specific assistance, whether of funds, commodities, or services, to any country or countries, or to any international organization.

SEC. 417. If any provision of this title or the application of any provision to any circumstances or persons shall be held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the title and the applicability of such provision to other circumstances or persons shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 418. As used in this title—

(a) The term "technical cooperation programs" means programs for the international interchange of technical knowledge and skills designed to contribute to the balanced and integrated development of the economic resources and productive capacities of economically underdeveloped areas. Such activities may include, but need not be limited to, economic, engineering, medical, educational, agricultural, fishery, mineral, and fiscal surveys, demonstration, training, and similar projects that serve the purpose of promoting the development of economic resources and productive capacities of underdeveloped areas. The term "technical cooperation programs" does not include such activities authorized by the United States Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948 (62 Stat. 6) as are not primarily related to economic development nor activities undertaken now or hereafter pursuant to the International Aviation Facilities Act (62 Stat. 450), nor pursuant to the Philippine Rehabilitation Act of 1946 (60 Stat. 128), as amended, nor pursuant to the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948 (62 Stat. 137), as amended, nor activities undertaken now or hereafter in the administration of areas occupied by the United States armed forces or in Korea by the Economic Cooperation Administration.

(b) The term "United States Government agency" means any department, agency, board, wholly or partly owned corporation or instrumentality, commission, or independent establishment of the United States Government.

(c) The term "international organization" means any intergovernmental organization of which the United States is a member.

7. ADMINISTERING AUTHORITY UNDER THE ACT FOR INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT: Executive Order No. 10159, September 8, 1950¹

By virtue of the authority vested in me by the Act for International Development, approved June 5, 1950 (Title IV of Public Law 535, 81st Congress),² hereinafter referred to as the act, and as President of the United States, it is hereby ordered as follows:

1. The Secretary of State is authorized and directed (a) to perform the functions and exercise the powers and authority vested in the President by the act, except those so vested by section 413 (a) thereof, and except those so vested by section 409 thereof except as provided below, and (b), in cooperation with the heads of other appropriate departments and agencies and wholly-owned corporations of the Government, to plan and execute the programs authorized by the act.

2. For the purpose of promoting the effective implementation of the act, the heads of all departments and agencies the participation of which is requested by the Secretary of State are hereby authorized and directed to provide for such participation to the maximum extent consistent with law.

3. There is established pursuant to section 409 of the act the International Development Advisory Board. The members of the Board shall serve for terms of two years. The Board shall meet at the request of the Secretary of State to advise and consult with him on general policy matters. The Secretary of State is authorized to create and appoint such additional committees in special fields of activity as he may find, after consultation with the heads of other appropriate departments and agencies, to be necessary and desirable, in accordance with the provisions of section 409 of the act.

4. The Secretary of State shall establish an Interdepartmental Advisory Council on Technical Cooperation, to be composed of the heads of participating departments and agencies or their representatives. The Council shall be advisory to the Secretary of State.

HARRY S. TRUMAN

8. ESTABLISHMENT OF THE TECHNICAL COOPERATION ADMINISTRATION IN THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE: Departmental Announcement 212, October 27, 1950³

1. The Technical Cooperation Administration (TCA) is established effective October 27, 1950. The Interim Office for Technical Cooperation (TCD), established by Departmental Announcement 41, February 21, 1950,⁴ is hereby abolished and its personnel and functions, as redefined below, are transferred to the Technical Cooperation Administration.

³ Department of State Bulletin, Nov. 13, 1950, pp. 793-795.

⁴ Ibid., Mar. 13, 1950, p. 422.

2. The Technical Cooperation Administrator will, under the general direction of the Secretary of State, plan, implement, and manage the technical cooperation (Point 4) programs authorized by the Act for International Development (Title IV of the Foreign Economic Assistance Act of 1950, Public Law 535, 81st Cong.).¹ The Administrator shall perform the functions and exercise the powers and authority vested in the Secretary of State by the act and those vested in the President by the act and delegated to the Secretary by Executive Order 10159.²

3. The Technical Cooperation Administration shall operate as an integral component of the Department, utilizing the Department's staff services and facilities and shall conduct its activities pursuant to its own terms of reference and those of other components of the Department as prescribed below and in the Manual of Regulations and Procedures, Volume II, Organization. At each country mission, the chief of mission shall be responsible for the administration of the bilateral program in his country.

4. The Technical Cooperation Administration shall:

a. Formulate general policies and plans for the conduct of existing and new technical cooperation programs;

b. Review and coordinate country and area program plans submitted by the regional bureaus, make necessary adjustments, and direct preparation of specific implementing projects;

c. Approve projects, determine action agencies, allocate funds for United States bilateral programs within an approved financial plan, and approve assignment of United States Government personnel abroad to such programs;

d. Coordinate bilateral technical cooperation programs with other programs for economic development affecting the same areas and coordinate negotiations and consultations with intergovernmental and private agencies carrying on technical cooperation programs affecting such areas;

e. Maintain liaison with and supervise and coordinate the technical cooperation activities of other Federal agencies authorized by the act;

f. Assure the effective operation of programs and projects and select or approve technical cooperation officers for field assignments; and, through the regional bureaus, direct their program activities;

g. Establish general standards for the creation and operation of joint commissions, select United States members and coordinate their activities with other phases of the program;

h. Determine the amount to be allotted for United States contributions to multilateral technical cooperation programs carried on by international organizations and approve payment of such contributions; determine, with the concurrence of the Bureau of United Nations Affairs, the United States position on the character and scope of and priorities within such activities; and approve the furnishing of services and facilities by Federal agencies for their execution;

² Supra.

i. Determine whether technical assistance may be given to a requesting country under the act and terminate, in consultation with the appropriate regional bureau insofar as country political affairs are involved, all or part of United States support for and participation in any technical cooperation program under the provisions of section 411 of the Act for International Development;

j. Consult with the International Development Advisory Board (IDAB) provided by the act and Executive Order 10159 and recommend the appointment by the Secretary of advisory committees in special fields of activity in consultation with interested offices and Federal agencies.

5. The regional bureaus shall:

a. Develop coordinated program plans for individual countries or groups of countries; assist in the development of detailed plans for individual projects; and review program proposals affecting their areas which originate in other sources;

b. Communicate and negotiate with foreign governments; review or advise with respect to the assignment of and generally supervise bilateral program personnel in the field; evaluate programs and projects within their regions; propose program changes; and review or advise with respect to the selection of, and give policy guidance and general support to, United States members of joint commissions.

6. The Bureau of United Nations Affairs shall:

a. Develop the United States position concerning the international organizational machinery to be used for technical cooperation activities and the relative contributions to be pledged by the United States and other countries to the special technical assistance accounts of international organizations; coordinate and conduct negotiations on such matters; and make recommendations for the payment of contributions to the special accounts of international organizations from funds allotted by the Technical Cooperation Administration;

b. Assure the development of the United States positions on the character, scope and priorities of technical cooperation programs for economic development to be undertaken by international organizations, on the amount to be allotted for United States contributions, and on program allocations among international organizations; and advise the Technical Cooperation Administration on the substance of such positions and on the termination of participation in multilateral programs under the provisions of section 411 of the act.

c. Arrange for direct contact on operating program matters between the United Nations (including the participating specialized agencies and regional commissions) and the Technical Cooperation Administration, and between intergovernmental and other United States agencies at the request of the Technical Cooperation Administration.

7. The existing division of responsibility between the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs and the Bureau of United Nations Affairs with regard to intergovernmental organizations of the other American Republics shall apply to matters arising under this announcement.

8. Subject to the responsibilities assigned to the Technical Cooperation Administration in paragraph 4, the following units of the Department shall have such responsibilities in dealing with the indicated international organizations in connection with technical cooperation matters as accord with their general responsibilities set forth in the Organization Manual:

a. The Office of Financial and Development Policy with respect to the International Bank and Monetary Fund;

b. The Office of Transport and Communications Policy with respect to the International Telecommunication Union, the International Civil Aviation Organization, and other international organizations concerned with transport and communications;

c. The UNESCO Relations Staff with respect to the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization.

9. The offices in the economic area shall be responsible for the development of over-all economic policy in their respective specialized fields. These offices, and in particular the Investment and Economic Development Staff in the Office of Financial and Development Policy, shall advise on and coordinate with the Administrator on economic policy matters relating to underdeveloped areas and on the relationship of United States Government financial programs to technical cooperation programs, and shall maintain liaison with United States and international agencies to facilitate the coordination of financial programs with the planning and operation of technical cooperation programs.

10. The Office of Educational Exchange shall:

a. Develop plans and procedures for, and facilitate the screening, selection, reception, placement, and orientation of foreign trainees;

b. Coordinate Point 4 training with other United States Government training programs and activities;

c. Assure the adequate review and evaluation of training projects, develop means for maintaining contact with trainees following completion of their program, and perform other related functions as requested by the Administrator.

11. In accordance with the terms of Executive Order 10159, there is established the Interdepartmental Advisory Council on Technical Cooperation (TEC) effective on the date of its first meeting. The Administrator shall serve as Chairman of the Interdepartmental Advisory Council. The Interdepartmental Committee on Scientific and Cultural Cooperation and the Advisory Committee on Technical Assistance will be abolished effective on the date of the first meeting of the Interdepartmental Advisory Council.

12. Pending publication of appropriate revisions to the Organization Manual, section 041 of the Manual shall be considered an annex hereto.

D. THE MUTUAL SECURITY PROGRAM, 1951-1953

9. MUTUAL SECURITY ACT OF 1951, AS AMENDED BY THE MUTUAL SECURITY ACTS OF 1952 AND 1953: Public Law 165 (82d Congress, 1st Session), October 10, 1951; Amended by Public Law 400 (82d Congress, 2d Session), June 20, 1952, and Public Law 118 (83d Congress, 1st Session), July 16, 1953 (Excerpts)¹

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Mutual Security Act of 1951".

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress declares it to be the purpose of this Act to maintain the security and to promote the foreign policy of the United States by authorizing military, economic, and technical assistance to friendly countries to strengthen the mutual security and individual and collective defenses of the free world, to develop their resources in the interest of their security and independence and the national interest of the United States and to facilitate the effective participation of those countries in the United Nations system for collective security. The purposes of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended (22 U. S. C. 1571-1604), the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended (22 U. S. C. 1501-1522), and the Act for International Development (22 U. S. C. 1557) shall hereafter be deemed to include this purpose.

(b)² The Congress welcomes the recent progress in political federation, military integration, and economic unification in Europe and reaffirms its belief in the necessity of further vigorous efforts toward these ends as a means of building strength, establishing security, and preserving peace in the North Atlantic area. In order to provide further encouragement to such efforts, the Congress believes it essential that this Act should be so administered as to support concrete measures for political federation, military integration, and economic unification in Europe. Appropriations made pursuant to paragraphs 101 (a) (1), relating to military assistance, and 101 (a) (2), relating to defense support and economic assistance, of this Act may be used, pursuant to the applicable terms and conditions of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended, and of section 503 of this Act, respectively, to furnish assistance (including, in the case of amounts available pursuant to paragraph 101 (a) (2), transfers of funds) to any of the following organizations: (A) The North Atlantic Treaty Organization, (B) the European Coal and Steel Community, (C) the organization which may evolve from current international discussions concerning a European defense community.

For the sake of brevity, certain footnotes in the Committee print text which do not relate specifically to the basic purposes of the acts are here deleted. The footnotes throughout this document are from the Committee print. Except for sections 11 (amending the Surplus Property Act of 1944, as amended) and 12 (authorizing appropriations for the U. N. International Children's Emergency Fund) of the Mutual Security Act of 1952, and sec. 710 (b) of the act of 1953 (repealing sec. 115 (k) of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948), the acts of 1952 and 1953 consist of amendments to the Mutual Security Act of 1951, the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended, the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended, and the Act for International Development.

² This subsection was added by sec. 2 of the Mutual Security Act of 1952.

TITLE I—EUROPE

SEC. 101 (a) In order to support the freedom of Europe through assistance which will further the carrying out of the plans for defense of the North Atlantic area, while at the same time maintaining the economic stability of the countries of the area so that they may meet their responsibilities for defense, and to further encourage the economic unification and the political federation of Europe, there are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1952 for carrying out the provisions and accomplishing the policies and purpose of this Act—

(1) not to exceed $5,028,000,000 for assistance pursuant to the provisions of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended (22 U. S. C. 1571-1604), for countries which are parties to the North Atlantic Treaty, for Spain,¹ and for any country of Europe (other than a country covered by another title of this Act), which the President determines to be of direct importance to the defense of the North Atlantic area and whose increased ability to defend itself the President determines is important to the preservation of the peace and security of the North Atlantic area and to the security of the United States (any such determination to be reported forthwith to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, and the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and of the House of Representatives), and not to exceed $100,000,000 of such appropriation for any selected persons who are residing in or escapees from the Soviet Union, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, Albania, Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia, or the Communist-dominated or Communist-occupied areas of Germany and Austria, or any Communist-dominated or Communist-occupied areas of Asia² and any other countries absorbed by the Soviet Union either to form such persons into elements of the military forces supporting the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or for other purposes, when it is determined by the President that such assistance will contribute to the defense of the North Atlantic area or to the security of the United States. In addition, unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for carrying out the purposes of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended, through assistance to any of the countries covered by this paragraph are hereby authorized to be continued available through June 30, 1952, and to be consolidated with the appropriation authorized by this paragraph. Section 408 (c) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended (22 U. S. C. 1579), is hereby repealed. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1953 not to exceed $3,415,614,750, for assistance pursuant to the provisions of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended (22 U. S. C. 1571-1604) to countries eligible for assistance under this paragraph; and in addition unexpended balances of any appropriations heretofore made pursuant to this paragraph are authorized to be continued available for their original purposes through June 30, 1953, and to be consolidated with the appropriation hereby authorized.¹

(2) ² There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1953 not to exceed $1,282,433,000 to provide assistance to any country covered by paragraph (1) of this subsection and to any other country covered by section 503 of this Act in accordance with the provisions of such section; and in addition unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made pursuant to this paragraph are authorized to be continued available for their original purposes through June 30, 1953, and to be consolidated with the appropriation hereby authorized.

(b) ³ Not to exceed 10 per centum of the total of the appropriations made available under this section may be transferred, when deter-

² This subsection was revised by sec. 3 (c) of the Mutual Security Act of 1952. It formerly read as follows: "(2) not to exceed $1,022,000,000 for assistance pursuant to the provisions of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended (22 U. S. C. §§ 1501-1522) (including assistance to further European military production), for any country of Europe covered by paragraph (1) of this subsection and for any other country covered by section 103 (a) of the said Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended. In addition, unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for carrying out the purposes of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended, are hereby authorized to be continued available through June 30, 1952, and to be consolidated with the appropriation authorized by this paragraph: Provided, That not to exceed $10,000,000 of the funds made available pursuant to this paragraph may be utilized to effectuate the principles set forth in section 115 (e) of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended."

³ This subsection was revised by sec. 701 (a) of the Mutual Security Act of 1953. The changes made are shown as follows: "(b) Not to exceed 10 per centum of the total of the appropriations [granted pursuant to] made available under this section may be transferred, when determined by the President to be necessary for the purpose of this Act, between appropriations granted pursuant to either paragraph of subsection (a): [Provided, That the amount herein authorized to be transferred shall be determined without reference to any balances of prior appropriations continued available pursuant to this section:] Provided [further], That, whenever the President makes any such determination, he shall forthwith notify the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, and the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and of the House of Representatives."

SEC. 201. In order to further the purpose of this Act by continuing to provide military assistance to Greece, Turkey, and Iran, there are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1952, not to exceed $396,250,000 for furnishing assistance to Greece and Turkey pursuant to the provisions of the Act of May 22, 1947, as amended (22 U. S. C. 1401-1410), and for furnishing assistance to Iran pursuant to the provisions of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended (22 U. S. C. 1571-1604). In addition, unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for assistance to Greece and Turkey, available for the fiscal year 1951, pursuant to the Act of May 22, 1947, as amended, and for assistance to Iran pursuant to the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended, are hereby authorized to be continued available through June 30, 1952, and to be consolidated with the appropriation authorized by this section. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1953 not to exceed $560,316,500, to carry out the purposes and provisions of this section; and in addition unexpended balances of any appropriations heretofore made pursuant to this section are authorized to be continued available for their original purposes through

² This section was added by sec. 201 (b) of the Mutual Security Act of 1953.

June 30, 1953, and to be consolidated with the appropriation hereby authorized.¹

SEC. 202. (a) Whenever the President determines that such action is essential for the purpose of this Act, he may provide assistance, pursuant to the provisions of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended, to any country of the Near East area (other than those covered by section 201) and may utilize not to exceed 10 per centum of the amount made available² under section 201 of this Act: Provided, That any such assistance may be furnished only upon determination by the President that (1) the strategic location of the recipient country makes it of direct importance to the defense of the Near East area, (2) such assistance is of critical importance to the defense of the free nations, and (3) the immediately increased ability of the recipient country to defend itself is important to the preservation of the peace and security of the area and to the security of the United States.

(b)³ There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1954 not to exceed $50,000,000 to be available, whenever the President determines that such action is essential for the purpose of this Act, in order to provide assistance, pursuant to the provisions of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended, in the area of the Near East and Africa. Such assistance may be furnished to any organization created pursuant to a regional defense arrangement in the area, to any nation in the general area participating in such an arrangement, or to any other nation in the general area which the President determines to be of direct importance to the defense of the area and whose increased ability to defend itself the President determines to be important to the security of the United States (any such determination to be reported forthwith to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, and the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and of the House of Representatives). No assistance shall be furnished under this subsection unless the recipient nation has agreed (1) that the equipment, materials, or services provided will be used solely to maintain its internal security, its legitimate self-defense, or to permit it to participate in the defense of the area, or in United Nations collective security arrangements and measures, and (2) that it will not undertake any act of aggression against any other nation.

³ This subsection was added by sec. 704 of the Mutual Security Act of 1953.

SEC. 203.¹ In order to further the purpose of this Act in Africa and the Near East there is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1953 not to exceed $50,822,750 to carry out the purposes and provisions of this section; and in addition unexpended balances of any appropriations heretofore made pursuant to this section are authorized to be continued available for their original purposes through June 30, 1953, and to be consolidated with the appropriation hereby authorized. Funds appropriated pursuant to this section shall be available under the applicable provisions of section 503 of this Act and the Act for International Development (22 U. S. C. 1557).

SEC. 204. Not to exceed $50,000,000 of the funds authorized under section 203 hereof may be contributed to the United Nations during the fiscal year 1952, for the purposes, and under the provisions, of the United Nations Palestine Refugee Aid Act of 1950 (22 U. S. C. 1556): Provided, That, whenever the President shall determine that it would more effectively contribute to the purposes of the said United Nations Palestine Refugee Aid Act of 1950, he may allocate any part of such funds to any agency of the United States Government to be utilized in furtherance of the purposes of said Act and any amount so allocated shall be a part of the United States contribution to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East and shall be so credited by said Agency.

SEC. 205. In order to assist in the relief of refugees coming into Israel, not to exceed $50,000,000 of the funds authorized under section 203 hereof may be utilized during the fiscal year 1952, under such terms and conditions as the President may prescribe, for specific refugee relief and resettlement projects in Israel.

¹ This section was revised by sec. 4 (b) of the Mutual Security Act of 1952. The changes made are shown as follows: "Sec. 203. In order to further the purpose of this Act in Africa and the Near East [, there are] there is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President [,] for the fiscal year [1952,] 1953 not to exceed [$160,000,000 for economic and technical assistance in Africa and the Near East in areas other than those covered by section 103 (a) of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended (22 U. S. C. 1502). Funds appropriated pursuant to this section shall be available under the applicable provisions of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended (22 U. S. C. 1501-1522), and of the Act for International Development (22 U. S. C. 1557).] $50,822,750 to carry out the purposes and provisions of this section; and in addition unexpended balances of any appropriations heretofore made pursuant to this section are authorized to be continued available for their original purposes through June 30, 1953, and to be consolidated with the appropriation hereby authorized. Funds appropriated pursuant to this section shall be available under the applicable provisions of section 503 of this Act and the Act for International Development (22 U. S. C. 1557)."

SEC. 206.¹ In order to further the purpose of this Act in the Near East and Africa, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1954 not to exceed $194,000,000 to be used, on such terms and conditions as he may specify, to furnish special economic assistance designed to promote the economic development of the area, for relief and rehabilitation of refugees in the area, and for other types of economic assistance to assist in maintaining economic and political stability in the area. The applicable provisions of the Act for International Development (64 Stat. 204; 22 U. S. C. 1557), except the provisions relating to the purpose for which assistance may be given, or of section 503 (b) (3) of this Act, shall apply to the expenditure of funds pursuant to this section to the extent that they are not inconsistent with the purposes of this section.

TITLE III—ASIA AND PACIFIC

SEC. 301. In order to carry out in the general area of China (including the Republic of the Philippines and the Republic of Korea) the provisions of subsection (a) of section 303 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended (22 U. S. C. 1604 (a)), there are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1952, not to exceed $535,250,000. In addition, unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for carrying out the provisions of title III of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended (22 U. S. C. 1602-1604), are hereby authorized to be continued available through June 30, 1952, and to be consolidated with the appropriation authorized by this section. Not to exceed $50,000,000 of funds appropriated pursuant to this section (excluding balances of appropriations continued available) may be accounted for as provided in subsection (a) of said section 303. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1953 not to exceed $564,807,500, to carry out the purposes and provisions of this section; and in addition unexpended balances of any appropriations heretofore made pursuant to this section are hereby authorized to be continued available for their original purposes through June 30, 1953, and to be consolidated with the appropriation hereby authorized.²

SEC. 302. (a) In order to further the purpose of this Act through the strengthening of the area covered in section 301 of this Act,³

¹ This sec. 206 was substituted by sec. 501 of the Mutual Security Act of 1953 for a prior sec. 206 on the subject of refugees. The old sec. 206 read as follows: "In addition to the amounts authorized by section 203, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $60,063,250 for carrying out the purposes and provisions of section 204 of this Act, relating to Palestine refugees, during the fiscal year 1953; and not to exceed $70,228,000 for carrying out the purposes and provisions of section 205 of this Act, relating to refugees in Israel, during the fiscal year 1953: Provided, That amounts appropriated pursuant to this section which the President finds cannot be effectively expended to carry out the purposes and provisions of sections 204 and 205 may be transferred to and merged with the appropriations authorized by section 203."

Any such assistance shall be subject to agreements, as provided herein and as required by section 402 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended (22 U. S. C. 1573), designed to assure that the assistance will be used to promote the defense of the Western Hemisphere; and after agreement by the Government of the United States and the country concerned with respect to such missions, military assistance hereunder shall be furnished only in accordance with such agreement.

SEC. 402. In order to further the purpose of this Act among the peoples of the American Republics and non-self-governing territories of the Western Hemisphere¹ through the furnishing of technical assistance, there are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President, for the fiscal year 1952, not to exceed $21,250,000 for assistance under the provisions of the Act for International Development (22 U. S. C. 1557) and of the Institute of Inter-American Affairs Act, as amended (22 U. S. C. 281).

SEC. 403.² In addition to the amounts heretofore authorized and appropriated, there are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1953 not to exceed $57,685,750 to carry out the purposes and provisions of section 401, which relates to military assistance for Latin America, and not to exceed $20,329,000 to carry out the purposes and provisions of section 402, which relates to technical assistance for Latin America. In addition, unexpended balances of the appropriation heretofore made pursuant to each such section are authorized to be continued available for their original purposes through June 30, 1953, and to be consolidated with the applicable appropriation authorized by this section.

TITLE V—ORGANIZATION AND GENERAL PROVISIONS

UNIFIED DIRECTION OF PROGRAM

SEC. 501. (a) In order that the programs of military, economic, and technical assistance authorized by this Act may be administered as parts of a unified program in accordance with the intent of Congress and to fix responsibility for the coordination and supervision of these programs in a single person, the President is authorized to appoint in the Executive Office of the President a Director for Mutual Security.³ The Director, on behalf of the President and subject to his direction, shall have primary responsibility for—

(1) continuous supervision and general direction of the assistance programs under this Act to the end that such programs shall be (A) effectively integrated both at home and abroad, and referred to as the Agency, which shall be headed by the Director for Mutual Security; and

(2) there shall be transferred to the Director the powers, functions, and responsibilities conferred upon the Administrator for Economic Cooperation by the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended, and by any other law, but no such powers, functions, and responsibilities shall be exercised after June 30, 1952, except as provided in subsection (c) of this section.

(c) Not later than April 1, 1952, the President shall inform the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate and the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives which of the powers, functions, and responsibilities transferred to the Director by subsection (b) (2) are found by the President to be necessary to enable the Director after June 30, 1952, to carry out the duties conferred upon him by section 503. The termination provisions of section 122 of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended,¹ shall come into effect on June 30, 1952, and none of the powers, functions, and responsibilities conferred by that Act shall be exercised after that date, except those powers, functions, and responsibilities found necessary to enable the Director to carry out the duties conferred on him by section 503 of this Act, which powers, functions, and responsibilities unless otherwise provided by law shall continue in effect until June 30, 1954.

ADDITIONAL DUTIES OF DIRECTOR FOR MUTUAL SECURITY

SEC. 503. (a) After June 30, 1952, the Director, on behalf of the President and subject to his direction, shall, in consultation with the Secretaries of State and Defense, continue to have primary responsibility for—

(1) the development and administration of programs of assistance designed to sustain and increase military effort, including production, construction, equipment and matériel in each country or in groups of countries which receive United States military assistance;

(2) the provision of such equipment, materials, commodities, services, financial, or other assistance as he finds to be necessary for carrying out mutual defense programs; and

(3) the provision of limited economic assistance to foreign nations for which the United States has responsibility as a result of participation in joint control arrangements when the President finds that the provision of such economic assistance is in the interest of the security of the United States.

[(b) repeals the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended, except for certain portions.]

SEC. 511. (a) No military, economic, or technical assistance authorized pursuant to this Act (other than assistance provided under section 408 (e) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended) shall be supplied to any nation in order to further military effort unless the President finds that the supplying of such assistance will strengthen the security of the United States and unless the recipient country has agreed to—

(1) join in promoting international understanding and good will, and maintaining world peace;

(2) take such action as may be mutually agreed upon to eliminate causes of international tension;

(3) fulfill the military obligations which it has assumed under multilateral or bilateral agreements or treaties to which the United States is a party;

(4) make, consistent with its political and economic stability, the full contribution permitted by its manpower, resources,

² Sec. 1 (b) of Ex. Or. 10458, June 1, 1953 [infra, doc. 13], transferred the Technical Cooperation Administration from the Department of State to the jurisdiction of the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration.

³ Sec. 3 of Reorganization Plan No. 7 of 1953 (effective Aug. 1, 1953), transferred the Institute of Inter-American Affairs to the Foreign Operations Administration and transferred the functions vested by the Inter-American Affairs Act in the Secretary of State to the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration [see infra, doc. 12].

facilities, and general economic condition to the development and maintenance of its own defensive strength and the defensive strength of the free world;

(5) take all reasonable measures which may be needed to develop its defense capacities; and

(6) take appropriate steps to insure the effective utilization of the economic and military assistance provided by the United States.

(b) No economic or technical assistance shall be supplied to any other nation unless the President finds that the supplying of such assistance will strengthen the security of the United States and promote world peace, and unless the recipient country has agreed to join in promoting international understanding and good will, and in maintaining world peace, and to take such action as may be mutually agreed upon to eliminate causes of international tension.

(c)¹ (1) The Congress of the United States finds that mutual security can be realized only to the extent that the countries who receive our aid do their utmost to help themselves and cooperate among themselves and with the United States to the fullest extent in achieving the objectives of the free world. In providing assistance under this Act, the Congress of the United States affirms the desire of the United States to continue to use its leadership and resources for the purpose of uniting the efforts of recipient countries to the end that positive accomplishments toward mutual security may be realized with a maximum of efficiency and a minimum of delay and cost.

(2) In addition to the provisions of subsections (a) and (b) of this section, the Director, in administering this Act, shall insure that, where necessary to the mutual security effort, no country shall receive any assistance hereunder unless it take decisive action to marshal its resources collectively, or individually where more suitable, with integration and unification plans in the appropriate area, and participate in programs which promote collective security in that area. The Director shall insure that, where suitable or necessary to the success of the mutual security effort, countries take adequate steps to mobilize their industries for mutual defense and gear their fiscal, budgetary, capital, political, and military resources to the objectives of this Act and take appropriate other steps toward self-help and mutual cooperation.

(3) Assistance shall be given on a country-by-country basis to a degree and at a rate commensurate with the rate of progress made in the attainment of the objectives of this Act.

FUTURE AUTHORIZATIONS

SEC. 512. In order to carry out the purpose of this Act, with respect to those countries eligible to receive assistance as provided herein, funds shall be available as authorized and appropriated to the President each fiscal year.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF FREE ENTERPRISE

SEC. 516.³ (a) The Congress recognizes the vital role of free enterprise in achieving rising levels of production and standards of living essential to the economic progress and defensive strength of the free world. Accordingly, it is declared to be the policy of the United States, in furtherance of the objectives of this Act, to encourage the efforts of other free countries in fostering private initiative and competition, in discouraging monopolistic practices, in improving the technical efficiency of their industry, agriculture, and commerce, and in the strengthening of free labor unions; and to encourage American enterprise in contributing to the economic strength of other free countries through private investment abroad and the exchange of ideas and technical information on the matters covered by this subsection.

² This section was revised by sec. 7 (j) of the Mutual Security Act of 1952. It formerly read: "In order to promote the increased production, in areas covered by this Act, of materials in which the United States is deficient, not to exceed $55,000,000 of the funds authorized to be appropriated pursuant to section 101 (a) (2) of this Act may be used pursuant to the authority contained in the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended (22 U. S. C. 1501-1522)."

The last sentence was added by sec. 402 of the Mutual Security Act of 1953.

³ Subsec. (a) was revised by sec. 710 (a) of the Mutual Security Act of 1953. It formerly read as follows:

"It is hereby declared to be the policy of the Congress that this Act shall be administered in such a way as (1) to eliminate the barriers to, and provide the incentives for, a steadily increased participation of free private enterprise in developing the resources of foreign countries consistent with the policies of this Act, (2) to the extent that it is feasible and does not interfere with the achievement of the purposes set forth in this Act, to discourage the cartel and monopolistic business practices prevailing in certain countries receiving aid under this Act which result in restricting production and increasing prices, and to encourage where suitable competition and productivity, and (3) to encourage where suitable the development and strengthening of the free labor union movements as the collective bargaining agencies of labor within such countries."

(b) ¹ Under the coordination of the Director for Mutual Security, the Mutual Security Agency, cooperating with private business groups and governmental agencies to the fullest extent possible, shall encourage a greater participation by private capital in the guaranty program and shall develop broad criteria to facilitate such participation, including programs consistent with the purposes of the Act for International Development.

(c) The Department of Commerce shall, in cooperation with such groups and agencies (including the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development), conduct a thorough study of the legal and other impediments, foreign and local, to private investment abroad, and the methods and means whereby those impediments can be removed or decreased and shall make recommendations thereon to the Director for Mutual Security.

(d) The Department of State, in cooperation with other agencies of the Government concerned with private investment abroad, and taking into account the study and recommendations described in subsection (c) of this section, shall accelerate a program of negotiating treaties of commerce and trade, or other temporary arrangements where more suitable or expeditious, which shall include provisions to encourage and facilitate the flow of private investment to countries participating in programs under this Act.

(e) The Technical Cooperation Administration,² taking into account the study and recommendations described in subsection (c) of this section, shall encourage and facilitate a greater participation by private industrial groups or agencies in private contracts awarded by the Administration, and shall, in cooperation with the Department of Commerce and the Mutual Security Agency, find and draw the attention of private enterprise to opportunities for investment and development in underdeveloped areas.

TERMINATION OF ASSISTANCE BY PRESIDENT

SEC. 529. If the President determines that the furnishing of assistance to any nation—

(a) is no longer consistent with the national interest or security of the United States or the policies and purpose of this Act; or

(b) would contravene a decision of the Security Council of the United Nations; or

(c) would be inconsistent with the principle that members of the United Nations should refrain from giving assistance to any nation against which the Security Council or the General Assembly has recommended measures in case of a threat to, or breach of, the peace, or act of aggression, he shall terminate all or part of any assistance furnished pursuant to this Act. The function conferred herein shall be in addition to all other functions heretofore conferred with respect to the termination of military, economic, or technical assistance.

EXPIRATION OF PROGRAM

SEC. 530.¹ (a) After June 30, 1954, or after the date of the passage of a concurrent resolution by the two Houses of Congress before such date, none of the authority conferred by this Act or by the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended (22 U. S. C. 1571-1604) may be exercised; except that during the twenty-four months following such date equipment, materials, commodities, and services with respect to which procurement for, shipment to, or delivery in a recipient country had been authorized prior to such date, may be transferred to such country, and funds appropriated under authority of this Act may be obligated during such twenty-four month period for the necessary expenses of procurement, shipment, delivery, and other activities essential to such transfer and shall remain available during such period for the necessary expenses of liquidating operations under this Act: Provided, That such part of the equipment, materials, and services referred to above as is to be transferred to recipient countries under the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended, or the Act of May 22, 1947, as amended, may be so transferred until June 30, 1957, and that part of the funds referred to above which is appropriated to carry out such Acts may be obligated for the purposes set forth above, and for liquidating operations under this proviso, until June 30, 1957: Provided, That guaranties authorized under section 111 (b) (3) of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended, may be issued until June 30, 1957, out of any funds remaining available for that purpose.

and fully informed of the action which he takes to carry out the provisions of this section.

USE OF SURPLUS AGRICULTURAL COMMODITIES

SEC. 550.¹ (a) Not less than $100,000,000 and not more than $250,000,000 of the funds authorized to be appropriated under this Act, shall be used, directly or indirectly, to finance the purchase of surplus agricultural commodities, or products thereof, produced in the United States.

(b) The President is authorized to enter into agreements with friendly countries for the sale and export of such surplus agricultural commodities under conditions negotiated by him with such countries and to accept in payment therefor local currency for the account of the United States. In negotiating agreements for the sale of such commodities, the President shall—

(1) take special precaution to safeguard against the substitution or displacement of usual marketings of the United States or friendly countries, and to assure to the maximum extent practicable that sales prices of such commodities are consistent with maximum world market prices of like commodities of similar quality, and to obtain the recommendations of the Secretary of Agriculture in carrying out the provisions of this subsection;

(2) use private trade channels to the maximum extent practicable;

(3) give appropriate emphasis to underdeveloped and new market areas;

(4) obtain assurance that the purchasing countries will not resell or transship to other countries or use for other than domestic consumption commodities purchased under this program without specific approval by the President.

(c) Notwithstanding section 1415 of the Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1953, or any other provision of law, the President shall use the proceeds of such sales for the purpose of this Act, giving particular regard to the following purposes—

(1) for providing military assistance to countries or mutual defense organizations eligible to receive assistance under this Act;

(2) for purchase of goods or services in friendly countries;

(3) for loans, under applicable provisions of this Act, to increase production of goods or services, including strategic materials, needed in any country with which an agreement was negotiated, or in other friendly countries, with the authority to use currencies received in repayment for the purposes stated in this section or for deposit to the general account of the Treasury of the United States;

(4) for developing new markets on a mutually beneficial basis;

(5) for grants-in-aid to increase production for domestic needs in friendly countries;

(6) for purchasing materials for United States stockpiles.

¹ This section was added by sec. 706 (h) of the Mutual Security Act of 1953.

(d) In carrying out the provisions of this section, the President shall take special precaution to safeguard against the displacement of foreign exchange earnings which would otherwise accrue to the United States or any friendly nations.

(e) The President is authorized to enter into such agreements with third countries receiving goods accruing from the proceeds of sales made pursuant to this section as he deems necessary to effectuate the purpose of this Act.

10. ADMINISTERING AUTHORITY UNDER THE MUTUAL SECURITY ACT OF 1951: Executive Order No. 10300, November 1, 1951¹

Sec. 1. Delegation of functions of the President.

(a) Except as otherwise provided in section 1 (b) of this order, the functions conferred upon the President by the following-designated laws are hereby delegated to the Director for Mutual Security: the Mutual Security Act of 1951, 65 Stat. 373 (Public Law 165, 82d Congress, approved October 10, 1951),² the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, 63 Stat. 714,³ as amended (22 U. S. C. 1571-1604), and the act of May 22, 1947, 61 Stat. 103, as amended (22 U. S. C. 1401-1408).

(b) There are hereby excluded from the functions delegated by section 1 (a) of this order:

(1) The functions conferred upon the President by the laws referred to in section 1 (a) of this Executive order with respect to the appointment of officers required to be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the transmittal of annual, semi-annual, or other periodic statutory reports to the Congress, and the termination or withdrawal of assistance.

(2) The functions conferred upon the President with respect to findings, determinations, certification, agreements, or regulations, as the case may be, by sections 101, 202, 302 (a), or 511, or by the proviso of section 401, of the said Mutual Security Act of 1951 or by sections 303, 402, and 411 (b) of the said Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended; functions so conferred with respect to the transfer of funds under sections 101 (b), 303 (a), and 513 of the Mutual Security Act of 1951; and so much of the functions so conferred by section 5 of the said act of May 22, 1947, as amended, as relates to rules and regulations providing for coordination among representatives of the United States Government in each foreign country concerned.

(3) The functions conferred upon the President by sections 502 (c), 503, 507, and 530 of the said Mutual Security Act of 1951 and by sections 407 (b) (2) and 408 (f) of the said Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended.

(c) Funds appropriated or otherwise made available to the President to carry out the laws referred to in section 1 (a) hereof shall be deemed to be allocated to the Director for Mutual Security without any further action by the President, and the said funds may be allocated by the Director for Mutual Security to any agency, department, establishment, or wholly-owned corporation of the Government for obligation or expenditure thereby, consistent with applicable law, subject, however, to the reservation of functions respecting transfer of funds set forth in section 1 (b) (2) hereof.

(d) The functions delegated to the Director for Mutual Security by this section 1 shall be deemed to include the authority to redelegate the functions so delegated.

Sec. 2. International development. The administration of programs under the Act for International Development (Title IV of the act of June 5, 1950, 64 Stat. 204,¹ as amended (22 U. S. C. 1557 et seq.)) in accordance with Executive Order No. 10159 of September 8, 1950,² shall be subject to coordination, direction, and supervision by the Director for Mutual Security in accordance with section 501 (a) of the Mutual Security Act of 1951; and the said Executive Order No. 10159 is amended accordingly.

Sec. 3. Coordination with foreign policy. The Secretary of State and the Director for Mutual Security shall establish and maintain arrangements which will insure that the programs included in the Mutual Security Act of 1951 shall be carried out in conformity with the established foreign policy of the United States.

Sec. 4. Interrelationship of Director and Secretary of Defense. (a) Consonant with section 501 (a) of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, the Secretary of Defense shall exercise the responsibility and authority vested in him by section 506 (a) of the said Act subject to coordination, direction, and supervision by the Director for Mutual Security.

(b) The Secretary of Defense shall keep the Director for Mutual Security fully and currently informed of all matters, including prospective action, relating to the establishment of priorities under section 506 (b) and the furnishing of military items under section 506 (c) of the said Act.

Sec. 5. Economic cooperation. (a) December 30, 1951, is hereby fixed as the date on which sections 502 (a), 502 (b) (2) and 504 (b) of the Mutual Security Act of 1951 shall take effect.

(b) The Mutual Security Agency is hereby designated as the agency responsible for liquidating any outstanding affairs of the Economic Cooperation Administration which are now or hereafter required to be discontinued by law; and the said Agency shall be deemed to be the successor of the said Administration in all respects, subject to the provisions of the Mutual Security Act of 1951.

Sec. 6. Transfer of personnel, property, records, and funds. So much of the personnel, records, property, and unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, and other funds of the Department of State as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget determines to relate to functions under the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended, and the said act of May 22, 1947, and to be required by the Director for Mutual Security for the performance of his functions hereunder shall be transferred to the Director for Mutual Security.

Sec. 7. Prior orders. (a) Effective as of the date fixed in section 5 (a) hereof, with respect to provisions then in force, and except as may be inappropriate, references in prior Executive orders to the Economic Cooperation Administration, the Administrator for Economic Cooperation, and the United States Special Representative for (or in) Europe, are amended to refer to the Mutual Security Agency, the Director for Mutual Security, and the Special Representative in Europe (provided for in section 504 (a) of the Mutual Security Act of 1951), respectively.

(b) To the extent that any provision of any prior Executive order is inconsistent with the provisions of this order, the latter shall control and such prior provision is amended accordingly.

(c) All orders, regulations, rulings, certificates, directives, agreements, contracts, delegations, and other actions of any department, agency, or other establishment or officer of the Government relating to any function or under any authority continued in effect by the Mutual Security Act of 1951 shall remain in effect except as they are inconsistent herewith or are hereafter amended or revoked under proper authority.

(d) Executive Order No. 10099 of January 27, 1950,¹ is hereby revoked. The International Security Affairs Committee (approved by the President December 19, 1950) is hereby terminated. The provisions of the identical letters of the President transmitted to the Secretary of State and the Administrator for Economic Cooperation on April 5, 1951, are hereby revoked.

Sec. 8. Definitions. As used in this order the term "functions" embraces duties, powers, responsibilities, authority, and discretion.

11. COORDINATION OF FOREIGN AID PROGRAMS AT THE DIPLOMATIC MISSION LEVEL: Executive Order No. 10338, April 4, 1952²

By virtue of the authority vested in me by section 507 of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, 65 Stat. 373 (Public Law 165, 82nd Congress, approved October 10, 1951), and as President of the United States and Commander in Chief of the armed forces of the United States, it is ordered as follows:

Section 1. Functions of the Chief of the United States Diplomatic Mission. (a) The Chief of the United States Diplomatic Mission in each country, as the representative of the President, and acting on his behalf, shall coordinate the activities of the United States representatives (including the chiefs of economic missions, military assistance advisory groups, and other representatives of agencies of the United States Government) in such country engaged in carrying out programs under the Mutual Security Act of 1951 (hereinafter referred to as the Act), and he shall assume responsibility for assuring the unified development and execution of the said programs in such country. More particularly, the functions of each Chief of United States Diplomatic Mission shall include, with respect to the programs and country concerned:

(1) Exercising general direction and leadership of the entire effort.
(2) Assuring that recommendations and prospective plans and actions of the United States representatives are effectively coordinated and are consistent with and in furtherance of the established policy of the United States.

(3) Assuring that the interpretation and application of instructions received by the United States representatives from higher authority are in accord with the established policy of the United States.

(4) Guiding the United States representatives in working out measures to prevent duplication in their efforts and to promote the most effective and efficient use of all United States officers and employees having mutual security responsibilities.

(5) Keeping the United States representatives fully informed as to current and prospective United States policies.

(6) Prescribing procedures governing the coordination of the activities of the United States representatives, and assuring that these representatives shall have access to all available information essential to the accomplishment of their prescribed duties.

(7) Preparing and submitting such reports on the operation and status of the programs under the Act as may be directed by the Director for Mutual Security.

(b) Each Chief of United States Diplomatic Mission shall perform his functions under this order in accordance with instructions from higher authority and subject to established policies and programs of the United States.

(c) No Chief of United States Diplomatic Mission shall delegate any function conferred upon him by the provisions of this order which directly involves the exercise of direction, coordination, or authority.

Section 2. Referral of unresolved matters. The Chief of the United States Diplomatic Mission in each country shall initiate steps to reconcile any divergent views arising in the country concerned with respect to programs under the Act. If agreement cannot be reached the Chief of the United States Diplomatic Mission shall recommend a course of action, and such course of action shall be followed unless a United States representative requests that the issue be referred to higher authority for decision. If such a request is made, the parties concerned shall promptly refer the issue to higher authority for resolution prior to taking action at the country level. The Director for Mutual Security shall assure expeditious decisions on matters so submitted.

Section 3. Effect of order on United States Representatives. (a) All United States representatives in each country shall be subject to the responsibilities imposed upon the Chief of the United States Diplomatic Mission in such country by section 507 of the Mutual Security Act of 1951 and by this order.

(b) Subject to compliance with the provisions of this order and with the prescribed procedures of their respective agencies, all United States representatives affected by this order (1) shall have direct communication with their respective agencies and with such other parties and in such manner as may be authorized by their respective agencies, (2) shall keep the respective Chiefs of United States Diplomatic Missions and each other fully and currently informed on all matters, including prospective plans, recommendations, and actions, relating to programs under the Act, and (3) shall furnish to the respective Chiefs of United States Diplomatic Missions, upon their request, documents and information concerning the said programs.

Section 4. Further coordination procedures. The Director for Mutual Security shall be responsible for assuring the carrying out of the provisions of this order. He is authorized to prescribe, after consultation with the interested Government agencies, any additional procedures he may find necessary to carry out the provisions of this order.

Section 5. Prior orders. (a) To the extent that provisions of any prior order are inconsistent with the provisions of this order, the latter shall control, and any such prior provisions are amended accordingly. All orders, regulations, rulings, certificates, directives, and other actions relating to any function affected by this order shall remain in effect except as they are inconsistent herewith or are hereafter amended or revoked under proper authority.

(b) Nothing in this order shall affect Executive Orders Nos. 10062, 10063 and 10144 of June 6, 1949, June 13, 1949, and July 21, 1950, respectively.¹

(c) Executive Orders Nos. 9857, 9862, 9864, 9914, 9944, 9960, 10208, and 10259 of May 22, 1947, May 31, 1947, May 31, 1947, December 26, 1947, April 9, 1948, May 19, 1948, January 25, 1951, and June 27, 1951, respectively, are hereby revoked.²

12. ESTABLISHMENT OF THE FOREIGN OPERATIONS ADMINISTRATION: Reorganization Plan No. 7 of 1953, June 1, 1953³

SECTION 1. Establishment of Foreign Operations Administration.—

(a) There is hereby established a new agency which shall be known as the Foreign Operations Administration, hereinafter referred to as the "Administration".

(b) There shall be at the head of the Administration a Director of the Foreign Operations Administration, hereinafter referred to as the "Director". The Director shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and shall receive compensation at the rate of $22,500 a year. The Secretary of State shall advise with the President concerning the appointment and tenure of the Director.

¹ 14 Fed. Reg. 2965, 14 Fed. Reg. 3221, and 15 Fed. Reg. 4705.

² 12 Fed. Reg. 3331, 3558, 3559, 8867; 13 Fed. Reg. 1975 and 2707; and 16 Fed. Reg. 709 and 6271.

³ 67 Stat. 639. The plan entered into effect Aug. 1, 1953.

(c) There shall be in the Administration a Deputy Director of the Foreign Operations Administration, who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall receive compensation at the rate of $17,500 a year. The Deputy Director shall perform such functions as the Director shall from time to time designate, and shall act as Director during the absence or disability of the Director or in the event of a vacancy in the office of Director.

(d) There are hereby established in the Administration six new offices with such title or titles as the Director shall from time to time determine. Appointment thereto shall be by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The compensation for each of two of the said offices shall be at the rate of $16,000 a year and the compensation for each of the other four offices shall be at the rate of $15,000 a year. The persons appointed to the said new offices shall perform such functions as the Director shall from time to time designate, and are authorized to act as Director, as the Director may designate, during the absence or disability of the Director and the Deputy Director or in the event of vacancies in the offices of Director and Deputy Director.

SEC. 2. Transfer of functions to the Director.—There are hereby transferred to the Director:

(a) All functions vested by the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended, or by any other statute in the Director for Mutual Security provided for in section 501 of that Act, or in the Mutual Security Agency created by that Act, or in any official or office of that Agency, including the functions of the Director for Mutual Security as a member of the National Security Council.

(b) All functions vested by the Mutual Defense Assistance Control Act of 1951 in the Administrator created by that Act.¹

(c) The function vested by section 6 of the Yugoslav Emergency Relief Assistance Act of 1950 in the Secretary of State.²

SEC. 3. Institute of Inter-American Affairs.—The Institute of Inter-American Affairs, together with its functions,³ is hereby transferred to the Administration. All functions vested by the Institute of Inter-American Affairs Act in the Secretary of State are hereby transferred to the Director. Functions with respect to serving as employees of the said Institute or as members of the board of directors thereof, including eligibility, as the case may be, to be detailed as such employees or to serve as such members, are hereby transferred from the officials and employees of the Department of State to the officials and employees of the Administration. The Institute shall be administered subject to the direction and control of the Director.

SEC. 4. National Advisory Council.—The Director shall be a member of the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems (22 U. S. C. 286b).

SEC. 5. Performance of functions transferred to the Director.—The Director may from time to time make such provisions as he shall deem appropriate authorizing the performance by any other officer, or by any employee or organizational entity, of the Administration, of any function of the Director, except the function of being a member of the National Security Council and the function of being a member of the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems.

SEC. 6. Transfer of functions to the President.—All functions vested in the Secretary of State by the United Nations Palestine Refugee Aid Act of 1950 ¹ are hereby transferred to the President.

SEC. 7. Incidental transfers.—(a) Personnel, property, records, and unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, and other funds, employed, used, held, available, or to be made available in connection with functions transferred or vested by this reorganization plan shall be transferred, at such time or times as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall direct, as follows:

(1) So much of those relating to functions transferred to or vested in the Director or the Administration as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall determine shall be transferred to the Administration.

(2) Those of the Institute of Inter-American Affairs shall be transferred along with the Institute.

(3) So much of those relating to the functions transferred by section 6 hereof as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall determine shall be transferred to the agency or agencies of the Government to which the President delegates the said functions.

(b) Such further measures and dispositions as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall deem to be necessary in order to effectuate the transfers provided for in subsection (a) of this section shall be carried out in such manner as he shall direct and by such agencies as he shall designate.

SEC. 8. Abolitions.—(a) There are hereby abolished:

(1) The offices of Director for Mutual Security and Deputy Director for Mutual Security, provided for in sections 501 and 504, respectively, of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended (including the organization in the Executive Office of the President known as the Office of the Director for Mutual Security).

(2) The Mutual Security Agency.

(3) The title of Administrator provided for in the Mutual Defense Assistance Control Act.

(4) The four positions provided for in section 406 (e) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended.

(5) The offices of Administrator and Deputy Administrator for Technical Cooperation, provided for in section 413 (a) of the Act for International Development,¹ as amended, together with the functions vested in the Administrator by the said section 413 (a), as amended.

(6) The offices of the Special Representative in Europe and Deputy Special Representative in Europe, provided for in section 504 (a) of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended. The abolition of the said offices of Representative and Deputy Representative shall become effective on September 1, 1953 (unless a later date is required by the provisions of section 6 (a) of the Reorganization Act of 1949,² as amended).

(b) The Director shall wind up any outstanding affairs of the aforesaid abolished agencies and offices not otherwise provided for in this reorganization plan.

SEC. 9. Interim provisions.—The President may authorize the persons who, immediately prior to the effective date of this reorganization plan, hold offices or occupy positions abolished by section 8 hereof to hold offices and occupy positions under section 1 hereof until the latter offices and positions are filled pursuant to the provisions of the said section 1 or by recess appointment, as the case may be, but in no event for any period extending more than 60 days after the said effective date, as follows:

(a) The Director and Deputy Director for Mutual Security as the Director and Deputy Director of the Foreign Operations Administration, respectively.

(b) The Administrator for Technical Cooperation and the person occupying the senior position provided for in section 406 (e) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended, to serve in the two senior positions created by section 1 (d) hereof.

(c) The Deputy Administrator for Technical Cooperation and the persons occupying the three positions provided for in section 406 (e) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended, to serve in the four positions created by section 1 (d) hereof which have compensation at the rate of $15,000 a year.

13. ADMINISTRATION OF CERTAIN ELEMENTS OF THE MUTUAL SECURITY PROGRAM: Executive Order No. 10458, June 1, 1953³

States Code, and as President of the United States, it is hereby ordered as follows:

SECTION 1. International development. (a) The functions conferred upon the Secretary of State by Executive Order No. 10159 of September 8, 1950, 15 F. R. 6103,¹ are hereby transferred to the Director for Mutual Security; and, accordingly, the said Executive order is amended by striking therefrom, wherever they appear, the words "Secretary of State" and inserting in lieu thereof, in each instance, the words "Director for Mutual Security".

(b) The Technical Cooperation Administration is hereby transferred from the Department of State to the jurisdiction of the Director for Mutual Security and shall be administered under his direction and supervision.

SEC. 2. Participation in certain international organizations. There are hereby delegated to the Director for Mutual Security the functions conferred upon the President by section 534 of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended, section 12 of the Mutual Security Act of 1952, and section 303 of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended, with respect to the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration (as the successor of the Provisional Intergovernmental Committee for the Movement of Migrants from Europe); the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund, and the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency, respectively.

SEC. 3. Ocean freight charges on relief supplies, etc. The Mutual Security Agency is hereby designated as the agency of the Government which shall hereafter exercise the authority to pay ocean freight charges on shipments of relief supplies and packages under section 117 (c) of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended,² and section 535 of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended.

SEC. 4. Functions of Secretary of State and Department of State. (a) Nothing in this order shall be deemed to modify the functions of the Secretary of State with respect to conducting negotiations with other governments.

(b) The Secretary of State and the Director for Mutual Security shall establish and maintain arrangements which will insure that the functions of the said Director under this order shall be carried out in conformity with the established foreign policy of the United States.

(c) The Secretary of State shall be responsible for making the United States contributions, under subsections (a) and (b) of section 404 of the Act for International Development, to the United Nations for technical cooperation programs carried on by it and its related organizations, and to the Organization of American States, its related organizations, and other international organizations for technical cooperation programs carried on by them, and for making United States contributions to the international organizations referred to in section 2 hereof. The Secretary of State shall also be responsible for formulating and presenting, with the assistance of the Director for Mutual Security, the policy of the United States with respect to the assistance programs of the international organizations referred to in this subsection and in section 2 hereof and for representing the United States in those organizations. Sections 1 (a) and 2 hereof shall be subject to this subsection.

(d) The Director for Mutual Security shall allocate to the Department of State funds which have been or may be appropriated or otherwise made available for contributions of the United States to the international organizations referred to in section 2 hereof or to those receiving contributions under subsections (a) and (b) of section 404 of the Act for International Development.

SEC. 5. Miscellaneous provisions. (a) Subsection (a) of section 2 and sections 3 and 4 of Executive Order No. 10300 of November 1, 1951,¹ as amended by Executive Order No. 10368 of June 30, 1952,² are hereby revoked.

(b) There shall be transferred to the jurisdiction of the Director for Mutual Security, consonant with law, so much as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall determine of the personnel, property, records, and unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, and other funds, employed, held, used, available, or to be made available in connection with the functions transferred, delegated, or assigned to the Director for Mutual Security or the Mutual Security Agency by this order. Such further measures and dispositions as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall deem to be necessary in order to effectuate the transfers provided for in this section shall be carried out in such manner as he shall direct and by such agencies as he shall designate.

(c) To the extent that any provision of any prior Executive order is inconsistent with the provisions of this order, the latter shall control and such prior provision is amended accordingly.

(d) All orders, regulations, rulings, certificates, directives, agreements, contracts, delegations, determinations, and other actions of any officer or agency of the Government relating to any function affected by this order shall remain in effect except as they are inconsistent herewith or are hereafter amended or revoked under proper authority.

President of the United States and Commander in Chief of the armed forces of the United States, it is hereby ordered as follows:

PART I. FOREIGN AID

SECTION 101. Delegation of certain functions of the President

(a) Except as otherwise provided in this order, the functions conferred upon the President by the following-designated laws are hereby delegated to the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration: the Mutual Security Act of 1951, 65 Stat. 373, as amended; the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, 63 Stat. 714, as amended (22 U. S. C. 1571-1604); the act of May 22, 1947, 61 Stat. 103, as amended (22 U. S. C. 1401-1408); the Mutual Defense Assistance Control Act of 1951, 65 Stat. 644 (22 U. S. C. 1611-1613c); and those provisions of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, 62 Stat. 137, as amended (22 U. S. C. 1501 et seq.) which are continued in effect by section 503 of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended.

(b) There are hereby excluded from the functions delegated by section 101 (a) of this order:

(1) The functions conferred upon the President by the laws referred to in section 101 (a) of this order with respect to the appointment of officers required to be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the transmittal of periodic or special reports to the Congress, and the termination or withdrawal of assistance.

(2) The functions conferred upon the President with respect to findings, determinations, certification, agreements, transfers of funds, or directives, as the case may be, by sections 101 (a) (1), 101 (b), 202, 302 (a), 303 (a) (last two sentences), 401, 503 (a) (3), 507 (except as provided in Part III hereof), 511, 513, 530, 532, 540, 542, 550 (b), and 550 (e) of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended; sections 303, 402, 407 (b) (2), 408 (f), and 411 (b) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended; sections 105 (c), 111 (b) (2) (first clause), and 119 of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended; and sections 103 (b), 104, 203, and 301 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Control Act of 1951.

(c) Funds which have been or may be appropriated or otherwise made available to the President to carry out the laws referred to in section 101 (a) hereof, and section 12 of the Mutual Security Act of 1952 (66 Stat. 151), shall be deemed to be allocated to the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration without any further action by the President, and the said funds may be allocated by the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration to any agency, department, establishment, or wholly-owned corporation of the Government for obligation or expenditure thereby, consistent with applicable law, subject, however, to the reservation of functions relating to transfer of funds set forth in section 101 (b) (2) hereof.

SEC. 102. Interrelationship of Director and Secretary of Defense.

(a) Consonant with section 501 (a) of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended, the Secretary of Defense shall exercise the responsibility and authority vested in him by section 506 (a) of the said Act, as amended, subject to coordination, direction, and supervision by the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration.

(b) The Secretary of Defense shall keep the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration fully and currently informed of all matters, including prospective action, relating to the establishment of priorities under section 506 (b) and the furnishing of military items under section 506 (c) of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended.

SEC. 103. Aid to Palestine refugees. (a) Subject to subsection (b) of this section, the functions transferred to the President by section 6 of the Reorganization Plan No. 7 of 1953 are hereby delegated to the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration.

(b) The Secretary of State shall be responsible for making the United States contribution to the United Nations under the United Nations Palestine Refugee Aid Act of 1950.¹ The Secretary of State shall also be responsible for formulating and presenting, with the assistance of the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration, the policy of the United States with respect to aid to Palestine refugees and for representing the United States in the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East.

SEC. 104. Successor agencies. (a) Except as may be otherwise provided in this order, the Foreign Operations Administration and the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration are hereby made the successors, respectively, of the Mutual Security Agency and the Director for Mutual Security.

(b) Except in instances wherein the provisions concerned are for any reason inapplicable as of the effective date of Reorganization Plan No. 7 of 1953,² each reference in any prior Executive order to the Mutual Security Agency or the Director for Mutual Security is hereby amended to refer to the Foreign Operations Administration and the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration, respectively.

(c) Without limiting the application of section 104 (b) of this order, the amendments made thereby shall apply, subject to the provisions of the said section 104 (b), to prior references to the Director for Mutual Security and the Mutual Security Agency in (1) Executive Order No. 10159 of September 8, 1950 (15 F. R. 6103),³ as amended, (2) sections 7 and 9 of Executive Order No. 10300 of November 9, 1951 (16 F. R. 11203),⁴ as amended, (3) Executive Order No. 10380 of August 2, 1952 (17 F. R. 7107), and (4) Executive Order No. 10458 of June 1, 1953 (18 F. R. 3159).⁵

SEC. 105. Redelegation. The functions delegated to the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration by the provisions of this Part shall be deemed to include the authority to redelegate the functions so delegated.

PART II. FOREIGN INFORMATION

SEC. 201. Informational media guaranties. The United States Information Agency¹ is hereby designated as the agency of the Government which shall on and after the effective date of this order exercise the authority to make informational media guaranties under section 111 (b) (3) of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended (22 U. S. C. 1509 (b) (3)), and section 536 of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended, and to administer such guaranties made prior to the effective date of this order. The Director of the Foreign Operations Administration, after consultation with the Director of the United States Information Agency, shall fix (and may from time to time revise) an amount representing that portion of the limitation prescribed by section 111 (b) (3) of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended, which may be utilized by the Director of the United States Information Agency for informational media guaranties, including the liquidation of obligations outstanding under such guaranties as of the effective date of this order.

SEC. 202. Information regarding technical cooperation. The United States Information Agency shall publicize abroad the activities carried on under the Act for International Development.² Executive Order No. 10159 of September 8, 1950 (15 F. R. 6103), as amended, is hereby further amended accordingly.

PART III. PROCEDURES FOR COORDINATION ABROAD

SEC. 301. Functions of the Chief of the United States Diplomatic Mission. (a) The Chief of the United States Diplomatic Mission in each country, as the representative of the President, shall serve as the channel of authority on foreign policy and shall provide foreign policy direction to all representatives of United States agencies in such country.

(b) The Chief of the United States Diplomatic Mission in each country, as the representative of the President and acting on his behalf, shall coordinate the activities of the representatives of United States agencies (including the chiefs of economic and technical assistance missions, military assistance advisory groups, foreign information staffs, and other representatives of agencies of the United States Government) in such country engaged in carrying out programs under the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended, programs under the Mutual Defense Assistance Control Act of 1951, and the programs transferred by section 2 of Reorganization Plan No. 8 of 1953;³ and he shall assume responsibility for assuring the unified development and execution of the said programs in such country. More particularly, the functions of each Chief of United States Diplomatic Mission shall include, with respect to the programs and country concerned:

(1) Exercising general direction and leadership of the entire effort.

² Supra, doc. 6.

³ Infra, pp. 3184-3185.

(2) Assuring that recommendations and prospective plans and actions of representatives of United States agencies are effectively coordinated and are consistent with and in furtherance of the established policy of the United States.

(3) Assuring that the interpretation and application of instructions received by representatives of United States agencies from higher authority are in accord with the established policy of the United States.

(4) Guiding the representatives of United States agencies in working out measures to prevent duplication in their efforts and to promote the most effective and efficient use of all United States officers and employees engaged on the aforesaid programs.

(5) Keeping the representatives of United States agencies fully informed as to current and prospective United States policies.

(6) Prescribing procedures governing the coordination of the activities of representatives of United States agencies, and assuring that these representatives shall have access to all available information essential to the accomplishment of their prescribed duties.

(7) Preparing and submitting such reports on the operation and status of the programs referred to in the preamble of this section 301 (b) as may be requested of the Secretary of State by the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration and the Director of the United States Information Agency, respectively.

(8) Recommending the withdrawal from the country of United States personnel whenever in his opinion the interests of the United States warrant such action.

(c) Each Chief of United States Diplomatic Mission shall perform his functions under this Part in accordance with instructions from higher authority and subject to established policies and programs of the United States. Only the President and the Secretary of State shall communicate instructions directly to the Chief of the United States Diplomatic Mission.

(d) No Chief of United States Diplomatic Mission shall delegate any function conferred upon him by the provisions of this Part which directly involves the exercise of direction, coordination, or authority.

SEC. 302. Referral of unresolved matters. The Chief of the United States Diplomatic Mission in each country shall initiate steps to reconcile any divergent views arising between representatives of United States agencies in the country concerned with respect to programs referred to in the preamble of section 301 (b) hereof. If agreement cannot be reached the Chief of the United States Diplomatic Mission shall recommend a course of action, and such course of action shall be followed unless a representative of a United States agency requests that the issue be referred to the Secretary of State and the United States agencies concerned for decision. If such a request is made, the parties concerned shall promptly refer the issue for resolution prior to taking action at the country level.

SEC. 303. Effect of order on representatives of United States agencies.

(a) All representatives of United States agencies in each country shall be subject to the responsibilities imposed upon the Chief of the United States Diplomatic Mission in such country by section 507 of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended, and by this Part.

(b) Subject to compliance with the provisions of this Part and with the prescribed procedures of their respective agencies, all representatives of United States agencies affected by this Part (1) shall have direct communication with their respective agencies and with such other parties and in such manner as may be authorized by their respective agencies, (2) shall keep the respective Chiefs of United States Diplomatic Missions and each other fully and currently informed on all matters, including prospective plans, recommendations, and actions, relating to the programs referred to in the preamble of section 301 (b) hereof, and (3) shall furnish to the respective Chiefs of United States Diplomatic Missions, upon their request, documents and information concerning the said programs.

PART IV. GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 401. Coordination of foreign policy. The Secretary of State, the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration, and the Director of the United States Information Agency shall establish and maintain arrangements which will insure that the programs under the supervision of the latter two officials are carried out in conformity with the established foreign policy of the United States.

SEC. 402. Transfer of personnel, property, records, and funds. So much of the personnel, records, property, and unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, and other funds, available to any officer or agency whereto there is delegated or assigned immediately prior to the taking effect of this Executive order any function which by this order is otherwise delegated or assigned, as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget determines to relate to the said functions and to be required by the officer or agency whereto the functions concerned are delegated or assigned by this order, for the performance thereof, shall be transferred, consonant with law, to such latter officer or agency. Such further measures and dispositions as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall deem to be necessary in order to effectuate the transfers provided for in this section shall be carried out in such manner as he shall direct and by such agencies as he shall designate.

SEC. 403. Prior orders and actions. (a) Executive Order No. 10300 of November 9, 1951 (16 F. R. 11203), as amended, exclusive of sections 7 and 9 thereof, and Executive Order No. 10338 of April 4, 1952 (17 F. R. 3009), are hereby superseded.

(b) Nothing in this order shall affect Executive Order No. 10062 of June 6, 1949,¹ as heretofore amended.

(c) To the extent that any provision of any prior Executive order is inconsistent with the provisions of this order, the latter shall control and such prior provision is amended accordingly.

(d) All orders, regulations, rulings, certificates, directives, agree-strength of the United States and of the cooperating nations; (2) impede the ability of nations threatening the security of the United States to conduct military operations; and (3) to assist the people of the nations under the domination of foreign aggressors to reestablish their freedom.

It is further declared to be the policy of the United States that no military, economic, or financial assistance shall be supplied to any nation unless it applies an embargo on such shipments to any nation or combination of nations threatening the security of the United States, including the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and all countries under its domination.

This Act shall be administered in such a way as to bring about the fullest support for any resolution of the General Assembly of the United Nations, supported by the United States, to prevent the shipment of certain commodities to areas under the control of governments engaged in hostilities in defiance of the United Nations.

SEC. 102. Responsibility for giving effect to the purposes of this Act shall be vested in the person occupying the senior position authorized by subsection (e) of section 406 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended,¹ or in any person who may hereafter be charged with principal responsibility for the administration of the provisions of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949. Such person is hereinafter referred to as the "Administrator."

SEC. 103. (a) The Administrator is hereby authorized and directed to determine within thirty days after enactment of this Act after full and complete consideration of the views of the Departments of State, Defense, and Commerce; the Economic Cooperation Administration; and any other appropriate agencies, and notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, which items are, for the purpose of this Act, arms, ammunition, and implements of war, atomic energy materials, petroleum, transportation materials of strategic value, and those items of primary strategic significance used in the production of arms, ammunition, and implements of war which should be embargoed to effectuate the purposes of this Act: Provided, That such determinations shall be continuously adjusted to current conditions on the basis of investigation and consultation, and that all nations receiving United States military, economic, or financial assistance shall be kept informed of such determinations.

(b) All military, economic, or financial assistance to any nation shall, upon the recommendation of the Administrator, be terminated forthwith if such nation after sixty days from the date of a determination under section 103 (a) knowingly permits the shipment to any nation or combination of nations threatening the security of the United States, including the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and all countries under its domination, of any item which he has determined under section 103 (a) after a full and complete investigation to be included in any of the following categories: Arms, ammunition, and implements of war, atomic energy materials, petroleum, transportation materials of strategic value, and items of primary strategic significance used in the production of arms, ammunition, and implements of war: Provided, That the President after receiving the advice of the Administrator and after taking into account the contribution of such country to the mutual security of the free world, the importance of such assistance to the security of the United States, the strategic importance of imports received from countries of the Soviet bloc, and the adequacy of such country's controls over the export to the Soviet bloc of items of strategic importance, may direct the continuance of such assistance to a country which permits shipments of items other than arms, ammunition, implements of war, and atomic energy materials when unusual circumstances indicate that the cessation of aid would clearly be detrimental to the security of the United States: Provided further, That the President shall immediately report any determination made pursuant to the first proviso of this section with reasons therefor to the Appropriations and Armed Services Committees of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, and the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, and the President shall at least once each quarter review all determinations made previously and shall report his conclusions to the foregoing committees of the House and Senate, which reports shall contain an analysis of the trade with the Soviet bloc of countries for which determinations have been made.

SEC. 104. Whenever military, economic, or financial assistance has been terminated as provided in this Act, such assistance can be resumed only upon determination by the President that adequate measures have been taken by the nation concerned to assure full compliance with the provisions of this Act.

SEC. 105. For the purposes of this Act the term "assistance" does not include activities carried on for the purpose of facilitating the procurement of materials in which the United States is deficient.

TITLE II—OTHER MATERIALS

SEC. 201. The Congress of the United States further declares it to be the policy of the United States to regulate the export of commodities other than those specified in Title I of this Act to any nation or combination of nations threatening the security of the United States, including the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and all countries under its domination, in order to strengthen the United States and other cooperating nations of the free world and to oppose and offset by nonmilitary action acts which threaten the security of the United States and the peace of the world.

SEC. 202. The United States shall negotiate with any country receiving military, economic, or financial assistance arrangements for the recipient country to undertake a program for controlling exports of items not subject to embargo under Title I of this Act, but which in the judgment of the Administrator should be controlled to any nation or combination of nations threatening the security of the United States, including the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and all countries under its domination.

SEC. 203. All military, economic, and financial assistance shall be terminated when the President determines that the recipient country (1) is not effectively cooperating with the United States pursuant to this title, or (2) is failing to furnish to the United States information sufficient for the President to determine that the recipient country is effectively cooperating with the United States.

TITLE III—GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 301. All other nations (those not receiving United States military, economic, or financial assistance) shall be invited by the President to cooperate jointly in a group or groups or on an individual basis in controlling the export of the commodities referred to in Title I and Title II of this Act to any nation or combination of nations threatening the security of the United States, including the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and all countries under its domination.

SEC. 302. The Administrator with regard to all titles of this Act shall—

(a) coordinate those activities of the various United States departments and agencies which are concerned with security controls over exports from other countries;

(b) make a continuing study of the administration of export control measures undertaken by foreign governments in accordance with the provisions of this Act, and shall report to the Congress from time to time but not less than once every six months recommending action where appropriate; and

(c) make available technical advice and assistance on export control procedures to any nation desiring such cooperation.

SEC. 303. The provisions of subsection (a) of section 403, of section 404, and of subsection (c) and (d) of section 406 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949 (Public Law 329, Eighty-first Congress), as amended, insofar as they are consistent with this Act, shall be applicable to this Act. Funds made available for the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended, shall be available for carrying out this Act in such amounts as the President shall direct.

SEC. 304. In every recipient country where local currency is made available for local currency expenses of the United States in connection with assistance furnished by the United States, the local currency administrative and operating expenses incurred in the administration of this Act shall be charged to such local currency funds to the extent available.

SEC. 305. Subsection (d) of section 117 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948 (Public Law 472, Eightieth Congress),¹ as amended, and

16. MUTUAL SECURITY ACT OF 1954, AS AMENDED BY THE MUTUAL SECURITY ACT OF 1955: Public Law 665 (83d Congress, 2d Session), August 26, 1954; Amended by Public Law 138 (84th Congress, 1st Session), July 8, 1955 (Excerpts)²

AN ACT To promote the security and foreign policy of the United States by furnishing assistance to friendly nations, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Mutual Security Act of 1954".

TITLE I—MUTUAL DEFENSE ASSISTANCE

CHAPTER 1. MILITARY ASSISTANCE

SEC. 101. PURPOSE OF CHAPTER.—The Congress of the United States reaffirms the policy of the United States to achieve international peace and security through the United Nations so that armed force shall not be used except in the common defense. The Congress hereby finds that the efforts of the United States and other nations to promote peace and security require additional measures of support based upon the principle of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid. It is the purpose of this chapter to authorize measures in the common defense, including the furnishing of military assistance to friendly nations and international organizations in order to promote the foreign policy, security, and general welfare of the United States and to facilitate the effective participation of such nations in ¹ Act of June 2, 1951; 65 Stat. 63. Section 1302 (a), popularly known as the Kem Amendment, provided that, during the period in which Armed Forces of the U.S. are engaged in hostilities while carrying out any decision of the Security Council of the United Nations, no economic or financial assistance should be furnished under the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended, to any country permitting exportation of items of military value to the U.S.S.R. or its satellites, including Communist China and Communist North Korea, unless such exportation should be certified to be in the security interest of the U.S. by the National Security Council.

² PL 665, 83d Cong. (68 Stat. 832), approved Aug. 26, 1954, as amended by PL 138, 84th Cong. (69 Stat. 283), approved July 8, 1955; Mutual Security Legislation and Related Documents, International Cooperation Administration, Dec. 29, 1955, pp. 1-39. arrangements for individual and collective self-defense. In furnishing such military assistance, it remains the policy of the United States to continue to exert maximum efforts to achieve universal control of weapons of mass destruction and universal regulation and reduction of armaments, including armed forces, under adequate safe-guards to protect complying nations against violation and evasion.

The Congress reaffirms its previous expressions favoring the creation by the free peoples of the Far East and the Pacific of a joint organization, consistent with the Charter of the United Nations, to establish a program of self-help and mutual cooperation designed to develop their economic and social well-being, to safeguard basic rights and liberties and to protect their security and independence.

The Congress hereby reiterates its opposition to the seating in the United Nations of the Communist China regime as the representative of China.¹ In the event of the seating of representatives of the Chinese Communist regime in the Security Council or General Assembly of the United Nations, the President is requested to inform the Congress insofar as is compatible with the requirements of national security, of the implications of this action upon the foreign policy of the United States and our foreign relationships, including that created by membership in the United Nations, together with any recommendations which he may have with respect to the matter.

SEC. 102. GENERAL AUTHORITY.—Military assistance may be furnished under this chapter on a grant or loan basis and upon such other appropriate terms as may be agreed upon, by the procurement from any source and the transfer to eligible nations and international organizations of equipment, materials, and services or by the provision of any service, including the assignment or detail of members of the Armed Forces and other personnel of the Department of Defense solely to assist in an advisory capacity or to perform other duties of a non-combatant nature, including military training or advice.²

SEC. 103. AUTHORIZATIONS.—(a) (1)³ There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President, in addition to appropriations authorized by section 104, not to exceed $1,270,000,000 to carry out the purpose of this chapter; and, in addition, unexpended balances of appropriations for military assistance under each paragraph of the Mutual Security Appropriation Act, 1954 (including the appropriation for mutual special weapons planning), are hereby authorized to be continued available for the purpose of this chapter and to be consolidated with the appropriation authorized by this subsection, all of which is hereby authorized to be continued available through June 30, 1955.

² See also the Act of May 19, 1926, as amended, 44 Stat. 565, 10 U.S.C. § 540, 34 U.S.C. § 541a.

³ Paragraph designation "(1)" was added by sec. 2 (a) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955.

(2)¹ In addition, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President to carry out the purposes of this chapter not to exceed $1,133,000,000, to remain available until expended.

(b) Funds made available pursuant to subsection (a) of this section shall be available for the administrative and operating expenses of carrying out the purpose of this chapter and of section 124² including expenses incident to United States participation in international security organizations.

(c)³ When appropriations made pursuant to subsection (a) of this section are used to furnish military assistance on terms of repayment within ten years or earlier such assistance may be furnished, notwithstanding sections 105, 141, and 142, to nations eligible to purchase military equipment, materials, and services under section 106.

SEC. 104. INFRASTRUCTURE.—(a) The President is authorized to make contributions to infrastructure programs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, in accordance with agreements already made between the member nations, out of funds made available pursuant to this section, or section 103, or chapter IX of the Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1953, of amounts totaling not more than $780,000,000, less amounts already contributed for such purpose. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for such purpose, in installments prior to June 30, 1958, not to exceed $321,000,000, to remain available until expended. Such contributions by the United States shall not exceed its proportionate share, as heretofore agreed upon, of the expenses of such programs.

(b) When the President determines that it is in the interest of the security of the United States to participate in programs for the acquisition or construction of facilities in foreign nations for collective defense other than programs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, he may use for such purpose funds made available under section 103 or local currencies made available under section 402 in amounts totaling not more than $50,000,000.

(c) Notwithstanding section 501 of this Act, no funds other than

² Words "and of section 124" were added by sec. 2 (b) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955.

³ This subsection was substituted, by sec. 2 (c) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955, for repealed sec. 103 (c) which read as follows:

"(c) Funds made available pursuant to subsection (a) of this section may be used for the procurement of equipment or materials outside the United States unless the President determines that such procurement will result in one or more of the following conditions:

(1) Adverse effects upon the economy of the United States, with special reference to any areas of labor surplus, or upon the industrial mobilization base, which outweigh the strategic and logistic advantages to the United States of procurement abroad;

(2) Production of such equipment or materials outside the United States under inadequate safeguards against sabotage or the release to potential enemies of information detrimental to the security of the United States;

(3) Unjustifiable cost in comparison with procurement in the United States, taking into account transportation costs for delivery overseas; and those referred to in subsections (a) and (b) of this section may be expended for the purposes of this section. No funds shall be expended under this section for rental or purchase of land or for payment of taxes.

(4) Delays in delivery incompatible with United States defense objectives."

SEC. 105. CONDITIONS APPLICABLE TO MILITARY ASSISTANCE.—(a) Military assistance may be furnished under this chapter to any nation whose increased ability to defend itself the President shall have determined to be important to the security of the United States and which is otherwise eligible to receive such assistance. Equipment and materials furnished under this chapter shall be made available solely to maintain the internal security and legitimate self-defense of the recipient nation, or to permit it to participate in the defense of its area or in collective security arrangements and measures consistent with the Charter of the United Nations. The President shall be satisfied that such equipment and materials will not be used to undertake any act of aggression against any nation.

(b) In addition to the authority and limitations contained in the preceding subsection, the following provisions shall apply to particular areas:

(1)¹ The Congress welcomes the recent progress in European cooperation and reaffirms its belief in the necessity of further efforts toward political federation, military integration, and economic unification as a means of building strength, establishing security, and preserving peace in the North Atlantic area. In order to provide further encouragement to such efforts, the Congress believes it essential that this Act should be so administered as to support concrete measures to promote greater political federation, military integration, and economic unification in Europe.

(2) Military assistance furnished to any nation in the Near East and Africa² to permit it to participate in the defense of its area shall be furnished only in accordance with plans and arrangements which shall have been found by the President to require the recipient nation to take an important part therein.

(3) In furnishing military assistance in Asia³ and in carrying out the provisions of section 121 of this Act, the President shall

¹ This paragraph was amended by sec. 2(d) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955; it formerly read as follows:

“(1) In order to promote an integrated defense of the North Atlantic area and to support concrete measures for political federation, military integration, and economic unification in Europe, equipment and materials of the value programmed for fiscal years 1954 and 1955 for nations signing the treaty constituting the European Defense Community shall, pending the coming into force of the treaty, be delivered only to such of these nations as have ratified the treaty, and have joined together in or are developing collective defense programs in a manner satisfactory to the United States as determined by the President.”

² Sec. 2 (c) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955 amended this paragraph by striking out the former “Near East, Africa, and South Asia” and inserting, in lieu thereof, “Near East and Africa.”

ve the fullest assistance, as far as possible directly, to the free peoples in that area, including the Associated States of Cambodia, Laos, and Vietnam, in their creation of a joint organization, consistent with the Charter of the United Nations, to establish a program of self-help and mutual cooperation designed to develop their economic and social well-being, to safeguard basic rights and liberties, and to protect their security and independence.

(4) Military assistance may be furnished to the other American republics only in accordance with defense plans which shall have been found by the President to require the recipient nation to participate in missions important to the defense of the Western Hemisphere.

The Secretary of Defense shall insure that the value (as determined pursuant to section 545) of equipment, materials, and services heretofore furnished under military assistance programs authorized by Acts repealed by this Act or hereafter furnished pursuant to section 103 (a) to nations or organizations in each of the four areas in this subsection shall not exceed the total of the funds heretofore made available for military assistance in that area pursuant to Acts repealed by this Act plus the amount herein specified for that

(2) In the Near East (including Greece and Turkey) and Central America,¹ $181,200,000.

(3) In Asia,² $583,600,000.

(4) In the Western Hemisphere, $13,000,000.

Whenever the President determines it to be necessary for the execution of this title, equipment, materials, and services of a value not exceeding 15 per centum of the sum of (1) that portion of the unexpended balances referred to in section 103 (a) which was available on October 1, 1954, to furnish assistance in any of the areas named in subsection (c) of this section, and (2) the amount specified in the preceding paragraph of subsection (c) of this section for additional assistance in such area, may be furnished in any other such area or notwithstanding the limitations set forth in subsection (c) of this section. Funds heretofore obligated or programmed or hereafter made available solely for the purpose of section 104 (pertaining to infrastructure) shall not be included in the total fixed for each such area. Funds heretofore appropriated for military assistance in a particular geographic area but transferred from such use under section 513 of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended, or under section 408 (c) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act, shall be included in the total available for the benefit of which such transfer was made, and not in the total for the area from which the transfer was made.

SEC. 106. SALE OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT, MATERIALS, AND SERVICES.—(a) The President may, in order to carry out the purpose of this chapter, sell or enter into contracts (without requirement for charge to any appropriation or contract authorization) for the procurement for sale of equipment, materials, or services to any nation or international organization: Provided, That prior to the transfer of any such equipment, materials, or services to any nation which has not signed an agreement under section 142 of this Act or joined with the United States in a regional collective defense arrangement, the President shall have received commitments satisfactory to him that such equipment, materials, or services are required for and will be used by such nation solely to maintain its internal security, its legitimate self-defense, or to permit it to participate in the defense of the area of which it is a part, or in collective security arrangements and measures consistent with the Charter of the United Nations, and that it will not undertake any act of aggression against any other state.

(b) Whenever equipment or materials are sold from the stocks of or services are rendered by any United States Government agency to any nation or international organization as provided in subsection (a), such nation or international organization shall first make available the fair value, as determined by the President, of such equipment, materials, or services before delivery or, when the President determines it to be in the best interests of the United States, within sixty days thereafter or, as determined by the President, within a reasonable period not to exceed three years. The fair value for the purpose of this subsection shall not be less than the value as defined in subsection (h) of section 545: Provided, That with respect to excess equipment or materials the fair value may not be determined to be less than (i) the minimum value specified in that subsection plus the scrap value, or (ii) the market value, if ascertainable, whichever is the greater. Before a contract for new production is entered into, or rehabilitation work is undertaken, such nation or international organization shall (A) provide the United States with a dependable undertaking to pay the full amount of such contract or the cost of such rehabilitation which will assure the United States against any loss on the contract or rehabilitation work, and (B) shall make funds available in such amounts and at such times as may be necessary to meet the payments required by the contract or the rehabilitation work in advance of the time such payments are due, in addition to the estimated amount of any damages and costs that may accrue from the cancellation of such contract or rehabilitation work.

(c) Sections 105, 141, and 142 shall not apply with respect to assistance furnished under this section.

SEC. 107. WAIVERS OF LAW.— . . .

SEC. 108. TRANSFER OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT TO JAPAN.—In addition to any program of military assistance for which funds may be appropriated pursuant to this Act, the President is hereby authorized to transfer to the Government of Japan, until June 30, 1956,¹ upon on the same terms and conditions as he may specify, and upon its request, the United States military equipment and supplies programed for Japan to meet its internal security requirements for which Department of Defense appropriations were obligated prior to July 1, 1953. No appropriation shall be requested to replace the military equipment and supplies so transferred, and no funds heretofore or hereafter appropriated for the purpose of this chapter shall be available for reimbursement to any United States Government agency on account of any transfer made pursuant to this section.

CHAPTER 2—SOUTHEAST ASIA AND THE WESTERN PACIFIC, AND DIRECT FORCES SUPPORT

SEC. 121. SOUTHEAST ASIA AND THE WESTERN PACIFIC.—There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1955, to be made available on such terms and conditions, including transfer of funds, as he may specify, not to exceed $700,000,000 for expenses necessary for the support of the forces of nations in the area of Southeast Asia, including the furnishing, as far as possible, of direct assistance to the Associated States of Cambodia, Laos,¹ and Vietnam as well as to the forces of other free nations in the area including those of France located in such Associated States and for other expenditures to accomplish in Southeast Asia and the Western Pacific the policies and purposes declared in this Act. In addition, the expended balances of funds allocated from appropriations made pursuant to sections 304 and 540 of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended, for the purpose of support of the forces of the Associated States of Cambodia, Laos, and Vietnam and the forces of France located in the Associated States, are hereby authorized to be continued available for the purpose of this section through June 30, 1955, and to be consolidated with the appropriation authorized by this section. Assistance under this title² shall be made available subject to the provisions of sections 141 and 142, except that (1) in the case of assistance to the Associated States of Cambodia, Laos, and Vietnam, and (2) in the case of assistance (not to exceed in the aggregate 10 per centum of the amount appropriated pursuant to this section, excluding expended balances of prior appropriations) to other nations, the President may waive specific provisions of section 142 to the extent he may deem necessary in the national interest to carry out the purposes of this Act. The President or such officer as he may designate shall report each instance of such waiver to the Foreign Relations, Appropriations, and Armed Services Committees of the Senate and the Foreign Affairs, Appropriations, and Armed Services Committees of the House of Representatives within thirty days.

It is the sense of the Congress that no part of the funds appropriated under this section shall be used on behalf of governments which are committed by treaty to maintain Communist rule over any defined territory of Asia.

No new funds were requested for this section for fiscal year 1956. The word "section" was stricken out and the word "title" substituted by sec. 1(a) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955.

SEC. 122. PRODUCTION FOR FORCES SUPPORT.—There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1955, to be made available on such terms and conditions, including transfer of funds, as he may specify, not to exceed $35,000,000¹ for manufacture in the United Kingdom of military aircraft required by United Kingdom forces for the defense of the North Atlantic area. In addition, unexpended balances of appropriations made pursuant to section 102 of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended, are hereby authorized to be continued available for their original purposes through June 30, 1955, and the unexpended balance of the appropriation made pursuant to the second clause of that section is authorized to be consolidated with the appropriation authorized by this section.

SEC. 123. COMMON USE ITEMS.—There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1955 not to exceed $60,000,000¹ for the provision of any common-use equipment, materials, commodities, or services which are to be used by military forces of nations receiving assistance under chapter 1 of this title. Programs authorized by this section shall be administered in accordance with the provisions of chapter 1 or chapter 3 of this title.

SEC. 124.² DIRECT FORCES SUPPORT.—There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1956 not to exceed $317,200,000 to provide assistance in the form of direct forces support to be delivered or rendered directly to the military forces of nations eligible for military assistance under chapter 1 of this title. The President may, notwithstanding the provisions of section 501, consolidate all or any part of appropriations made pursuant to this section with appropriations made pursuant to section 103. Programs authorized by this section may be administered in accordance with the provisions of chapter 1 or chapter 3 of this title.

CHAPTER 3—DEFENSE SUPPORT

SEC. 131. GENERAL AUTHORITY.—(a) The President is hereby authorized to furnish, to nations and organizations eligible to receive military assistance under chapter 1 of this title, or to nations which have joined with the United States in a regional collective defense arrangement, commodities, services, and financial and other assistance designed to sustain and increase military effort. In furnishing such assistance, the President may provide for the procurement and transfer from any source of any commodity or service (including processing, storing, transporting, marine insurance, and repairing) or any technical information and assistance.

(b) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1955 to carry out the provisions of this section, not to exceed—

(1) $46,000,000 for Europe (excluding Greece and Turkey);

¹ No new funds were requested for this section for fiscal year 1956.

² This section was added by sec. 3 (b) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955.

(2) $73,000,000 for the Near East (including Greece and Turkey), Africa, and South Asia; and

(3) $80,098,195 for the Far East and the Pacific.

In addition, unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made pursuant to section 541 of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended, are hereby authorized to be continued available for the purpose of this subsection through June 30, 1955, and to be consolidated with the appropriation authorized for the same area by this subsection: Provided, That portions of such unexpended balances which have been allocated to assistance for Greece and Turkey shall be consolidated with the appropriation authorized by paragraph (2) of this subsection.

(c)¹ There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1956 to carry out the provisions of this section, not to exceed—

(1) $92,000,000 for Europe (excluding Greece and Turkey);

(2) $102,500,000 for the Near East (including Greece and Turkey) and Africa; and

(3) $827,800,000 for Asia.

Funds made available for assistance to Korea from appropriations authorized by this section may be used in accordance with the applicable provisions of section 132 of this Act.

(d) In providing assistance in the procurement of commodities in the United States, United States dollars shall be made available for marine insurance on such commodities where such insurance is placed on a competitive basis in accordance with normal trade practice prevailing prior to the outbreak of World War II: Provided, That in the event a participating country, by statute, decree, rule, or regulation, discriminates against any marine insurance company authorized to do business in any State of the United States, then commodities purchased with funds provided hereunder and destined for such country shall be insured in the United States against marine risk with a company or companies authorized to do a marine insurance business in any State of the United States.

SEC. 132. KOREAN PROGRAM.—(a) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1955 not to exceed $205,000,000 to be expended, upon terms and conditions specified by the President, for defense support, relief and rehabilitation, and other necessary assistance (including payment of ocean freight charges on shipments for relief and rehabilitation, without regard to section 409 of this Act) in those parts of Korea which the President shall have determined to be not under Communist control. In addition, unexpended balances of funds heretofore allocated for the purpose of relief and rehabilitation in Korea pursuant to the paragraph entitled "Relief and Rehabilitation in Korea," chapter VII, Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1954, and unobligated balances of the appropriation for "Civilian Relief in Korea," title III, Department of Defense Appropriation Act, 1954, are hereby authorized to be continued available for the purposes of this subsection through June 30, 1955, and to be consolidated with the appropriation authorized by this subsection.

(b) (1) Notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, the President is authorized, at any time prior to twenty-four months from the date of enactment of this Act, to transfer to the Republic of Korea, by sale or charter and on such terms and conditions as he may specify, not more than eight C1-M-AV1 vessels. Any agency of the United States Government owning or operating such vessels is authorized to make such vessels available for the purpose of this subsection: Provided, That if after investigation it is determined by the President that there are privately owned C1-M-AV1 vessels offered and available for sale by American citizens as defined in section 2 of the Shipping Act, 1916, as amended, at prices equal to or less than those provided for in subsection (b) (2) below, such vessels shall be acquired by an owning or operating agency designated by the President for the purpose of this subsection. Funds made available pursuant to subsection (a) of this section shall be available for the purpose of this subsection.

(2) Such transfers shall be made at prices determined under section 3 of the Merchant Ship Sales Act of 1946 (50 U. S. C., App. 1736): Provided, That such vessels shall be placed in class in accordance with minimum requirements of the American Bureau of Shipping by the owning or operating agency, and the expense of placing in class shall be reimbursed to such agency.

(c) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year 1955 not to exceed $3,452,615 for making contributions to the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency or expenditure through such other agency for relief and rehabilitation in Korea as the President may direct. In addition, the unexpended balance of the appropriation made pursuant to the last sentence of section 303 (a) of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended, is hereby authorized to be continued available for the purpose of this subsection through June 30, 1955, and to be consolidated with the appropriation authorized by this subsection.¹ Sections 141 and 142 of this Act shall not apply with respect to assistance furnished under this subsection.

CHAPTER 4—GENERAL PROVISIONS RELATING TO MUTUAL DEFENSE ASSISTANCE

SEC. 141. CONDITIONS OF ELIGIBILITY FOR ASSISTANCE.—No assistance shall be furnished under this title to any nation or organization unless the President shall have found that furnishing such assistance will strengthen the security of the United States and promote world peace. No such assistance shall be furnished to a nation unless it shall have agreed to the provisions required by section 142, and such additional provisions as the President deems necessary to effectuate the policies and provisions of this title and to safeguard the interests of the United States.

¹ No funds for fiscal year 1956 were authorized or appropriated for the purposes of this subsection.

SEC. 142. AGREEMENTS.—(a) ¹ No assistance shall be furnished to any nation under this title unless such nation shall have agreed to—

(1) join in promoting international understanding and good will, and maintaining world peace;

(2) take such action as may be mutually agreed upon to eliminate causes of international tension;

(3) fulfill the military obligations, if any, which it has assumed under multilateral or bilateral agreements or treaties to which the United States is a party;

(4) make, consistent with its political and economic stability, the full contribution permitted by its manpower, resources, facilities, and general economic condition to the development and maintenance of its own defensive strength and the defensive strength of the free world;

(5) take all reasonable measures which may be needed to develop its defense capacities;

(6) take appropriate steps to insure the effective utilization of the assistance furnished under this title in furtherance of the policies and purposes of this title;

(7) impose appropriate restrictions against transfer of title to or possession of any equipment and materials, information, or services furnished under chapter 1 of this title, without the consent of the President;

(8) maintain the security of any article, service, or information furnished under chapter 1 of this title;

(9) furnish equipment and materials, services, or other assistance consistent with the Charter of the United Nations, to the United States or to and among other nations to further the policies and purpose of chapter 1 of this title;

(10) permit continuous observation and review by United States representatives of programs of assistance authorized under this title, including the utilization of any such assistance and ² provide the United States with full and complete information with respect to these matters, as the President may require. ³

(b) In cases where any commodity is to be furnished on a grant basis under chapter 2 or chapter 3 of title I or under title II of this Act under arrangements which will result in the accrual of proceeds to the recipient nation from the import or sale thereof, such assistance shall not be furnished unless the recipient nation shall have agreed to establish a Special Account, and ⁴

² The word "and" was substituted for "or" by sec. 5 of the Mutual Security Act of 1955.

³ The word "and" which appeared at the end of this subparagraph was deleted by sec. 5 of the Mutual Security Act of 1955, and a period was substituted.

⁴ Sec. 5 of the Mutual Security Act of 1955 changed the designation of this provision from "(11)" to "(b)" and revised the language of the introductory paragraph which previously read as follows:

"(11) in cases where any commodity is furnished on a grant basis under any provision of this Act other than chapter 1 of title I under arrangements which will result in the accrual of proceeds to the recipient nation from the import or sale thereof, establish a Special Account, and—".

(i) deposit in the Special Account, under such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon, currency of the recipient nation in amounts equal to such proceeds;

(ii) make available to the United States such portion of the Special Account as may be determined by the President to be necessary for the requirements of the United States: Provided, That such portion shall not be less than 10 per centum in the case of any country to which such minimum requirement has been applicable under any Act repealed by this Act; and

(iii) utilize the remainder of the Special Account for programs agreed to by the United States to carry out the purposes for which new funds authorized by this Act would themselves be available.

Any unencumbered balances of funds which remain in the Account upon termination of assistance to such nation under this Act shall be disposed of for such purposes as may, subject to approval by the Act or joint resolution of the Congress, be agreed to between such country and the Government of the United States.

TITLE II—DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE

SEC. 201. AUTHORIZATION.—(a) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1955, not to exceed—

(1) $115,000,000 for assistance designed to promote the economic development of the Near East and Africa, and for other types of assistance designed to help maintain economic and political stability in the area;

(2) $75,000,000 for assistance designed to promote the economic development of Asia¹ and to assist in maintaining economic and political stability in the area; and

(3) $9,000,000 for assistance designed to promote economic development in the other American Republics and non-self-governing territories of the Western Hemisphere and to assist in maintaining economic and political stability in the area.²

Such assistance may be furnished on such terms and conditions as the President may specify and shall emphasize loans rather than grants wherever possible.³

(b) In addition, unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made pursuant to sections 206 and 302 (b) of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended, and unexpended balances of funds allocated to the emergency economic aid program for Bolivia are hereby authorized to be continued available for the purposes of this section through June 30, 1955, and to be consolidated with the appropriations

¹ The words "South Asia" were stricken out and "Asia" inserted, in lieu thereof, by sec. 6 (a) (1) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955.

² The words "and to assist in maintaining economic and political stability in the area" were added by sec. 6 (a) (1) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955.

³ This sentence was revised by sec. 6 (a) (1) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955. It formerly read as follows: "Such assistance may be furnished on such terms and conditions as the President may specify, except that 30 per centum of the funds appropriated pursuant to this subsection shall be available only for furnishing assistance on terms of repayment in accordance with section 505."

authorized by paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of subsection (a) of this section, respectively.

(c) ¹ There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1956 not to exceed $73,000,000, $71,000,000, and $38,000,000 to furnish assistance under paragraphs (1), (2), and (3), respectively of subsection (a) of this section.

SEC. 202. ADMINISTRATION.— . . .

TITLE III—TECHNICAL COOPERATION

SEC. 301. DECLARATION OF PURPOSE.—It is the policy of the United States and the purpose of this title to aid the efforts of the peoples of economically underdeveloped areas to develop their resources and improve their working and living conditions by encouraging the exchange of technical knowledge and skills and the flow of investment capital to countries which provide conditions under which such technical assistance and capital can effectively and constructively contribute to raising standards of living, creating new sources of wealth, increasing productivity and expanding purchasing power.

SEC. 302. GENERAL AUTHORITY AND DEFINITION.—The President is authorized to furnish assistance in accordance with the provisions of this title through bilateral technical cooperation programs. As used in this title, the term "technical cooperation programs" means programs for the international interchange of technical knowledge and skills designed to contribute primarily to the balanced and integrated development of the economic resources and productive capacities of economically underdeveloped areas. Such activities shall be limited to economic, engineering, medical, educational, labor, agricultural, forestry, fishery, mineral, and fiscal surveys, demonstration, training, and similar projects that serve the purpose of promoting the development of economic resources, productive capacities, and trade of economically underdeveloped areas, and training in public administration. The term "technical cooperation programs" does not include such activities authorized by the United States Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948 (62 Stat. 6) as are not primarily related to economic development, nor activities undertaken now or hereafter pursuant to the International Aviation Facilities Act (62 Stat. 450), nor activities undertaken now or hereafter in the administration of areas occupied by the United States Armed Forces.

SEC. 303. PREREQUISITES TO ASSISTANCE.—Assistance shall be made available under section 302 of this Act only where the President determines that the nation being assisted—

- (a) pays a fair share of the cost of the program;
- (b) provides all necessary information concerning such program and gives the program full publicity;
- (c) seeks to the maximum extent possible full coordination and integration of technical cooperation programs being carried on in that nation;

¹ This subsection was added by sec. 6 (a) (2) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955.

(d) endeavors to make effective use of the results of the program; and

(e) cooperates with other nations participating in the program in the mutual exchange of technical knowledge and skills.

SEC. 304. AUTHORIZATION.— . . .

SEC. 305. LIMITATION ON USE OF FUNDS.—Funds made available under section 304 may be expended to furnish assistance in the form of equipment or commodities only where necessary for instruction or demonstration purposes.

SEC. 306. MULTILATERAL TECHNICAL COOPERATION.—As one means of accomplishing the purposes of this title, the United States is authorized to participate in multilateral technical cooperation programs carried on by the United Nations, the Organization of American States, their related organizations, and other international organizations, wherever practicable. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to carry out the purpose of this section, in addition to the amounts authorized by section 304, not to exceed—

(a) $17,958,000 for making contributions to the United Nations Expanded Program of Technical Assistance; in addition, $24,000,000 for the fiscal year 1956 for contributions to the United Nations Expanded Program of Technical Assistance;¹

(b) $1,500,000 for making contributions to the technical cooperation program of the Organization of American States; in addition, $1,500,000 for the fiscal year 1956 for contributions to the technical cooperation programs of the Organization of American States.²

SEC. 307. ADVANCES AND GRANTS; CONTRACTS.—The President may make advances and grants-in-aid of technical cooperation programs to any person, corporation, or other body of persons or to any foreign government agency. The President may make and perform contracts and agreements in respect to technical cooperation programs on behalf of the United States Government with any person, corporation, or other body of persons however designated, whether within or without the United States, or with any foreign government or foreign government agency. A contract or agreement which entails commitments for the expenditure of funds appropriated pursuant to this title may, subject to any future action of the Congress, run for not to exceed three years.

SEC. 308. INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT ADVISORY BOARD.—There shall be an advisory board, referred to in this section as the "Board," which shall advise and consult with the President, or such other officer as he may designate to administer this title, with respect to general or basic policy matters arising in connection with the operation of programs authorized by this title, title II, and section 413 (b). The Board shall consist of not more than thirteen members appointed by the President, one of whom, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be appointed by him as chairman. The members of the Board shall be broadly representative of voluntary agencies and other groups interested in the programs, including business, labor, agriculture, public health, and education. All members of the Board shall be citizens of the United States; none except the chairman shall be an officer or an employee of the United States (including any United States Government agency) who as such regularly receives compensation for current services. . . .

TITLE IV—OTHER PROGRAMS

SEC. 401. SPECIAL FUND.—(a) Of the funds made available under this Act, not to exceed $50,000,000, in addition to the funds authorized to be appropriated under subsection (b) hereof,¹ may be used in any fiscal year, without regard to the requirements of this Act or any other Act for which funds are authorized by this Act, in furtherance of any of the purposes of such Acts, when the President determines that such use is important to the security of the United States. Not to exceed $100,000,000 of the funds available under this section may be expended for any selected persons who are residing in or escapees from the Soviet Union, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, Albania, Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia or the Communist-dominated or Communist-occupied areas of Germany and Austria, or any Communist-dominated or Communist-occupied areas of Asia and any other countries absorbed by the Soviet Union, either to form such persons into elements of the military forces supporting the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or for other purposes, when the President determines that such assistance will contribute to the defense of the North Atlantic area or to the security of the United States.² Certification by the President that he has expended amounts under this Act³ not in excess of $50,000,000, and that it is inadvisable to specify the nature of such expenditures, shall be deemed a sufficient voucher for such amounts. Not more than $20,000,000 of the funds available under this section may be allocated to any one nation in any fiscal year.

(b)⁴ There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1956 $100,000,000 for use in accordance with subsection (a) of this section.

SEC. 402. EARMARKING OF FUNDS.—Of the funds authorized to be made available pursuant to this Act for the fiscal year 1956, not less than $300,000,000¹ shall be used to finance the export and sale for foreign currencies of surplus agricultural commodities or products thereof produced in the United States, in addition to surplus agricultural commodities or products transferred pursuant to the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954,² and in accordance with the standards as to pricing and the use of private trade channels expressed in section 101 of said Act. Foreign currency proceeds accruing from such sales shall be used for the purposes of this Act and with particular emphasis on the purposes of section 104 of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 which are in harmony with the purposes of this Act. Notwithstanding section 1415 of the Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1953,³ or any other provision of law, the President may use or enter into agreements with friendly nations or organizations of nations to use for such purposes the foreign currencies which accrue to the United States under this section.

SEC. 403. SPECIAL ASSISTANCE IN JOINT CONTROL AREAS.—(a)⁴ The President is hereby authorized to furnish commodities, services, and financial and other assistance to nations and areas for which the United States has responsibility at the time of the enactment of this Act as a result of participation in joint control arrangements where found by the President to be in the interest of the security of the United States. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1955 not to exceed $25,000,000 to carry out this section.

(b)⁵ There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1956 not to exceed $21,000,000 to carry out this section.

SEC. 404. RESPONSIBILITIES IN GERMANY.—Upon approval by the Secretary of State, a part of the German currency now or hereafter deposited under the bilateral agreement of December 15, 1949, between the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany (or any supplementary or succeeding agreement) shall be deposited in the GARIOA (Government and Relief in Occupied Areas) Special Account under the terms of article V of that agreement, and currency which has been or may be deposited in said account, and any portion of funds made available for assistance to the Federal Republic of Germany pursuant to section 403 of this Act, may be used for expenses necessary to meet the responsibilities or objectives of the United States in Germany, including responsibilities arising under the supreme authority assumed by the United States on June 5, 1945, and under contractual arrangements with the Federal Republic of Germany.

¹ The words "for the fiscal year 1956, not less than $300,000,000" were substituted for "not less than $350,000,000" by sec. 8 (b) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955.

⁵ This subsection was added by sec. 8 (c) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955.

Expenditures may be made under authority of this section in amounts and under conditions determined by the Secretary of State after consultation with the official primarily responsible for administration of programs under chapter 3 of title I, and without regard to any provision of law which the President determines must be disregarded in order to meet such responsibilities or objectives.

SEC. 405. MIGRANTS, REFUGEES, AND ESCAPEES.¹—(a) The President is hereby authorized to continue membership for the United States on the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration in accordance with its constitution approved in Venice, Italy, on October 19, 1953. For the purpose of assisting in the movement of migrants, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $11,189,190 for contributions during the calendar year 1955 to the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration, and thereafter such amounts as may be necessary from time to time² for the payment by the United States of its contributions to the Committee and all necessary salaries and expenses incident to United States participation in the Committee. In addition, the unexpended balance of the appropriation made pursuant to section 534 of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended, is hereby authorized to be continued available for the purpose of this subsection through June 30, 1955, and to be consolidated with the appropriation authorized in this subsection.

(b) Of the funds made available under this Act not more than $800,000 may be used by the President to facilitate the migration to the other American Republics of persons resident in that portion of the Ryukyu Island Archipelago under United States control.

(c)³ There is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year 1956 not to exceed $1,400,000 for contributions to the United Nations Refugee Fund.

(d)⁴ There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1956 not to exceed $6,000,000 for continuation of activities, including care, training, and resettlement, which have been undertaken for selected escapees under section 401 of this Act.

SEC. 406. CHILDREN'S WELFARE.—(a) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $13,500,000 for contributions during the fiscal year 1955 to the United Nations Children's Fund.⁵

¹ The heading, which formerly read "Movement of Migrants and Refugees," was changed by sec. 8 (d) (1) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955.

² Mutual Security Appropriation Act, 1956—"Provided, That no funds appropriated in this Act shall be used to assist directly in the migration to any nation in the Western Hemisphere of any person not having a security clearance based on reasonable standards to insure against Communist infiltration in the Western Hemisphere."

³ This subsection was revised by sec. 8 (d) (2) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955. It formerly read as follows:

"There is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year 1955 not to exceed $500,000 for contributions to the U.N. Refugee Emergency Fund."

⁴ This subsection was added by sec. 8 (d) (3) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955.

⁵ Subsection designation "(a)" and subsection (b) in its entirety were added by sec. 8 (e) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955.

(b) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year 1956 not to exceed $14,500,000 for contributions to the United Nations Children's Fund.

SEC. 407. PALESTINE REFUGEES IN THE NEAR EAST.—(a) ¹ There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1955, not to exceed $30,000,000, to be used to make contributions to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East. In addition, the unexpended balance of the appropriation made for the Palestine refugee program in the Mutual Security Appropriation Act, 1954,² is hereby authorized to be continued available for the purpose of this section through June 30, 1955. Whenever the President shall determine that it would more effectively contribute to the relief, rehabilitation, and resettlement of Palestine refugees in the Near East, he may expend any part of the funds made available pursuant to this section through any other agency he may designate.

(b) ³ There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1956 not to exceed $65,000,000 to be used to make contributions to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East.

SEC. 408. NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION.—(a) In order to provide for United States participation in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year 1955 not to exceed $3,200,000 for payment by the United States of its share of the expenses of the Organization, and thereafter such amounts as may be necessary from time to time for the payment by the United States of its share of the expenses of the Organization and all necessary salaries and expenses of the United States permanent representative to the Organization, of such persons as may be appointed to represent the United States in the subsidiary bodies of the Organization or in any multilateral organization which participates in achieving the aims of the North Atlantic Treaty, and of their appropriate staffs, and the expenses of participation in meetings of such organizations, including salaries, expenses, and allowances of personnel and dependents as authorized by the Foreign Service Act of 1946, as amended (22 U. S. C. 801), and allowances and expenses as provided in section 6 of the Act of July 30, 1946 (22 U. S. C. 287r).

(b) The United States permanent representative to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and shall hold office at the pleasure of the President. Such representative shall have the rank and status of ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary and shall be a chief of mission, class 1, within the meaning of the Foreign Service Act of 1946, as amended (22 U. S. C. 801).

¹ Subsection designation "(a)" was added by sec. 8 (f) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955.

³ This subsection was added by sec. 8 (f) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955.

(c) Persons detailed to the international staff of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in accordance with section 529 of this Act who are appointed as Foreign Service Reserve officers may serve for periods of more than four years notwithstanding the limitation in section 522 of the Foreign Service Act of 1946, as amended (22 U. S. C. 922).

SEC. 409. OCEAN FREIGHT CHARGES.—(a) In order to further the efficient use of United States voluntary contributions for relief and rehabilitation in nations and areas eligible for assistance under this Act, the President may pay ocean freight charges from United States ports to designated ports of entry of such nations and areas on shipments by United States voluntary nonprofit relief agencies registered with and approved by the Advisory Committee on Voluntary Foreign Aid and shipments by the American Red Cross.

(b) Where practicable the President shall make arrangements with the receiving nation for free entry of such shipments and for the making available by that nation of local currencies for the purpose of defraying the transportation cost of such shipments from the port of entry of the receiving nation to the designated shipping point of the consignee.

(c) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1955 not to exceed $4,400,000 to carry out the purposes of this section; and, in addition, unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made pursuant to section 535 of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended, are authorized to be continued available for the purposes of this section through June 30, 1955, and to be consolidated with the appropriation authorized in this section. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1956 not to exceed $2,000,000 to carry out the purposes of this section.¹

(d) ² There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1956 not to exceed $13,000,000 to pay ocean freight charges on shipments of surplus agricultural commodities, including commodities made available pursuant to any Act for the disposal abroad of United States agricultural surpluses. In addition, any funds made available under this Act may be used, in amounts determined by the President, for the purposes of this subsection.

SEC. 410. CONTROL ACT EXPENSES.—There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1955 not to exceed $1,300,000, and for the fiscal year 1956 not to exceed $1,175,000, for carrying out the objectives of the Mutual Defense Assistance Control Act of 1951 (22 U. S. C. 1611).³ In addition, in accordance with section 303 of that Act, funds made available for carrying out

¹ This last sentence was added by sec. 8 (g) (1) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955.

² This subsection was revised by sec. 8 (g) (2) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955. It formerly read: "In addition, any funds made available under this Act may be used, in amounts determined by the President, to pay ocean freight charges on shipments of surplus agricultural commodities, including commodities made available pursuant to any Act for the disposal abroad of United States agricultural surpluses."

chapter 1 of title I of this Act shall be available for carrying out the purpose of this section in such amounts as the President may direct.¹

SEC. 411.² ADMINISTRATIVE AND OTHER EXPENSE. (a) Whenever possible, the expenses of administration of this Act shall be paid for in the currency of the nation where the expense is incurred.

SEC. 412. CHINESE AND KOREAN STUDENTS.—Funds heretofore allocated to the Secretary of State pursuant to the last proviso of section 202 of the China Area Aid Act of 1950 (22 U. S. C. 1547) shall continue to be available until expended, under such regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe, using private agencies to the maximum extent practicable, for necessary expenses of tuition, subsistence, transportation, and emergency medical care for selected citizens of China and of Korea for studying or teaching in accredited colleges, universities, or other educational institutions in the United States approved by the Secretary of State for the purpose, or for research and related academic and technical activities in the United States, and such selected citizens of China who have been admitted for the purpose of study in the United States shall be granted permission to accept employment upon application filed with the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization pursuant to regulations promulgated by the Attorney General.

SEC. 413. ENCOURAGEMENT OF FREE ENTERPRISE AND PRIVATE PARTICIPATION.—(a) The Congress recognizes the vital role of free enterprise in achieving rising levels of production and standards of living essential to the economic progress and defensive strength of the free world. Accordingly, it is declared to be the policy of the United States to encourage the efforts of other free nations to increase the flow of international trade, to foster private initiative and competition, to discourage monopolistic practices, to improve the technical efficiency of their industry, agriculture and commerce, and to strengthen free labor unions; and to encourage the contribution of United States enterprise toward economic strength of other free nations, through private trade and investment abroad, private participation in the programs carried out under this Act (including the use of private trade channels to the maximum extent practicable in carrying out such programs), and exchange of ideas and technical information on the matters covered by this section.

(b) In order to encourage and facilitate participation by private enterprise to the maximum extent practicable in achieving any of the purposes of this Act, the President—

(1) shall make arrangements to find and draw the attention of private enterprise to opportunities for investment and development in other free nations;

(2) shall accelerate a program of negotiating treaties for commerce

¹ The words "and for the fiscal year 1956 not to exceed $1,175,000" which appear in the first sentence of this section following the figure "$1,800,000" were added by sec. 8 (h) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955.

² The heading formerly read "Administrative Expenses" and was changed by sec. 8 (i) (1) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955.

trade, including tax treaties, which shall include provisions to encourage and facilitate the flow of private investment to nations participating in programs under this Act;

(C) shall, consistent with the security and best interests of the United States, seek compliance by other countries or a dependent area of any country with all treaties for commerce and trade and shall take all reasonable measures under this Act or other authority to secure compliance therewith and to assist United States citizens in obtaining just compensation for losses sustained by them or payments exacted from them as a result of measures taken or imposed by any country or dependent area thereof in violation of any treaty; and

(D) may make, until June 30, 1957, under rules and regulations prescribed by him, guaranties to any person of investments in connection with projects, including expansion, modernization, or development of existing enterprises, in any nation with which the United States has agreed to institute the guaranty program: Provided, that—

(A) such projects shall be approved by the President as furthering any of the purposes of this Act, and by the nation concerned;

(B) the guaranty to any person shall be limited to assuring any or all of the following:

(i) the transfer into United States dollars of other currencies, or credits in such currencies, received by such person as earnings or profits from the approved project, as repayment or return of the investment therein, in whole or in part, or as compensation for the sale or disposition of all or any part thereof;

(ii) the compensation in United States dollars for loss of all or any part of the investment in the approved project which shall be found by the President to have been lost to such person by reason of expropriation or confiscation by action of the government of a foreign nation;

(C) when any payment is made to any person pursuant to a guaranty as hereinbefore described, the currency, credits, assets, or investment on account of which such payment is made shall become the property of the United States Government, and the United States Government shall be subrogated to any right, title, claim or cause of action existing in connection therewith;

(D) the guaranty to any person shall not exceed the amount of dollars invested in the project by such person with the approval of the President plus actual earnings or profits on said project to the extent provided by such guaranty, and shall be limited to a term not exceeding twenty years from the date of issuance;

(E) a fee shall be charged in an amount not exceeding 1 per centum per annum of the amount of each guaranty under clause (i) of subparagraph (B), and not exceeding 4 per centum of the amount of each guaranty under clause (ii) of such subparagraph, and all fees collected hereunder shall be available for expenditure in discharge of liabilities under guaranties made under this section until such time as all such liabilities have been discharged or have expired, or until all such fees have been expended in accordance with the provisions of this section;

(F) the President is authorized to issue guaranties up to a total of $200,000,000: Provided, That any funds allocated to a guaranty and remaining after all liability of the United States assumed in connection therewith has been released, discharged, or otherwise terminated, shall be available for allocation to other guaranties, the foregoing limitation notwithstanding. Any payments made to discharge liabilities under guaranties issued under this subsection shall be paid out of fees collected under subparagraph (E) as long as such fees are available, and thereafter shall be paid out of funds realized from the sale of notes which have been issued under authority of paragraph 111 (c) (2) of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended, when necessary to discharge liabilities under any such guaranty;

(G) the guaranty program authorized by this paragraph shall be used to the maximum practicable extent and shall be administered under broad criteria so as to facilitate and increase the participation of private enterprise in achieving any of the purposes of this Act;

(H) as used in this paragraph—

(i) the term "person" means a citizen of the United States or any corporation, partnership, or other association created under the law of the United States or of any State or Territory and substantially beneficially owned by citizens of the United States, and

(ii) the term "investment" includes any contribution of capital goods, materials, equipment, services, patents, processes, or techniques by any person in the form of (1) a loan or loans to an approved project, (2) the purchase of a share of ownership in any such project, (3) participation in royalties, earnings, or profits of any such project, and (4) the furnishing of capital goods items and related services pursuant to a contract providing for payment in whole or in part after the end of the fiscal year in which the guaranty of such investment is made.

SEC. 414. MUNITIONS CONTROL.—(a) The President is authorized to control, in furtherance of world peace and the security and foreign policy of the United States, the export and import of arms, ammunition, and implements of war, including technical data relating thereto, other than by a United States Government agency. The President is authorized to designate those articles which shall be considered as arms, ammunition, and implements of war, including technical data relating thereto, for the purposes of this section.¹

(b) As prescribed in regulations issued under this section, every person who engages in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing any arms, ammunition, or implements of war, including technical data relating thereto, designated by the President under subsection (a) shall register with the United States Government agency charged with the administration of this section and in addition, shall pay a registration fee which shall be prescribed by such regulations.

(c) Any person who willfully violates any provision of this section or any rule or regulation issued under this section, or who willfully, in a registration or license application, makes any untrue statement of a material fact or omits to state a material fact required to be stated therein or necessary to make the statements therein not misleading, shall upon conviction be fined not more than $25,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

SEC. 415. ASSISTANCE TO INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION.—Whenever it will assist in achieving purposes declared in this Act, the President is authorized to use funds available under sections 131 and 403 in order to furnish assistance, including by transfer of funds, directly to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, for a strategic stockpile of foodstuffs and other supplies, or for other purposes.

SEC. 416. FACILITATION AND ENCOURAGEMENT OF TRAVEL.—The President, through such officer or commission as he may designate, shall facilitate and encourage, without cost to the United States except for administration expenses, the promotion and development of travel by citizens of the United States to and within countries receiving assistance under this Act and travel by citizens of such countries to the United States.

SEC. 417. IRISH COUNTERPART.—Pursuant to section 115 (b) (6) of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended, the disposition within Ireland of the unencumbered balance, in the amount of approximately 6,000,000 Irish pounds, of the special account of Irish funds established under article IV of the Economic Cooperation Agreement between the United States of America and Ireland, dated June 28, 1948, for the purposes of—

(1) scholarship exchange between the United States and Ireland;

(2) other programs and projects (including the establishment of an Agricultural Institute) to improve and develop the agricultural production and marketing potential of Ireland and to increase the production and efficiency of Irish industry; and

(3) development programs and projects in aid of the foregoing objectives, is hereby approved, as provided in the agreement between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Ireland, dated June 17, 1954.

SEC. 418. PRESIDENT'S FUND FOR ASIAN ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT.—(a) The Congress of the United States reaffirms the policy of the United States to contribute to international peace and security through assisting the peoples of free Asia in their efforts to attain economic and social well-being, to safeguard basic rights and liberties, and to protect their security and independence. The Congress hereby recognizes that fundamental to these goals is an expanding economic growth of the free Asia area based upon self-help and mutual cooperation and full utilization of already existing resources and knowledge. The Congress expresses the willingness of the people of the United States to support the foregoing objectives to the extent to which the countries in the area continue to make effective use of their own resources and external resources otherwise available to them.

(b) In order to carry out the purposes of this section, there is hereby authorized to be established a fund, to be known as the "President's Fund for Asian Economic Development" (hereinafter referred to as "the Fund"), and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the Fund an amount of $200,000,000, such amount to remain available until June 30, 1958.

(c) The President is authorized to utilize the appropriations made available for the Fund to accomplish in the free Asian area the policies and purposes declared in this Act and to disburse them on such terms and conditions, including transfer of funds, as he may specify to any person, corporation, or other body of persons however designated, or to any friendly foreign government, agency, or organization or group of friendly governments or agencies as may be appropriate: Provided, however, That such assistance shall emphasize loans rather than grants wherever possible, and not less than 50 per centum of the funds appropriated pursuant to this section shall be available only for furnishing assistance on terms of repayment in accordance with the provisions of section 505, and not more than 25 per centum of said funds may be allocated for assistance to any one nation.

(d) In utilizing the Fund the President shall give preference to projects or programs that will clearly contribute to promoting greater economic strength in the area as a whole or among a group or groups of countries of the area.

SEC. 419. WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION.—Section 3 (a) of Public Law 643, Eightieth Congress, approved June 14, 1948, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows: ¹

"(a) such sums as may be necessary for the payment by the United States of its share of the expenses of the Organization as apportioned by the Health Assembly in accordance with article 56 of the constitution of the Organization, except that payments by the United States for any fiscal year of the Organization after 1958 shall not exceed 33½ per centum of the total assessments of active members of the Organization for such fiscal year; and'."

TITLE V—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

CHAPTER 1. GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 501. TRANSFERABILITY OF FUNDS.—Whenever the President determines it to be necessary for the purposes of this Act, not to exceed 10 per centum of the funds made available pursuant to any provision of this Act may be transferred to and consolidated with the funds made available pursuant to any other provisions of this Act, and may be used for any of the purposes for which such funds may be used, except that the total in the provision for the benefit of which the transfer is made shall not be increased by more than 20 per centum of the amount made available for such provision pursuant to this Act. Funds transferred under this section to furnish military assistance under chapter 1 of title I may be expended without regard to the area limits imposed by section 105 (c). Of any funds transferred under this section for the purpose of furnishing assistance under section 201, 30 per centum shall be available only for furnishing assistance on terms of repayment in accordance with section 505. . . .

SEC. 502. USE OF FOREIGN CURRENCY.—(a) Notwithstanding section 1415 of the Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1953, or any other provision of law, proceeds of sales made under section 550 of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended, shall remain available and shall be used for any purposes of this Act, giving particular regard to the following purposes—

(1) for providing military assistance to nations or mutual defense organizations eligible to receive assistance under this Act;

(2) for purchase of goods or services in friendly nations;

(3) for loans, under applicable provisions of this Act, to increase production of goods or services, including strategic materials, needed in any nation with which an agreement was negotiated, or in other friendly nations, with the authority to use currencies received in repayment for the purposes stated in this section or for deposit to the general account of the Treasury of the United States;

(4) for developing new markets on a mutually beneficial basis;

(5) for grants-in-aid to increase production for domestic needs in friendly countries; and

(6) for purchasing materials for United States stockpiles.

SEC. 503. TERMINATION OF ASSISTANCE.—(a) If the President determines that the furnishing of assistance to any nation under any provision of this Act—

(1) is no longer consistent with the national interest or security or the foreign policy of the United States; or

(2) would no longer contribute effectively to the purposes for which such assistance is furnished; or

(3) is no longer consistent with the obligations and responsibilities of the United States under the Charter of the United Nations, he shall terminate all or part of any assistance furnished pursuant to this Act. If the President determines that any nation which is receiving assistance under chapter 1 of title I of this Act is not making its full contribution to its own defense or to the defense of the area of which it is a part, he shall terminate all or part of such assistance. Assistance to any nation under any provision of this Act may, unless sooner terminated by the President, be terminated by concurrent resolution. Funds made available under this Act shall remain available for twelve months from the date of termination under this subsection for the necessary expenses of liquidating assistance programs.

(b)¹ Unless sooner abolished under section 525, the Foreign Operations Administration shall cease to exist at the close of June 30, 1955.

SEC. 504. SMALL BUSINESS.—(a) Insofar as practicable and to the maximum extent consistent with the accomplishment of the purposes of this Act, the President shall assist American small business to participate equitably in the furnishing of commodities and services financed with funds authorized under titles II, III, and IV, and chapters 2 and 3 of title I, of this Act—

(1) by causing to be made available to suppliers in the United States and particularly to small independent enterprises, information, as far in advance as possible, with respect to purchases proposed to be financed with such funds,

(2) by causing to be made available to prospective purchasers in the nations receiving assistance under this Act information as to commodities and services produced by small independent enterprises in the United States, and

(3) by providing for additional services to give small business better opportunities to participate in the furnishing of commodities and services financed with such funds.

(b) There shall be an Office of Small Business, headed by a Special Assistant for Small Business, in such United States Government agency as the President may direct,² to assist in carrying out the provisions of subsection (a) of this section.

(c) The Secretary of Defense shall assure that there is made available to suppliers in the United States, and particularly to small independent enterprises, information with respect to purchases made by the Department of Defense pursuant to chapter 1 of title I, such information to be furnished as far in advance as possible.

SEC. 505.³ LOAN ASSISTANCE AND SALES.—(a) Assistance under this Act may be furnished on a grant basis or on such terms, including

² SEC. 101 (d) of Ex. Or. 10575 [infra, doc. 18], as amended, established the Office of Small Business in the Foreign Operations Administration. It was subsequently transferred to the State Department by sec. 102 (d) of Ex. Or. 10610 [infra, doc. 19] and was made a part of, or attached to the International Cooperation Administration by sec. 1 of Department of State Delegation of Authority 85, as amended.

SEC. 508. LIMITATION ON FUNDS FOR PROPAGANDA.—None of the funds herein authorized to be appropriated nor any counterpart funds shall be used to pay for personal services or printing, or for other expenses of the dissemination within the United States of general propaganda in support of the mutual security program, or to pay the travel or other expenses outside the United States of any citizen or group of citizens of the United States for the purpose of publicizing such program within the United States.

SEC. 509. SHIPPING ON UNITED STATES VESSELS.—Such steps as may be necessary shall be taken to assure, as far as practicable, that at least 50 per centum of the gross tonnage of commodities, materials and equipment procured out of funds made available under sections 103, 123, 131, 132 (a), 201, 304, and 403 of this Act and transported to or from the United States on ocean vessels, computed separately for dry bulk carriers, dry cargo liner and tanker services and computed separately for section 103, and for sections 123, 131, 132 (a), 201, 304, and 403 (taken together) is so transported on United States flag commercial vessels to the extent such vessels are available at market rates for United States flag commercial vessels provided such rates are fair and reasonable; and, in the administration of this provision, steps shall be taken, insofar as practicable and consistent with the purposes of this Act, to secure a fair and reasonable participation by United States flag commercial vessels in cargoes by geographic area.² The ocean transportation between foreign countries of commodities, materials, and equipment procured out of local currency funds made available or derived from funds made available under this Act shall not be governed by the provisions of section 901 (b) of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, or any other law relating to the ocean transportation of commodities, materials, and equipment on United States flag vessels.³

SEC. 510. PURCHASE OF COMMODITIES.—No funds made available

¹ The words in the first sentence commencing with "and shall emphasize loans," and the second sentence, were added by sec. 9 (c) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955.

² See also 1954 amendment to the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 (PL 664, 83d Cong.; 68 Stat. 832).

under title II or chapter 3 of title I of this Act shall be used for the purchase in bulk of any commodities at prices higher than the market price prevailing in the United States at the time of purchase adjusted for differences in the cost of transportation to destination, quality, and terms of payment. A bulk purchase within the meaning of this section does not include the purchase of raw cotton in bales. Funds made available under title II or chapter 3 of title I of this Act may be used for the procurement of commodities outside the United States unless the President determines that such procurement will result in adverse effects upon the economy of the United States, with special reference to any areas of labor surplus, or upon the industrial mobilization base, which outweigh the economic advantages to the United States of less costly procurement abroad. In providing for the procurement of any surplus agricultural commodity for transfer by grant under this Act to any recipient nation in accordance with the requirements of such nation, the President shall, insofar as practicable and where in furtherance of the purposes of this Act, authorize the procurement of such surplus agricultural commodity only within the United States except to the extent that any such surplus agricultural commodity is not available in the United States in sufficient quantities to supply the requirements of the nations receiving assistance under this Act.

SEC. 511. RETENTION AND RETURN OF EQUIPMENT.—(a) No equipment or materials may be transferred under title I out of military stocks if the Secretary of Defense, after consultation with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, determines that such transfer would be detrimental to the national security of the United States, or that such equipment or materials are needed by the reserve components of the Armed Forces to meet their training requirements.

(b) Any equipment, materials, or commodities procured to carry out this Act shall be retained by, or, upon reimbursement, transferred to and for the use of, such United States Government agency as the President may determine in lieu of being disposed of to a foreign nation or international organization whenever in the judgment of the President the best interests of the United States will be served thereby, or whenever such retention is called for by concurrent resolution. Any commodities so retained may be disposed of without regard to provisions of law relating to the disposal of Government-owned property, when necessary to prevent spoilage or wastage of such commodities or to conserve the usefulness thereof. Funds realized from any such disposal or transfer shall revert to the respective appropriation or appropriations out of which funds were expended for the procurement of such equipment, materials, or commodities or to appropriations currently available for such procurement.

(c) The President shall make appropriate arrangements with each nation receiving equipment or materials under chapter 1 of title I (other than equipment or materials sold under the provisions of section 106) for the return to the United States (1) for salvage or scrap, or (2) for such other disposition as the President shall deem to be in the interest of mutual security, of any such equipment or materials which no longer required for the purposes for which originally made available.

SEC. 512. PENAL PROVISION.— . . .

SEC. 513. NOTICE TO LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEES.—When any transaction is made under section 105 (d) or section 501, or any other action taken under this Act which will result in furnishing assistance of any kind, for a purpose, or to an area, substantially different from that included in the presentation to the Congress during its consideration of this Act, or which will result in expenditures greater by 50 per centum or more than the proposed expenditures included in such presentation for the program concerned, the President or such officer as he may designate shall promptly notify the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives and, when military assistance is involved, the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives, stating the justification for such change. Notice shall also be given to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate and the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives in any determination under the first sentence of section 401 (except with respect to unvouchered funds), and copies of any certification of loyalty under section 531 shall be filed with such committees.

SEC. 514. INTERNATIONAL EDUCATIONAL EXCHANGE ACTIVITIES.—Foreign currencies or credits owed to or owned by the United States, here arising from this Act or otherwise, shall, upon a request from the Secretary of State certifying that such funds are required for the purpose of international educational exchange activities under programs authorized by section 32 (b) (2) of the Surplus Property Act of 1944, as amended,¹ be reserved by the Secretary of the Treasury for sale to the Department of State for such activities on the basis of the dollar value at the time of the reservation.

CHAPTER 2. ORGANIZATION AND ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 521. DELEGATION OF AUTHORITY BY THE PRESIDENT.—(a) Except as provided in subsection (b), the President may exercise any power or authority conferred on him by this Act through such agency or officer of the United States as he shall direct, and the head of such agency or such officer may from time to time promulgate such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper to carry out functions under this Act and may delegate authority to perform any of such functions to his subordinates acting under his direction.²

(b) After June 30, 1955, the President shall exercise the powers conferred upon him under title III of this Act through the Secretary of State.³

SEC. 522. ALLOCATION AND REIMBURSEMENT AMONG AGENCIES.—

SEC. 523. COORDINATION WITH FOREIGN POLICY.—(a) Nothing contained in this Act shall be construed to infringe upon the powers or functions of the Secretary of State.

(b) The President shall prescribe appropriate procedures to assure coordination among representatives of the United States Government in each country, under the leadership of the Chief of the United States Diplomatic Mission.¹

SEC. 524. THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE.—(a) In the case of aid under chapter 1 of title I of this Act, the Secretary of Defense shall have primary responsibility for—

- (1) the determination of military end-item requirements;
- (2) the procurement of military equipment in a manner which permits its integration with service programs;
- (3) the supervision of end-item use by the recipient countries;²
- (4) the supervision of the training of foreign military personnel;
- (5) the movement and delivery of military end-items; and
- (6) within the Department of Defense, the performance of any other functions with respect to the furnishing of military assistance.

(b) The establishment of priorities in the procurement, delivery, and allocation of military equipment shall be determined by the Secretary of Defense. The determination of the value of the program for any country under chapter 1 of title I shall be made by the President.³

SEC. 525. FOREIGN OPERATIONS ADMINISTRATION.—Except as modified pursuant to this section or section 521, the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration (referred to in this chapter as the "Director") shall continue to perform the functions vested in him on the effective date of this Act,⁴ except insofar as such functions relate to continuous supervision and general direction of programs of military assistance. The President may transfer to any agency or officer of the United States, and may modify or abolish, any function, office, or entity of the Foreign Operations Administration (including any function, office or entity thereof transferred to any other agency)⁵ or any officer or employee thereof, and may transfer such personnel, property, records, and funds as may be necessary incident thereto: Provided, That such authority conferred by this sentence shall be exercised in accordance with applicable laws and regulations relating to the Civil Service and Veterans' Preference.¹

SEC. 526. MISSIONS AND STAFFS ABROAD.—The President may maintain special missions or staffs abroad in such nations and for such periods of time as may be necessary to carry out this Act. Each such special mission or staff shall be under the direction of a chief. The chief and his deputy shall be appointed by the President and may, notwithstanding any other law, be removed by the President at his discretion. . . .

SEC. 527. EMPLOYMENT OF PERSONNEL.—(a) Any United States Government agency performing functions under this Act is authorized to employ such personnel as the President deems necessary to carry out the provisions and purposes of this Act. . . .

SEC. 528. DETAIL OF PERSONNEL TO FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS.²—(a) Whenever the President determines it to be consistent with and in furtherance of the purposes of this Act, the head of any United States Government agency is authorized to detail or assign any officer or employee of his agency to any office or position to which no compensation is attached with any foreign government or foreign government agency: Provided, That such acceptance of office shall in no case involve the taking of an oath of allegiance to another government. . . .

³ The words "and 418" were added by sec. 10 (e) of the Mutual Security Act of 1955.

SEC. 535. COOPERATION WITH INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS.—(a) The President is authorized to request the cooperation of or the use of the services and facilities of the United Nations, its organs and specialized agencies, or other international organizations, in carrying out the purposes of this Act, and may make payments by advancements or reimbursements, for such purposes, out of funds made available for the purposes of this Act, as may be necessary therefor, to the extent that special compensation is usually required for such services and facilities: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to authorize the delegation to any international or foreign organization or agency of authority to decide the method of furnishing assistance under this Act to any country or the amount thereof.

SEC. 536. JOINT COMMISSION ON RURAL RECONSTRUCTION IN CHINA.—The President is authorized to continue to participate in the Joint Commission on Rural Reconstruction in China and to appoint citizens of the United States to the Commission.

CHAPTER 3. REPEAL AND MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 541. EFFECTIVE DATE.—This Act shall take effect on the date of its enactment.

SEC. 542. STATUTES REPEALED.—(a) There are hereby repealed—

SEC. 543. SAVING PROVISIONS.— . . .

SEC. 544. AMENDMENTS TO OTHER LAWS.—(a) Title X of the United States Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948, as amended (22 U. S. C. 1431), is amended by adding the following new section:

“INFORMATIONAL MEDIA GUARANTIES

“SEC. 1011. The Director of the United States Information Agency may make guaranties, in accordance with the provisions of subsection (b) of section 413 of the Mutual Security Act of 1954, of investments in enterprises producing or distributing informational media consistent with the national interests of the United States against funds heretofore made available by notes issued to the Secretary of the Treasury pursuant to section 111

(c) (2) of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended, for purposes of guaranties of investments: Provided, however, That the amount of such guaranties in any fiscal year shall be determined by the President but shall not exceed $10,000,000.”

(b) Section 1 of Public Law 283, Eighty-first Congress is repealed. The Institute of Inter-American Affairs, created pursuant to Public Law 369, Eightieth Congress (22 U. S. C. 281), shall have succession until June 30, 1960, and may make contracts for periods not to exceed five years: Provided, That any contract extending beyond June 30, 1960, shall be made subject to termination by the said Institute upon notice: And provided further, That the said Institute shall, on and after July 1, 1954, be subject to the applicable provisions of the Budget and Accounting Act, 1921, as amended (31 U. S. C. 1), in lieu of the provisions of the Government Corporation Control Act, as amended (31 U. S. C. 841).

SEC. 545. DEFINITIONS.—For the purposes of this Act—

(a) The term “commodity” includes any commodity, material, article, supply, or goods.

(b) The term “surplus agricultural commodity” means any agricultural commodity or product thereof, class, kind, type, or other specification thereof, produced in the United States either publicly or privately owned, which is in excess of domestic requirements, adequate carryover, and anticipated exports for dollars, as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture.

(c) The terms "equipment" and "materials" shall mean any arms, ammunition, or implements of war, or any other type of material, article, raw material, facility, tool, machine, supply or item that would further the purpose of chapter 1 of title I, or any component or part thereof, used or required for use in connection therewith, or required in or for the manufacture, production, processing, storage, transportation, repair, or rehabilitation of any equipment or materials, but shall not include merchant vessels.¹

(d) The term "mobilization reserve," as used with respect to any equipment or materials, means the quantity of such equipment or materials determined by the Secretary of Defense under regulations prescribed by the President to be required to support mobilization of the Armed Forces of the United States in the event of war or national emergency until such time as adequate additional quantities of such equipment or materials can be procured.

(e) The term "excess" as used with respect to any equipment or materials, means the quantity of such equipment or materials owned by the United States which is in excess of the mobilization reserve of such equipment or materials.

(f) The term "services" shall include any service, repair, training of personnel, or technical or other assistance or information necessary to effectuate the purposes of this Act.

(g) The term "Armed Forces of the United States" shall include any component of the Army of the United States, of the United States Navy, of the United States Marine Corps, of the Air Force of the United States, of the United States Coast Guard, and the Reserve components thereof.

(h) The term "value" means—

(1) with respect to any excess equipment or materials furnished under chapter 1 of title I the gross cost of repairing, rehabilitating, or modifying such equipment or materials prior to being so furnished;

(2) with respect to any nonexcess equipment or materials furnished under chapter 1 of title I which are taken from the mobilization reserve (other than equipment or materials referred to in paragraph (3) of this subsection), the actual or the projected (computed as accurately as practicable) cost of procuring for the mobilization reserve an equal quantity of such equipment or materials or an equivalent quantity of equipment or materials of the same general type but deemed to be more desirable for inclusion in the mobilization reserve than the equipment or materials furnished;

(3) with respect to any nonexcess equipment or materials

¹ For limitations on the transfer of naval vessels, see the Act of March 10, 1951, 65 Stat. 4, 34 U. S. C. 493-a-1; for text of act of Aug. 5, 1953, authorizing transfer of certain vessels, see 67 Stat. 363 as amended by 69 Stat. 373.

furnished under chapter 1 of title I which are taken from the mobilization reserve but with respect to which the Secretary of Defense has certified that it is not necessary fully to replace such equipment or materials in the mobilization reserve, the gross cost to the United States of such equipment and materials or its replacement cost, whichever the Secretary of Defense may specify; and

(4) with respect to any equipment or materials furnished under chapter 1 of title I which are procured for the purpose of being so furnished, the gross cost to the United States of such equipment and materials.

In determining the gross cost incurred by any agency in repairing, rehabilitating, or modifying any excess equipment furnished under chapter 1 of title I, all parts, accessories, or other materials used in the course of repair, rehabilitation, or modification shall be priced in accordance with the current standard pricing policies of such agency. For the purpose of this subsection, the gross cost of any equipment or materials taken from the mobilization reserve means either the actual gross cost to the United States of that particular equipment or materials or the estimated gross cost to the United States of that particular equipment or materials obtained by multiplying the number of units of such particular equipment or materials by the average gross cost of each unit of that equipment and materials owned by the furnishing agency.

(i) The term "United States Government agency" means any department, agency, board, wholly or partly owned corporation, or instrumentality, commission, or establishment of the United States Government.

SEC. 546. CONSTRUCTION.—(a) If any provisions of this Act or the application of any provision to any circumstances or persons shall be held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the Act and applicability of such provision to other circumstances or persons shall not be affected thereby.

(b) Nothing in this Act shall alter, amend, revoke, repeal, or otherwise affect the provisions of the Atomic Energy Act of 1946, as amended (42 U. S. C. 1801).

(c) Nothing in this Act is intended nor shall it be construed as an expressed or implied commitment to provide any specific assistance, whether of funds, commodities, or services, to any nation or nations, or to any international organization.

SEC. 547. REDUCTION OF AUTHORIZATIONS.—Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this Act, such provisions shall not be construed to authorize the appropriation for the fiscal year 1955, for the purposes of titles I, II, and IV of this Act, of amounts (exclusive of unexpended balances of prior appropriations authorized to be continued available under such provisions) aggregating in excess of $2,918,040,000.

SEC. 548. UNEXPENDED BALANCES.—Unexpended balances of funds heretofore made available under authority of this Act are hereby authorized to be continued available for the general purposes for which appropriated, and may be consolidated with appropriations made available beginning in fiscal year 1956 for the same general purposes under the authority of this Act: Provided, however, That unexpended balances in excess of $200,000,000 not obligated by June 30, 1955, in accordance with the provisions of section 1311 of the Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1955 (Public Law 663, Eighty-third Congress), or reserved in accordance with the provisions of section 110 of the Mutual Security Appropriation Act, 1955 (Public Law 778, Eighty-third Congress),¹ are not authorized to be continued available after such date.

SEC. 549. (a) STATEMENT OF CONGRESSIONAL POLICY.—It is the sense of the Congress that inasmuch as—

(1) the United States, through mutual security programs, has made substantial contributions to the economic recovery and rehabilitation of the nations of western Europe;

(2) due in part to those programs, it has been possible for such nations to achieve complete economic recovery and to regain their military strength; and

(3) certain other friendly nations of the world remain in need of assistance in order that they may defend themselves against aggression and contribute to the security of the free world, those nations that have been assisted in their recovery should, in the future, share with the United States to a greater extent the financial burden of providing aid to those countries which are still in need of assistance of the type provided under this Act.

(b) It is the sense of the Congress that assistance under this Act shall be administered so as to assist other peoples in their efforts to achieve self-government or independence under circumstances which will enable them to assume an equal station among the free nations of the world and to fulfill their responsibilities for self-government or independence.

17. DEVELOPMENT OF THE TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAM: Release of the Foreign Operations Administration, 1954 (Excerpt)²

It is important to the people of the United States that the less-developed areas share in the technical advances that will help them become strong partners in the free world. Our strength and well-being are dependent in good measure on theirs.

By helping these areas raise the standards of living of their peoples, we can move forward in an expanding world economy.

² Technical Cooperation Programs Around the World, Foreign Operations Administration, 1954, pp. 2-10. For further documentation on the subject of technical assistance, see Development of Technical Assistance Programs: Background Information and Documents, 83d Cong., 2d sess., Committee on Foreign Relations Print, Nov. 22, 1954; Technical Assistance and Related Problems, S. Rept. No. 1956, 84th Cong., 2d sess., May 7, 1956; Partners in Progress: A Report to the President by the International Development Advisory Board (Rockefeller Report), Mar. 7, 1951 (GPO, 1951).

As of September 1, 1954, the United States was working directly with 59 countries, upon their request, to help build the technical knowledge and skills of their peoples. Of these, 39 were independent nations, 19 were dependent overseas territories in Africa and the Caribbean area, and one was a United Nations Trusteeship. The joint technical programs are designed to help other peoples develop ways to help themselves, to strengthen their economies, to make them more effective trading partners, and to contribute to the collective security of the free world.

These 59 countries, representing more than 900 million people, have asked the United States to share with them the technical knowledge and skills that have played so great a part in our own development. All of these countries want to better themselves and the lives of their peoples. They want their farmers to learn how to grow more food; they want to overcome the ravages of disease; they want greater opportunity for their children.

Many of these nations have gained their independence since World War II, and, strongly nationalistic, are anxious to maintain their independence and freedom. Their political leaders have promised to improve the lot of the people, and want to make that promise good. Failure to do so can breed unrest and strife, and adversely affect the interests of the U.S.

By helping to strengthen the economies, security, and independence of other free peoples, the United States enhances its own future. It helps build the mutual security of the free world.

In the sharing of scientific findings and modern techniques, there is a two-way flow of benefits. The United States gains as well as the other countries. Mutual ties contribute both to peace and to progress.

As the strength of these countries grows, they become better customers for the goods of the United States. To note one instance, Peru in the last decade has made marked advances in its agriculture. One outgrowth has been more buying of farm machinery from the U.S. In 1942 there were fewer than 500 tractors in the country; now there are more than 4,500. In 1943 Peruvian purchases of U.S. farm machinery were $453,000; in 1953 they reached $5.6 million.

World trade is vital to the free nations. The United States gets strategic and other necessary materials from Latin America, the Far East, and other areas. These areas in turn benefit from the sales of their goods to us.

President Eisenhower last June advised the Congress that "our country's participation in technical cooperation programs must be vigorously advanced." He described the programs as "our most effective counter-measure to Soviet propaganda and the best method by which to create the political and social stability essential to lasting peace."

Again in August the President advised them that "technical cooperation has proved itself as a practical and productive concept and as the surest and most economical way, over the long term, to speed the advance toward an expanding world economy and a higher general standard of living."

GROWTH OF FOA PROGRAMS

Long before governmental programs in technical cooperation got under way, U.S. private organizations and institutions were sharing the benefits of technical knowledge with peoples abroad. Church groups, foundations, commercial firms, voluntary agencies, and others still carry on this work.

But their projects, unlike those of FOA,¹ operate in limited areas. The scope of FOA action is much broader; FOA works with host governments in programs for the extension of nationwide governmental services—in agriculture, health, education and other fields—to all the people. FOA coordinates its programs with those of the voluntary agencies and encourages these agencies to increase their activity.

Today's governmental programs of technical cooperation first took root in the Americas. They sprang from the fertile soil of inter-American agreements. A 1939 law authorized U.S. government agencies to carry out cooperative tasks based on these agreements, and an Interdepartmental Committee on Cooperation with American Republics was set up in May of that year.

World War II speeded up the process. As emergency needs arose, the Office of the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs was established. It undertook programs largely to overcome the health hazards that stood in the way of obtaining essential materials, such as rubber and metals, and to meet the food needs of the people. After the war the Institute of Inter-American Affairs was reincorporated—to continue the cooperative programs. In Europe the U.S. took part in the European Recovery Program.

In 1949 President Truman asked for a broadened program to extend "the benefits of our scientific advances and industrial progress" to all the underdeveloped areas. The next year the Congress approved the Act for International Development and a Technical Cooperation Administration was set up in the Department of State. Technical assistance in some countries of the Far East, however, was handled by the Economic Cooperation Administration—later the Mutual Security Agency—which was also handling technical exchange programs with the industrial countries of Europe.

In 1953 President Eisenhower, for greater efficiency and economy in foreign operations, telescoped all three agencies—the IIAA, TCA and MSA—into the Foreign Operations Administration. FOA now conducts the cooperative programs with other nations.

Since its establishment by President Eisenhower in 1953, FOA has placed increasing emphasis on expanding the work of technical cooperation. Congress has provided increased funds, more technicians are in the field than ever before, and more American universities are helping in the exchange of technical knowledge.

Where necessary, technical cooperation programs are supplemented by assistance to key projects essential to the economic development of a country. This type of help, known as development assistance, is generally provided when the country lacks the material or financial capacity to undertake the needed projects itself or when the rate of economic progress without supplemental aid would not serve the best interests of the country and the United States. Development assistance and technical cooperation in these instances are combined into an integrated program directed toward the common objective of economic strength among the free nations.

THREE MAJOR AREAS

Today¹ the Foreign Operations Administration carries on U.S. technical cooperation in three major areas of the world—Latin America; the Near East, Africa and South Asia; and the Far East.

FOA is cooperating on technical problems with 19 independent countries of Latin America and with 9 dependent overseas territories in that area. The 19 nations include Mexico and three countries of the Caribbean area: Cuba, Haiti, and the Dominican Republic; they include the 6 countries of Central America: Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Panama; and they include 9 countries in South America: Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Ecuador, Paraguay, Peru, Uruguay, and Venezuela. The 9 dependent territories are Barbados; Trinidad and Tobago; Windward and Leeward Islands; British Guiana; Surinam; British Honduras; Jamaica; Netherlands Antilles; and French West Indies.

FOA is working in cooperative projects also in 13 countries of the Near East, Africa, and South Asia, and with 11 African dependent territories. The countries in Africa and the Near East are Egypt, Ethiopia, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Jordan, Lebanon, Liberia, and Libya; in South Asia are Afghanistan, India, Nepal, and Pakistan. The dependent territories include Tunisia, French Equatorial Africa, Madagascar, Angola, Mozambique, Belgian Congo, Gold Coast, the Central African Federation, Sierra Leone, Morocco, and Italian Somalia (U. N. Trusteeship).

FOA technical cooperation projects are under way also in seven countries of the Far East: China (Formosa), Cambodia, Laos, Vietnam, Indonesia, Philippines, and Thailand.

Once a country asks the United States for technical cooperation, a broad agreement is drawn up between the two governments. The requesting country agrees, among other things, (a) to bear a "fair share" of the costs, (b) to integrate the programs and to make good use of their results, and (c) to cooperate with other countries in technical programs.

This broad agreement is generally followed by detailed agreements on specific programs, each a part of the country's integrated plan for economic development. For example, after Iran and the United States in January 1952 agreed to undertake a technical program, a series of special agreements were spelled out. Three programs were agreed to in April 1952—one in agriculture, one in health, and one in education. Agreements were signed in May in the fields of industry, transportation, and community housing; they were followed in June by programs for the development of natural resources and communications. Eight months later—in February 1953—a program in public administration was initiated in Iran.

Each of these agreements launched a series of technical projects. Under the agriculture program, for instance, members of the U.S. mission and representatives of the Iranian Ministry of Agriculture worked out a series of 17 projects. American technicians cooperated with ministry officials and local technicians in putting these projects into operation.

Efforts were turned first to developing basic research with emphasis on irrigation, seeds, and principal crops of Iran. Training was arranged for farm leaders from all parts of the country. A farm extension service was set up. Steps were taken to introduce better grains and to import livestock for the improvement of native breeds. Wide use of insecticides and pesticides was initiated. Tests of drought resistant grasses were begun.

In carrying out technical cooperation programs FOA draws on the specialized knowledge, skills, and experience of American universities, industry, and voluntary agencies as well as Federal and State agencies. It sends specialists abroad who help train local technicians, and it brings individuals from cooperating countries to the United States for advanced study or observation of techniques.

In the host countries U.S. technicians work side by side with ministry officials and local technicians. In Latin America, Servicios, that is, joint agencies made up of representatives of the host country and FOA, have been created within the individual ministries to carry out the joint programs and administer the joint funds. In some other countries a joint fund may be set up or joint planning may be done by committees of host government officials and U.S. mission officers. Projects are carried out with a view to increasing participation and responsibility on the part of the host country so that ultimately it can take over the work entirely.

In addition to benefitting the people immediately concerned, these programs have four major objectives:

1. To show what can be done by local people using available resources and better techniques.
2. To train local technicians who will then be able to pass their knowledge along to others—to set up a chain reaction for progress.
3. To contribute to the economic development of the whole country.
4. To help in the establishment of nationwide government agencies that will have the resources—people, know-how, organization, funds, and acceptance—to carry on their service activities without outside assistance.

COSTS ARE SHARED

The cost of technical cooperation to the United States taxpayer is relatively small. Based on allotments for the fiscal year, ended June 30, 1954, the cost per person is less than a penny and a half a week.

For the first year of operation under the Act for International Development, that is, for the 12 months ending June 30, 1951, allotments for technical cooperation were $39 million. For fiscal years 1952 and 1953 allotments were $127 and $145 million respectively; allotments for 1954 were $105 million; for the 12 months ending June 30, 1955, Congress provided $116.5 million.¹

The contributions of the host countries to their technical cooperation programs average more than twice ours; in some cases their contributions exceed ours by many times—27 times in the health program in Brazil, for instance. As the programs gain momentum in any country, popular support grows and the government provides more funds, more facilities, and more personnel to this phase of the nation's economic development.

THE REVISED ADMINISTERING AUTHORITY UNDER THE MUTUAL SECURITY ACT OF 1954: Executive Order No. 10575, November 6, 1954²

By virtue of the authority vested in me by the Mutual Security Act of 1954 (68 Stat. 832), by section 301 of title 3 of the United States Code, and as President of the United States and Commander in Chief of the armed forces of the United States, it is hereby ordered as follows:

PART I. ASSIGNMENT OF FUNCTIONS AND FUNDS

Section 101. Foreign Operations Administration. (a) Exclusive of the functions otherwise delegated, or excluded from delegation, by this order, and subject to the provisions of this order, there are hereby delegated to the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration the functions conferred upon the President by the Mutual Security Act of 1954³ (hereinafter referred to as the Act) and by the Mutual Defense Assistance Control Act of 1951⁴ (65 Stat. 644; 22 U. S. C. 11-1613c).

(b) Subject to sections 103 and 107 (b) of this order, the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration shall administer sections 2, 505, and 201 of the Act. In determining upon the furnishing of Funds for technical cooperation in 1954 and 1955 are not strictly comparable to those for earlier years. Included in the earlier allotments are funds which were either identified as "special economic aid" (fiscal 1954) and "development assistance" (fiscal 1955). For example, U.S. funds for the technical cooperation programs in Egypt are recorded as follows: $12.6 million for 1953; $3.2 million for 1954. However, included in the 1953 program was $10 million for roadbuilding; this would now be identified as "development assistance" and not as "technical cooperation". [Footnote in the original.]

assistance on terms of repayment pursuant to sections 201 (a) and 505 of the Act, and upon the amounts and terms of such assistance, the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration shall consult with the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems in respect of policies relating to such assistance and terms. Whenever assistance on terms of repayment, under the said section 505, involves funds available under chapter 1 of Title I of the Act, the said Director shall consult with the Secretary of Defense with respect to the amounts and terms of such assistance. The Director of the Foreign Operations Administration shall also consult the said Council with respect to policies concerning the utilization of funds in the Special Account provided for in section 142 (11) of the Act and concerning such other matters as are within the cognizance of the Council pursuant to section 4 of the Bretton Woods Agreements Act.¹

(c) Pursuant to section 527 (c) (2) of the Act, it is directed that the authority made available to the Director of the United States Information Agency with respect to his functions by section 2 of Executive Order No. 10477 of August 1, 1953 (18 F. R. 4540), and by Executive Order No. 10522 of March 26, 1954 (19 F. R. 1689), subject to the provisions of law applicable in connection with such authority, may be utilized by the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration with respect to his functions.

(d) It is hereby directed that the Office of Small Business provided for in section 504 (b) of the Act shall be in the Foreign Operations Administration.

Section 102. Department of Defense. (a) Subject to the provisions of this order, there are hereby delegated to the Secretary of Defense:

(1) The functions conferred upon the President by chapter 1 of Title I of the Act, exclusive of (i) those so conferred by section 105 (b) (3) of the Act, (ii) so much of those so conferred by section 106 (b) of the Act as consists of determining that a nation or international organization may make available the fair value of equipment, materials, or services, sold thereto or rendered therefor, at a time or at times other than in advance of delivery of the equipment, materials, or services, and (iii) the functions reserved to the President by section 107 of this order.

(2) The functions conferred upon the President by sections 142 (7) and 511 (c) of the Act.

(3) So much of the functions conferred upon the President by sections 142 (10), 511 (b), 527 (a), 528, and 529 (a) of the Act as relates to other functions under the Act administered by the Department of Defense.

(b) The Secretary of Defense is hereby designated to make, with respect to equipment or materials procured for military assistance, the determinations provided for in section 107 of the Mutual Security Appropriation Act, 1955 (68 Stat. 1224).

(c) The Secretary of Defense (1) shall exercise the responsibility and authority vested in him by the Act and the responsibility and authority delegated to him by this order subject to coordination by the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration, and (2) shall keep the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration fully and currently informed of all matters, including prospective action, relating to the utilization of funds under the Act, the establishment of priorities under section 524 (b) of the Act, and the furnishing of military items under chapter 1 of Title I of the Act.

Section 103. Department of State. (a) There are hereby delegated to the Secretary of State:

(1) The functions conferred upon the President by the laws referred to in section 101 (a) of this order with respect to negotiating and entering into international agreements.

(2) The functions conferred upon the President by sections 105 (b) (3), 405 (a), 413 (b) (2) and (3), and 529 (b) and (c) of the Act.

(3) The functions conferred upon the President by section 504 (a) (2) of the Act so far as they may relate to countries in which the Foreign Operations Administration does not have missions or employees.

(4) So much of the functions conferred upon the President by section 535 (a) of the Act as consists of requesting the cooperation of the United Nations, its organs, and specialized agencies or other international organizations in carrying out the purposes of the Act.

(b) The functions conferred upon the President by section 414 of the Act are hereby delegated to the Secretary of State. In connection with the carrying out of the said functions the Secretary of State shall consult with appropriate agencies of the Government. The designation by the Secretary of State of articles which shall be considered as arms, ammunition, and implements of war, including technical data relating thereto, under the said section 414 shall require the concurrence of the Secretary of Defense.

(c) The Secretary of State shall be responsible (1) for making the United States contributions under the Act to, and formulating and presenting with the assistance of the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration the policy of the United States with respect to the assistance programs of, the international organizations referred to in sections 132 (c), 306, 405 (a) and (c), 406, and 407 of the Act, and (2) for making the United States contribution under section 408 of the Act to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization for the United States' share of the expenses of the Organization.

(d) All functions under the Act and the other statutes referred to in sections 101 (a), 102 (b), and 105 (a) of this order, however vested, delegated, or assigned, shall be subject to the responsibilities of the Secretary of State with respect to the foreign policy of the United States.

(e) The maintenance of special missions or staffs abroad, the fixing of the ranks of the chiefs thereof after the chiefs of the United States diplomatic missions, and the authorization of the same compensation and allowances as the chief of mission, Class 3 or Class 4, within the meaning of the Foreign Service Act of 1946 (22 U. S. C. 801 et seq.), all under section 526 of the Act, shall require the approval of the Secretary of State.

Section 104. Department of Commerce. (a) There is hereby delegated to the Secretary of Commerce so much of the functions conferred upon the President by section 413 (b) (1) of the Act as consists of drawing the attention of private enterprise to opportunities for investment and development in other free nations.

(b) The Secretary of Commerce is hereby designated as the officer through whom shall be carried out the functions provided for in section 416 of the Act.

Section 105. United States Information Agency. (a) The functions conferred upon the President by section 1011 of the United States Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948¹ (62 Stat. 6), as amended, are hereby delegated to the Director of the United States Information Agency and shall be carried out in consultation with the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration.

(b) The United States Information Agency shall perform the functions provided for by law with respect to publicizing abroad the activities carried out under the Act.

Section 106. Allocation of funds. (a) Funds appropriated or otherwise made available to the President shall be deemed to be allocated without any further action of the President as follows:

(1) Funds for carrying out chapter 1 of Title I of the Act are allocated to the Secretary of Defense, but, for the purposes of the second sentence of section 110 of the Mutual Security Appropriation Act, 1955 (68 Stat. 1224), such funds shall be available only when and in such amounts as they have been apportioned, for use, by the Bureau of the Budget.

(2) All funds for carrying out the Act except those for carrying out chapter 1 of Title I of the Act are allocated to the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration.

(b) The said funds may be allocated by the Secretary of Defense and the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration, respectively, to any agency, department, establishment, or wholly-owned corporation of the Government for obligation or expenditure thereby consistent with applicable law, subject, however, to the provisions of section 107 (a) (2) hereof. The utilization of funds without regard to the existing laws governing the obligation and expenditure of Government funds as authorized by section 411 (b) of the Act shall be limited as far as practicable and shall in any event be confined to instances in which such utilization is deemed (1) to further the more economical, efficient, or expeditious carrying out of functions under the Act, and (2) to obviate or mitigate hardship occurring with respect to personnel administering functions under the Act in connection with the administration of these functions or with respect to the families of personnel by reason of the duties of the respective heads.

(c) The Director of the Foreign Operations Administration shall allocate funds to the Department of State for the contributions referred to in section 103 (c) of this order.

Section 107. Reservation of functions to the President. (a) There are hereby excluded from the functions delegated by the foregoing provisions of this order:

(1) The functions conferred upon the President by the Act with respect to the appointment of officers required to be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the transmittal of periodic or special reports to the Congress, and the termination or withdrawal of assistance.

(2) The functions conferred upon the President with respect to findings, determinations, certification, agreements, directives, or transfers of funds, as the case may be, by sections 104 (b), 105, 132 (a), 141, 401, 403, 404, 410, 501, 503, 521, and 522 (b) of the Act, and by sections 103 (b), 104, 203, and 301 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Control Act of 1951.

(3) The functions conferred upon the President by sections 101, 107 (a) (2), 415, 525, 533, and 545 (d) of the Act and, subject to Part II hereof, the functions so conferred by section 523 (b) of the Act.

(4) The functions conferred upon the President by section 121 of the Act, including all of the functions so conferred with respect to waiving specific provisions of section 142 of the Act, but otherwise excluding so much of the functions conferred upon the President by the said section 121 as may relate to assistance for the support of forces and other expenditures within Indo-China and either is financed from the unexpended balances of appropriations made pursuant to sections 304 and 540 of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended, or is within an obligational limitation of $150,000,000 additional to the said unexpended balances.

(5) So much of the functions conferred upon the President by section 409 (d) of the Act as may relate to funds allocated to the Department of Defense by this order.

(b) The President shall hereafter determine the portions of the sum of $350,000,000 provided for in section 402 of the Act and the portions of the sum of $200,000,000 provided for in section 505 (b) of the Act which shall be applicable to funds allocated pursuant to the Act to the Foreign Operations Administration and the Department of Defense, respectively.

PART II. PROCEDURES FOR COORDINATION ABROAD

Section 201. Functions of the Chief of the United States Diplomatic Mission. (a) The Chief of the United States Diplomatic Mission in each country, as the representative of the President, shall serve as the channel of authority on foreign policy and shall provide foreign policy direction to all representatives of United States agencies in such country.

(b) The Chief of the United States Diplomatic Mission in each country, as the representative of the President and acting on his behalf, shall coordinate the activities of the representatives of United States agencies (including the chiefs of economic and technical assistance missions, military assistance advisory groups, foreign information staffs, and other representatives of agencies of the United States Government) in such country engaged in carrying out programs under the Act, programs under the Mutual Defense Assistance Control Act of 1951, and the programs transferred by section 2 of Reorganization Plan No. 8 of 1953¹ (67 Stat. 642); and he shall assume responsibility for assuring the unified development and execution of the said programs in such country. More particularly, the functions of each Chief of United States Diplomatic Mission shall include, with respect to the programs and the country concerned, the functions of:

- (1) Exercising general direction and leadership of the entire effort.
- (2) Assuring that recommendations and prospective plans and actions of representatives of United States agencies are effectively coordinated and are consistent with, and in furtherance of, the established policy of the United States.
- (3) Assuring that the interpretation and application of instructions received by representatives of United States agencies from higher authority are in accord with the established policy of the United States.
- (4) Guiding the representatives of United States agencies in working out measures to prevent duplication in their efforts and to promote the most effective and efficient use of all United States officers and employees engaged in work on the said programs.
- (5) Keeping the representatives of United States agencies fully informed as to current and prospective United States policies.
- (6) Prescribing procedures governing the coordination of the activities of representatives of United States agencies, and assuring that such representatives shall have access to all available information essential to the accomplishment of their prescribed duties.
- (7) Preparing and submitting such reports on the operation and status of the programs referred to in the introductory portion of this subsection as may be requested of the Secretary of State by the Secretary of Defense, the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration, or the Director of the United States Information Agency, with respect to their respective responsibilities.
- (8) Recommending the withdrawal of United States personnel from the country whenever in his opinion the interests of the United States warrant such action.

(c) Each Chief of United States Diplomatic Mission shall perform its functions under this part in accordance with instructions from higher authority and subject to established policies and programs of the United States. Only the President and the Secretary of State shall communicate instructions directly to the Chief of the United States Diplomatic Mission.

(d) No Chief of United States Diplomatic Mission shall delegate any function conferred upon him by the provisions of this Part which directly involves the exercise of direction, coordination, or authority.

Section 202. Referral of unresolved matters. The Chief of the United States Diplomatic Mission in each country shall initiate steps to reconcile any divergent views arising between representatives of United States agencies in the country concerned with respect to programs referred to in the introductory portion of section 201 (b) of this order. If agreement cannot be reached the Chief of the United States Diplomatic Mission shall recommend a course of action, and such course of action shall be followed unless a representative of a United States agency requests that the issue be referred to the Secretary of State and the United States agencies concerned for decision. If such a request is made, the parties concerned shall promptly refer the issue for resolution prior to taking action at the country level.

Section 203. Further coordination procedures and relationships. (a) All representatives of United States agencies in each country shall be subject to the responsibilities imposed upon the Chief of the United States Diplomatic Mission in such country by section 523 (b) of the act and by this part.

(b) Subject to compliance with the provisions of this part and with the prescribed procedures of their respective agencies, all representatives of United States agencies affected by this part (1) shall have direct communication with their respective agencies and with such other parties and in such manner as may be authorized by their respective agencies, (2) shall keep the respective Chiefs of United States Diplomatic Missions and each other fully and currently informed on all matters, including prospective plans, recommendations, and actions, relating to the programs referred to in the introductory portion of section 201 (b) of this order, and (3) shall furnish to the respective Chiefs of United States Diplomatic Missions, upon their request, documents and information concerning the said programs.

PART III. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Section 301. Definition. As used in this order, the word "functions" embraces duties, powers, responsibilities, authority, and discretion.

Section 302. Prior orders. (a) This order supersedes Executive Order No. 10476 of August 1, 1953 (18 F. R. 4537).

(b) The reference in section 3 (c) of Executive Order No. 10560 of September 9, 1954 (19 F. R. 5927), to Part III of Executive Order No. 10476¹ shall after the date of this order be deemed to be a reference to Part II of this order.

(c) Except to the extent inconsistent with law or with this order, and except as revoked, superseded, or otherwise made inapplicable before the time of issuance of this order, (1) all determinations, authorizations, regulations, rulings, certificates, orders, directives, contracts, agreements, and other actions issued, undertaken or entered into with respect to any function affected by this order shall continue in full force and effect until amended, modified, or revoked by appropriate authority, (2) each reference in any Executive order to any provision of law repealed by the Mutual Security Act of 1954 shall be deemed also to refer to the corresponding provision, if any, of the Mutual Security Act of 1954.

Section 303. Effective date. Without prejudice to anything done under proper authority with respect to any function under the Act at any time subsequent to the approval of the Act and prior to the approval of this order, the effective date of this order shall be deemed to be the date of the approval of the Act.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

19. ADDITIONAL REVISION OF ADMINISTERING AUTHORITY UNDER THE MUTUAL SECURITY ACT OF 1954: Executive Order No. 10610, May 9, 1955²

By virtue of the authority vested in me by the Mutual Security Act of 1954,³ including particularly sections 521 and 525 thereof (68 Stat. 855, 856), and as President of the United States, it is ordered as follows:

PART I. DEPARTMENT OF STATE; INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION ADMINISTRATION

Section 101. Exclusive of the functions transferred by the provisions of section 201 of this order, all functions conferred by law upon, or delegated or otherwise assigned by the President to, the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration, and all functions conferred by law upon, or otherwise placed under the jurisdiction of, the Foreign Operations Administration (including, subject to the provisions of sections 102 (b) and (c) of this order, all functions of agencies, officials, and employees of the Foreign Operations Administration), are hereby transferred to the Secretary of State and the Department of State, respectively.

² 20 Fed. Reg. 3179. The executive order bears the title "Administration of Mutual Security and Related Functions."

³ Supra, doc. 16.

Section 102. The following are hereby transferred to the Department of State:

(a) All offices of the Foreign Operations Administration, exclusive of the office of Director of the Foreign Operations Administration.

(b) The Institute of Inter-American Affairs and the functions vested in it by law, which functions shall remain therewith.

(c) The International Development Advisory Board (68 Stat. 42) and the functions vested in it by law, which functions shall remain therewith.

(d) The Office of Small Business, provided for in section 504 (b) of the Mutual Security Act of 1954 (68 Stat. 851), and in section 101 (d) of Executive Order No. 10575 of November 6, 1954 (19 F. R. 251).¹

Section 103. (a) The Secretary of State shall establish, with the offices, personnel, and facilities transferred to the Department of State by or under section 102 (a) and 302 of this order, an agency in the Department of State which shall be known as the International Cooperation Administration. The agencies transferred by sections 102 (b), (c), and (d) of this order shall be made a part of or attached to the International Cooperation Administration. The International Cooperation Administration shall be headed by the Director of the International Cooperation Administration referred to in the first sentence of section 103 (b) of this order. The said Director shall report directly to the Secretary of State. Except as may be otherwise provided by the Secretary of State in respect of the matters referred to in section 104 of this order, the functions transferred by section 101 hereof shall be carried out by or under the International Cooperation Administration or the Director thereof. The said Administration, including all its officers and agencies, and all functions transferred by this Part shall be subject to the direction and control of the Secretary of State. To such extent as the Secretary of State shall prescribe, consistent with law and without diminishing assignments made or required to be made by this order to the International Cooperation Administration or the Director thereof, the said Administration and Director shall be deemed to be the successors of the Foreign Operations Administration and the Director thereof, respectively, in respect of transfers to the Department of State and the Secretary of State made by this order.

(b) The title of Deputy Director of the Foreign Operations Administration is hereby changed to Director of the International Cooperation Administration. The Director of the International Cooperation Administration may, as he deems proper, change the title of and utilize in connection with the functions transferred by this order any other office of the Foreign Operations Administration transferred hereby.

Section 104. (a) The Secretary of State, after consultation with the Secretary of Defense, shall make appropriate arrangements for carrying out the function of coordination referred to in section 102 (c) (1) of Executive Order No. 10575 of November 6, 1954.

(b) The Secretary of State or, if he shall so direct, the Director of the International Cooperation Administration shall (1) carry out the functions under the Mutual Defense Assistance Control Act of 1951¹ transferred by section 101 of this order, (2) carry out the functions under section 501 (a) (2) of the Mutual Security Act of 1951 (as continued by section 525 of the Mutual Security Act of 1954), (3) make the determinations authorized by the last sentence of section 524 (b) of the Mutual Security Act of 1954, and (4) coordinate the functions of the International Cooperation Administration and other affairs of the Department of State.

PART II. DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

Section 201. So much of the functions under chapter 2 of Title I of the Mutual Security Act of 1954 now vested in or delegated to or otherwise conferred upon the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration or the Foreign Operations Administration as consists of furnishing to recipients eligible under that chapter, equipment, materials, or services which are delivered or rendered directly to the military forces of the recipient country or its agent (including a civilian contractor with such force) for the exclusive use, or to be under the exclusive control, of such military forces and without entering into or being processed by the civilian economy of the recipient country except as above provided is hereby transferred to the Secretary of Defense and the Department of Defense, respectively.

Section 202. The determination of the value of the program for any country under so much of chapter 2 of Title I of the Mutual Security Act of 1954 as pertains to the functions transferred by section 201 of this order shall be made by the Secretary of State.

PART III. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Section 301. As used in this order, the term functions includes powers, duties, authority, responsibilities, and discretion.

Section 302. So much of the records, property, personnel, positions, and unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, and other funds of the Foreign Operations Administration as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall determine shall be transferred to the Department of Defense. There are hereby transferred to the Department of State all other records, property, personnel, positions, and unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, and other funds of the Foreign Operations Administration (including those of the Institute of Inter-American Affairs, the International Development Advisory Board, and the Office of Small Business, which shall be transferred with those agencies, respectively). Such further measures and dispositions as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget may deem necessary in order to effectuate the transfers provided for in this section shall be carried out in such manner as he shall direct and by such agencies as he shall designate.

Section 303. (a) The Foreign Operations Administration, including the office of Director of the Foreign Operations Administration but excluding all other offices of, and all agencies and positions of, the Foreign Operations Administration, and excluding also all functions transferred by the provisions of this order, is hereby abolished.

(b) The memberships of the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration on the following bodies, together with the functions of the said Director in his capacity as member of each thereof, are hereby abolished: (1) The National Security Council, (2) the Operations Coordinating Board, (3) the Council on Foreign Economic Policy, (4) the Interagency Committee on Agricultural Surplus Disposal, (5) the Defense Mobilization Board, and (6) the Interdepartmental Committee on Trade Agreements: Provided, That the Director of the International Cooperation Administration or his designated representative shall participate in the deliberations, and assist in connection with the affairs, of the bodies mentioned in items (2) to (6), inclusive, above, and of the Committee for Reciprocity Information.

Section 304. For similar information for the period 1940-1951, see Foreign Aid by the United States Government, 1940-1951, prepared by the Clearing Office for Foreign Transactions, Department of Commerce (1952), Appendix Tables L to N, pp. 107-118.

22. UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT FOREIGN GRANTS AND CREDITS, POSTWAR DECADE, JULY 1, 1945, THROUGH JUNE 30, 1955: Tabular Compilation by Program (Military and Other) and by Area, November 4, 1955 (Excerpt)¹

[Prefatory Note: Grants are largely outright gifts for which no payment is expected, or which at most involve an obligation on the part of the receiver to extend aid to the United States or other countries to achieve a common objective. Credits are loan disbursements or transfers under other agreements which give rise to specific obligations to repay, over a period of years, usually with interest. In some instances assistance has been given with the understanding that a decision as to repayment will be made at a later date; such assistance is included in grants. At such time as an agreement is reached for repayment over a period of years, a credit is established. Such credits, cannot, as a rule, be deducted from specific grants recorded in previous periods; an adjustment for grants converted into credits is made at the time of agreement. All known returns to the United States Government stemming from grants and credits are taken into account in net grants and net credits.]

The measure of foreign grants and credits generally is in terms of goods delivered or shipped by the United States Government, services rendered by the United States Government, or cash disbursed by the United States Government to or for the account of a foreign government or other foreign entity. The Government's capital investments in the International Bank ($635 million) and International Monetary Fund ($2,750 million) are not included in these data although they constitute an additional measure taken by this Government to promote foreign economic recovery. Payments made to these international financial institutions do not result in immediate equivalent aid to foreign countries. Use of available dollar funds is largely determined by the managements of the two institutions, subject to certain controls which can be exercised by the United States Government.

"Mutual security military grants" include mutual security program aid for common-use items which are to be used by military forces of nations receiving assistance, when such assistance provided under section 123 of the Mutual Security Act of 1954, as amended, is administered in accordance with chapter 1, Military Assistance, of Title I of that act. "Mutual security other grants" include (1) mutual security program aid for economic and technical assistance use from military aid appropriations, (2) mutual security program aid from appropriations for common-use items which are to be used by military forces of nations receiving assistance, when such assistance is administered in accordance with chapter 3, Defense Support, of the Mutual Security Act of 1954, as amended, and (3) also transfer of funds for the support of forces of Cambodia, Laos, and Vietnam (and forces of France located in such states) and of funds in support of production for forces support.

"Military equipment loans" are included in this report as part of military grants; these "loans" are essentially transfers on an indeterminate basis, generally requiring only the return of the identical item, if available. In essence, this was the requirement pertaining to wartime lend-lease transfers of watercraft, which were included as grant transfers in these data. The transfers reported for Canada and return of aircraft, for example, under the program Defense Department August 15, 1952.

"Special country programs" include Greek-Turkish aid, Chinese stabilization, Philippine rehabilitation fund, Libyan special purpose fund, Berlin investment fund, notes of September 9, 1954, and Mexican foot-and-mouth disease program.

For security reasons data by country do not include furnished principally under the mutual security exhibits, the military assistance under mutual security summary manner in the appropriate geographical military assistance generally reflect the area of equipment; in particular data for Asia and Pacific include Indochina (Cambodia, Laos, and Vietnam) while Europe include shipments to France, a part of which equipment used by the French forces in Indochina inclusion of dependencies in the grouping "Western" for other groupings, particularly "Near East and Africa" are understated. The aid shown in the table include have been extended to private entities in the country credit shown for Canada, for example, represents private entities in Canada. Country data include agricultural surpluses through American voluntary international organizations.

INTERNATIONAL INFORMATION AND EDUCATIONAL EXCHANGE PROGRAMS

I. ORGANIZATION OF THE UNITED STATES OVERSEAS INFORMATION AND EDUCATIONAL EXCHANGE FUNCTIONS, 1938-1953¹

From the termination of the Creel Committee (Committee on Public Information, George Creel, Chairman; established by Executive Order, April 14, 1917) in 1919 to the end of World War II, the only semblance of a concerted overseas information program consisted of the informational activities undertaken in the late 1930's in connection with the Inter-American System. These activities led to the establishment in 1938 of the first specialized machinery in the Department of State to deal with international information functions—the Division of Cultural Relations (Departmental Order 768, July 28, 1938); as well as the creation of the Interdepartmental Committee on Scientific and Cultural Cooperation (first meeting as “Committee on Cooperation with the American Republics,” May 26, 1938);² and, on August 16, 1940, the Office for Coordination of Commercial and Cultural Relations between the American Republics (changed on July 30, 1941 to Office of Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs, on March 23, 1945 to Office of Inter-American Affairs; terminated May 20, 1946).

The World War II programs started “from scratch,” aside from the activities in the American Hemisphere, and evolved in a more or less haphazard manner. The American Hemisphere program was developed as a supplement to broad commercial and social wartime programs. For other areas, the overseas information program was joined with the domestic information program, first under the Coordinator of Information, then in the Office of War Information (OWI). Thus quite distinct bases of organization were followed in the different areas.

During World War II, the Department of State's role in the field of international information activities, as distinguished from purely cultural relations, was chiefly that of furnishing essential information and policy guidance to the civilian and military information agencies. Up to 1944, this role was performed in part by the Division of Current Information (established by Departmental Order 206, May 24, 1921), and in part directly by the geographical officers of the Department. In the field of cultural relations, the Division of Cultural Relations and the Interdepartmental Committee on Scientific and Cultural Cooperation were concerned primarily with the inter-American program.

On January 15, 1944 (Departmental Order 1218), the Department created an Office of Public Information, into which most of its domestic and foreign information functions, including cultural relations, were grouped. The new Office was under the Assistant Secretary for Administration.

On December 20, 1944 (Departmental Order 1301), greater recognition was given information functions by the creation of the position of Assistant Secretary in charge of Public and Cultural Relations (later Public Affairs). The name of the Office of Public Information was changed to the Office of Public Affairs—under the new Assistant Secretary. Within this Office a new International Information Division took over the overseas information activities, while the Division of Cultural Cooperation handled the cultural relations program.

With the transfer of the overseas functions of the Office of War Information and the Office of Inter-American Affairs (Executive Order 9608, August 31, 1945), the Department established (Departmental Order 1336) the Office of International Information and Cultural Affairs (OIC). The Office of Public Affairs was left with the responsibility for the Department's work in domestic public affairs. By the end of 1945, the OIC had emerged as the agency chiefly responsible for the administration of the Department's overseas informational and cultural relations functions. The office contained five operating divisions: Press and Publications, Broadcasting, Motion Pictures, Exchange of Persons, and Libraries and Institutes. It remained essentially unaltered until the fall of 1947, when its program was greatly curtailed because of drastic reductions in its appropriations. On August 15, 1947, the title of OIC was changed (Departmental Announcement 685) to the Office of Information and Educational Exchange (OIE).

Following the passage of the Smith-Mundt Act (United States Information and Educational Exchange Act, Public Law 402, January 27, 1948)¹ and the granting of additional funds, OIE was split into two units (Departmental Announcements 12, 14, 15, April 22, 1948): Office of International Information (OII) and Office of Educational Exchange (OEX). The Smith-Mundt Act and the Fulbright Act (Public Law 584, August 1, 1946)² made possible great expansion of the exchange program.

Late in 1949, the Department of State created (see Public Notice 34,

March 6, 1950) the position of a General Manager, who was made responsible for formulating and executing the over-all International Information and Educational Exchange Program (IE), within the policy directives of the Assistant Secretary for Public Affairs. On January 16, 1952, a major reorganization (Departmental Announcement 4) established the International Information Administration (IIA), described as a "semiautonomous" unit in the Department. The Administrator of the new unit combined the duties of the General Manager of IE with most of the overseas information responsibilities of the Assistant Secretary for Public Affairs, reporting directly to the Secretary and Under Secretary of State.

The United States Information Agency (USIA) was established on August 1, 1953,² as independent of the Department of State, but subject to policy guidance therefrom. USIA also absorbed the information functions of the Mutual Security Agency and the Technical Cooperation Administration, already to some extent integrated under IIA. The exchange program under the Fulbright and Smith-Mundt Acts and certain other legislation remained in the Department of State to be administered by the International Educational Exchange Service (IES) under the Assistant Secretary for Public Affairs.

2. THE CAMPAIGN OF TRUTH: Address by the President, April 20, 1950 (Excerpt)³

I am convinced that we should greatly extend and strengthen our efforts for making the truth known to people in all the world.

Most of us have recognized for years, of course, how important it is to spread the truth about freedom and democracy. We are already doing some very good work—through the Voice of America and the United States information offices and libraries in many parts of the world, through the exchange of students, through the United Nations

This address marked the beginning of a greatly expanded information program, with further impetus given by the first Soviet atomic explosion, a National Security Council reappraisal of the Nation's position in the world (calling for, in part, an expanded and aggressive information program), and the Communist invasion of the Republic of Korea on June 25, 1950. Congress appropriated $79 million for the fiscal year 1951 support of the expanded program, which was 2½ times the appropriation granted for fiscal year 1950, and 4 times that for 1949. The basic authority under which the program operated in the Department of State was the Fulbright Act of 1948 (PL 584, 79th Cong., 2d sess.; A Decade of American Foreign Policy, pp. 12-1236) and the Smith-Mundt Act (the United States Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948, PL 402, 80th Cong., 2d sess.; ibid., pp. 1224-12). The Psychological Strategy Board, established by Presidential directive of June 1951 (infra, doc. 4), attempted to provide high-level guidance "for the more effective planning, coordination and conduct, within the framework of approved national policies, of psychological operations."

and its affiliated organizations, and in other ways. But events have shown, I believe, that we need to do much more, both ourselves and in collaboration with the other free nations. We must use every means at our command, private as well as governmental, to get the truth to other peoples.

Private groups and organizations have an important part to play. Our labor unions have already done fine work in communicating with labor in Europe, in Latin America, and elsewhere. The story of free American labor, told by American trade unionists, is a better weapon against Communist propaganda among workers in other countries than any number of speeches by government officials.

The same principle applies to other groups. The best way for farmers in other countries to find out about us is to talk directly with our own farmers. Our business men can speak directly to businessmen abroad. We need to promote much more direct contact between our people and those of other countries.

We should encourage many more people from other countries to visit us here, to see for themselves what is true and what is not true about our country. We should find more opportunities for foreign students to study in our schools and universities. They will learn here the skills and techniques needed in their own countries. They will also see at first hand the rights and duties of citizens in our land of democratic institutions.

Our colleges should train more Americans to go abroad as teachers, especially to teach modern methods of farming, industry, and public health—and, by example, to teach our concepts of democracy. The notable record of our many charitable and religious organizations who send teachers abroad is proof of what can be done.

Another major part of our effort must be carried out through our great public information channels—newspapers and magazines, radio, and motion pictures. We must strive constantly to break down or leap over barriers to free communication wherever they exist. We must make full use of every effective means of communicating information, in simple, understandable form, to people whose backgrounds and cultures are different from ours.

This poses an enormous challenge to groups such as yours, a challenge which can be met only by extraordinary inventiveness and enterprise. I am confident that the American press can and will make a tremendously useful contribution toward finding new solutions.

The Government's programs for telling the truth about the United States to the peoples of the world also need constant improvement. Our present overseas information and educational exchange program is getting results. For example, the Voice of America has been carrying to people behind the Iron Curtain the true story of world events. It has been so successful that the Soviet Government is using a vast amount of costly equipment in an attempt to drown out our broadcasts by jamming. We must devise ways to break through that jamming and get our message across. And we must improve and strengthen our whole range of information and educational services.

This is not a conclusion reached by Government officials alone. We have had the valuable aid of the United States Advisory Commission on Information created by the Congress.¹ Your own society is ably represented on that Commission by Mark Ethridge and Erwin D. Canham. The members of the Commission have given intensive study to the overseas information program and have made repeated recommendations that it be substantially expanded. Similar recommendations for the exchange program have been made by the Advisory Commission on Education,² headed by Dr. Harvie Branscomb. I have been glad to see that many Members of the Congress have urged an improved and expanded program in these fields—as shown, for example, by the resolution introduced recently by Senator Benton for himself and a number of his colleagues.

Because of the pressing need to increase our efforts along this line, I have directed the Secretary of State to plan a strengthened and more effective national effort to use the great power of truth in working for peace. This effort will require the imagination and energies of private individuals and groups throughout the country. We shall need to use fully all the private and governmental means that have proved successful so far—and to discover and employ new ones.

REACHING UPWARD THROUGH TRUTH

Our task is to present the truth to the millions of people who are uninformed or misinformed or unconvinced. Our task is to reach them in their daily lives, as they work and learn. We must be alert, ingenious, and diligent in reaching peoples of other countries, whatever their educational and cultural backgrounds may be. Our task is to show them that freedom is the way to economic and social advancement, the way to political independence, the way to strength, happiness, and peace.

This task is not separate and distinct from other elements of our foreign policy. It is a necessary part of all we are doing to build a peaceful world. It is as important as armed strength or economic aid. The Marshall Plan, military aid, Point 4—these and other programs depend for their success on the understanding and support of our own citizens and those of other countries.

We must make ourselves known as we really are—not as Communist propaganda pictures us. We must pool our efforts with those of the other free peoples in a sustained, intensified program to promote the cause of freedom against the propaganda of slavery. We must make ourselves heard round the world in a great campaign of truth.

We have tremendous advantages in the struggle for men's minds and loyalties. We have truth and freedom on our side. The appeal of free institutions and self-government springs from the deepest and noblest aspirations of mankind. It is based on every man's desire for liberty and opportunity. It is based on every man's wish to be self-reliant and to shape his own destiny.

As we go forward with our campaign of truth, we will make lasting progress toward the kind of world we seek—a world in which men and nations live not as enemies but as brothers.

The Director of Central Intelligence

It is the purpose of this directive to authorize and provide for the more effective planning, coordination, and conduct, within the framework of approved national policies, of psychological operations.

There is hereby established a Psychological Strategy Board responsible, within the purposes and terms of this directive, for the formulation and promulgation, as guidance to the departments and agencies responsible for psychological operations, of over-all national psychological objectives, policies and programs, and for the coordination and evaluation of the national psychological effort.

The Board will report to the National Security Council on the Board's activities and on its evaluation of the national psychological operations, including implementation of approved objectives, policies, and programs by the departments and agencies concerned.

The Board shall be composed of:

a. The Undersecretary of State, the Deputy Secretary of Defense, and the Director of Central Intelligence, or, in their absence, their appropriate designees;

b. An appropriate representative of the head of each such other department or agency of the Government as may, from time to time, be determined by the Board.

The Board shall designate one of its members as chairman.

A representative of the Joint Chiefs of Staff shall sit with the Board as its principal military adviser in order that the Board may ensure that its objectives, policies, and programs shall be related to approved plans for military operations.

There is established under the Board, a director, who shall be designated by the President and who shall receive compensation of 16 thousand dollars per year.

The director, within the limits of funds and personnel made available by the Board for this purpose, shall organize and direct a staff to assist in carrying out his responsibilities. The director shall determine the organization and qualifications of the staff, which may include individuals employed for this purpose, including part-time experts, and/or individuals detailed from the participating departments and agencies for assignment to full-time duty or on an ad hoc task force basis. Personnel detailed for assignment to duty under the terms of this directive shall be under the control of the director, subject only to necessary personnel procedures within their respective departments and agencies.

The participating departments and agencies shall afford to the director and the staff such assistance and access to information as may be specifically requested by the director in carrying out his assigned duties.

The heads of the departments and agencies concerned shall examine into present arrangements within their departments and agencies for the conduct, direction, and coordination of psychological operations with a view toward readjusting or strengthening them if necessary to carry out the purposes of this directive.

In performing its functions, the Board shall utilize to the maximum extent the facilities and resources of the participating departments and agencies.

ESTABLISHMENT OF THE UNITED STATES INTERNATIONAL INFORMATION ADMINISTRATION (IIA) IN THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE: Departmental Announcement 4, January 16, 1952¹

1. Purpose

The purpose of this announcement is to establish the United States International Information Administration (IIA) for the conduct of the Department's international information and educational exchange programs, to describe the functions assigned to this organization and to the Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs and the functions with respect to IIA programs assigned to other areas of the Department, and to maintain and further strengthen integration of the United States international information and educational exchange programs with the conduct of foreign relations generally.

2. Establishment of United States International Information Administration

There is hereby established within the Department of State the United States International Information Administration. This organization shall be headed by an Administrator who shall be directly accountable to the Secretary and the Under Secretary for the planning and execution of the Department's programs under the Smith-Mundt Act (Public Law 402, 80th Congress)² and related legislation and other foreign information activities for the administration of which the Secretary is responsible.

3. Administrator of the United States International Information Administration

a. Serves as Chairman of the Psychological Operations Coordinating Committee³ and discharges the responsibility of the Secretary of State for international information and educational exchange programs in the interdepartmental field.

³ Established Aug. 17, 1950; see the Department of State Bulletin, Aug. 28, 1950, p. 335.

b. Directs the development of international information and educational exchange (IIA) policies designed to implement and strengthen the foreign policies of the United States, with the advice of the regional bureaus and other areas of the Department as appropriate and with the aid of guidance from the Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs.

c. Directs the planning of IIA programs, with the advice of the regional bureaus.

d. Directs the execution of all IIA programs at home and abroad, submitting field communications for the advice or review of those areas of the Department having specific advice or review authority with respect to the matters dealt with in such communications.

e. Determines the selection and assignment of personnel to the IIA program, at home and abroad, under the personnel policies and procedures applicable to the IIA program, securing the review of the regional bureaus as to the selection of the chief public affairs officers at posts abroad and their advice as to their principal subordinates.

4. Assistant Secretary for Public Affairs

a. Participates in the formulation of policy of the Department from the standpoint of public opinion factors and advises the Secretary, the Under Secretary, and other top staff of the Department on public opinion factors, domestic and foreign, involved in the formulation of departmental policy.

b. Develops policies on public information and directs the execution of programs designed to keep the United States public informed on international affairs and to maintain contacts between the Department and the United States public.

c. Provides guidance to the development of international information and educational exchange policies and serves as the staff officer to the Secretary responsible for the approval of major IIA policy guidances.

d. Develops policies for and supervises the conduct of a program of research on American policy, historically considered, for use of the Department and the public, in consultation with other areas of the Department.

e. Develops policies on substantive matters relating to United States participation in UNESCO, subject to review by the Bureau of United Nations Affairs, plans and implements UNESCO's programs in this country, serves as the channel of communication between the Department and UNESCO and between the National Commission [for UNESCO] and UNESCO, and reviews determinations of the Bureau of United Nations Affairs pertaining to UNESCO.

f. Advises the Bureau of United Nations Affairs of obstacles to freedom of information encountered in operations of public affairs programs; assures the maintenance of liaison with American mass communications industries to interpret and to secure advice and support for United States policies and actions related to freedom of information.

5. Regional Bureaus

The responsibility and authority of the regional bureaus with respect to information policy for their areas are not changed. The regional bureaus shall have the following functions with respect to programs of the United States International Information Administration:

- a. State the foreign policies applicable to the region as a basis for the development of international information and exchange policies.
- b. Advise IIA on the development of international information and educational exchange policies applicable to their regions and the Assistant Secretary for Public Affairs on policy guidance to IIA.
- c. Consider and advise IIA on program plans applicable to their areas, with the right of appeal in the event of differences.
- d. As requested by IIA, or upon own initiative, advises IIA on the area suitability of IIA materials and activities.
- e. Advise IIA on the total IIA complement to be stationed at each post.
- f. Review the IIA selection of the chief public affairs officer for each post and advise on the selection of his principal subordinates.
- g. Advise IIA on budgetary provision to be made for administrative support of IIA staff and operations at posts abroad.

6. Departmental Support for IIA Operations

6.1 Adequate services will be provided to IIA by strengthening the central facilities of the Department where required or by establishing special facilities within IIA. It is intended to assure the provision of services in such a manner that the requirements of IIA will be met and the responsibility of the Administrator for the IIA program will not be impaired, at the same time maintaining the necessary uniformity of policy and practice, and retaining centralized facilities where important economies can be effected without impairing service for IIA.

6.2 The basic lines to be followed in providing administrative support for IIA in the immediate future are set forth below. Continuous study shall be given to all phases of administrative support operations and further modifications shall be made where experience proves that they are necessary to provide adequate support for the IIA program.

6.3 Departmental services in the fields of communication, security, building operations and like services will be utilized by IIA.

6.4 Personnel operations will be conducted by the central facilities of the Department, but modifications in existing policies on appointment, promotion, salary, transfer, etc., and special procedural arrangements will be made wherever such adaptations are necessary in the interests of effective operation of the IIA program. In order to assure that full attention is given to the needs and problems of the IIA program, a special IIA unit will be organized within the Office of Personnel.

6.5 IIA will prepare, present and justify its own budget and manage its own financial affairs, subject to such review by the Deputy

Under Secretary for administration as is necessary to assure compliance with general departmental budget and fiscal policies.

6.6 A special IIA unit within the Division of Central Services will handle IIA procurement.

7. Administration of IIA Programs at Posts Abroad

7.1 The United States diplomatic mission chief shall continue to be fully responsible for the conduct of IIA programs at his post. The public affairs officer serves as a principal member of his staff with the status of chief of a major section of the mission. Mission chiefs are encouraged to delegate to public affairs officers authority to communicate with the Department in the name of the mission chief on as broad a range of IIA matters as practicable.

7.2 The mission chief will be responsible for assuring that the IIA program works cooperatively with the other operating United States programs within his country and provides information support to such programs.

7.3 The mission chief shall be responsible for seeing that adequate administrative support is provided for IIA programs in accordance with their requirements. Administrative support will normally be provided by the administrative officer of the mission. Other organizational arrangements may, with the approval of the mission chief, be made whenever required to assure efficient support of IIA operations. The name "United States Information Service" will continue to be used to identify the program abroad.

8. Installation of Reorganization

The Deputy Under Secretary for administration shall be responsible for providing leadership in the installation of the new plan of organization set forth in this announcement and in facilitating the transfers of personnel, funds, records and equipment.

6. THE OVERT INTERNATIONAL INFORMATION AND EDUCATIONAL EXCHANGE PROGRAMS OF THE UNITED STATES:

Article by the Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs,¹ March 31, 1952²

Recently I heard a speaker say that "no one any longer questions the importance of this Government's International Information and Educational Exchange Program; no one any longer says that ideas are not as important as bullets." I am sorry to say that this is not an accurate statement. Plenty of people today, both in this country and other countries, confess to their belief that the only possible outcome of the cold war is a hot war in which the test for victory will be which nation or which group of nations will produce the fastest airplanes, the most efficient bazookas, the most maneuverable and hard-hitting tanks and that expenditures on such frippery as propaganda are largely wasted.

Although I do not agree with their conclusion I want to make it clear that I regard propaganda as only one of four major instruments to support the attainment of our national policy objectives whether we are in peace or war. Propaganda alone is no substitute either for policy or for action. It must be used in concert with the other major instruments of national policy—political, economic, and military power. Propaganda is 90 percent deeds and only 10 percent words. If we do the right things and make them known to others in an intelligent way, we succeed in our propaganda task. For example, we could shout for many weeks in every medium of mass communication that we use that we intend to stay in Berlin until the danger of aggression from the East is checked and until the German people have the opportunity freely to determine the kind of government and the kind of unification they may want. All this will mean little, however, as long as the words are unaccompanied by deeds. When we mount in the face of a Soviet blockade of Berlin an airlift which sets a plane down every 3 minutes on Tempelhof Airdrome, and we show the capacity to supply the people of the city of Berlin with the necessities of living to an extent even greater than when the city was supplied by rail and surface transport, then we have developed a mighty propaganda symbol to all the world. Similarly, appointment of General Eisenhower as Supreme Commander, Allied Powers in Europe, was a propaganda symbol. He stood above all for victory in Europe and inspired a feeling of renewed confidence and determination among the peoples of Western Europe that Soviet aggression might be prevented—or, if it occurred, could be successfully resisted.

There is another dangerous fallacy abroad which I shall mention. I find that many people regard Soviet propaganda as invincible, infallible, and all-conquering. Soviet propaganda is apparently effective in many circumstances. I believe, however, that Soviet propaganda has serious fundamental weaknesses which are capable of being exploited by the free world. I believe this in spite of the fact that in the fifteenth century Louis XI of France proclaimed the simple doctrine that "if they lie to you, you lie still more to them" and George Orwell in his frightening picture of the totalitarian state of 1984 shows a ministry of truth on whose vast white façade stretch these slogans: "War is Peace; Freedom is Slavery; Ignorance is Strength." Yet one of the most vulnerable points is the demonstrable contradiction between Soviet words and Soviet deeds. This contradiction, evident even to the peoples of the Soviet Union and its satellites, is accentuated by blunders that the so-called infallible Soviet propaganda machine makes from time to time—and, to take a phrase from the late Mayor LaGuardia, "When they really pull a boner, it is a beauty."

For example: Despite their most valiant efforts to convince the world that the United States and the Republic of Korea are the aggressors in Korea, the Soviet propaganda machine has failed in its task. Most of the peoples in the world don't believe them. When

Mr. Vyshinsky at the General Assembly rejected the disarmament proposals of the Western Powers with the statement that he had lain awake all night laughing at these proposals, the Kremlin belatedly realized that a propaganda blunder of the first magnitude had been made. In Italy and other Western European countries, pictures appeared of Mr. Vyshinsky emphasizing his laughter over the disarmament proposals and asking the question: "Does Mr. Vyshinsky speak for you?" All the doves and peace rallies the Communists can muster will not completely erase that picture.

Against this background I should like to sketch the following broad topics (1) The development of an overseas information program; (2) the recent reorganization of that program; (3) the scope of the program; (4) the content of the program; (5) the results we are getting; and (6) some special problems of United States propaganda in the future.

DEVELOPMENT OF THE PROGRAM

In briefest compass, the U.S. Government did not become interested in any kind of international information and educational exchange program before the years immediately prior to World War II. Beginnings of what we call educational exchange and cultural relations were made in 1938 and underwent a vast wartime expansion under both the Nelson Rockefeller operation (the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs) and the Office of War Information (OWI). Even before that period, we as a nation had used propaganda from time to time as one of the basic instruments of our national policy and strategy. More than 30 years ago, for example, during the First World War, Woodrow Wilson understood the power of persuasion. He correctly estimated the force of ideas and his Fourteen Points became a powerful weapon for the Allies and a major factor in the surrender of Germany. His "conditions of a just peace" reached the people behind the enemy lines and undermined their will to resist. They gained for America a position of world leadership. Of course, between the wars we promptly forgot most of these lessons we had learned, and in the Second World War we again had to discover the importance of ideas. We improvised a psychological warfare mechanism which achieved some success—both tactical and strategic. At the end of World War II, we did remember some of the lessons and salvaged some of the equipment of propaganda.

What happened was that in August 1945 the President by Executive order turned over to the State Department many of the functions, personnel, resources, and funds of OWI, Office of Inter-American Affairs, Office of Strategic Services, and Foreign Economic Administration.¹ Those which related to the propaganda and educational exchange functions were consolidated under the Assistant Secretary for Public Affairs, William Benton, now junior Senator from Connecticut, who was invited by Secretary Byrnes to take over the hard task of cutting down a wartime information program to peacetime proportions. Incidentally, in that process Mr. Benton was to try to find out just what the job was for the U.S. Government in time of peace, using these instruments of persuasion which we had developed. In a period of about 3 months, Mr. Benton cut personnel of somewhat over 10,000 back to roughly 3,000. He lost almost every one of his top wartime administrators who had been drawn from the highest levels of the private mass communications business. He met considerable ignorance and apathy as to any need for continuing such an instrument of international persuasion.

From the end of the war until January 1948 the issue was in doubt whether in fact the Congress would appropriate money to sustain any kind of peacetime information program. One of the great tributes that history should pay to Senator Benton is that he saw the issue clearly and he fought it through to a successful result, culminating in the passage in January 1948 of what is now known as the International Information and Educational Exchange Act¹ sponsored by Senator H. Alexander Smith and Senator (then Congressman) Karl Mundt which authorized a permanent program of this kind. However, I want to point out that this legislation concentrated primarily on authorizing the creation of better understanding between the peoples of the United States and the peoples of other countries and on presenting "a full and fair picture of the United States" to other peoples of the world.

From January 1948 until April 1950, the program experienced heavy going and drastic fund reductions. During this period of time, however, a considerable amount of progress was made.

On April 20, 1950, the President called for that all-out expansion of these efforts which he styled the "Campaign of Truth."² He said at that time: "Our task is to present the truth to the millions of people who are uninformed, or misinformed, or unconvinced. Our task is to reach them in their daily lives, as they work and learn. We must be alert, ingenious, and diligent in reaching peoples of other countries, whatever their educational and cultural backgrounds may be. Our task is to show them that freedom is the way to economic and social advancement, the way to political independence, the way to strength, happiness, and peace. The task is not separate and distinct from other elements of our foreign policy. It is a necessary part of all we are doing to build a peaceful world. It is as important as armed strength or economic aid. The Marshall Plan, military aid, Point Four—these and other programs depend for their success on the understanding and support of our own citizens and those of other countries."

ORGANIZATION AND FUNCTION OF THE PROGRAM

Reduced to its essentials the reorganization announced late in January³ is an attempt to give the Administrator of the world-wide Information and Educational Exchange Programs all the tools he needs to do his job and the administrative flexibility which will be required. It also lifts the status of the whole program since the new administrator, a distinguished economist, businessman, and more recently, college president, Wilson Compton, reports directly to the Secretary and Under Secretary of State. He is no longer responsible in his operations to the Assistant Secretary for Public Affairs who, under the earlier concepts, was not only responsible for determining information policy but was also ultimately responsible for the operations of the program itself.

Under the reorganization the Assistant Secretary can become far more a staff officer of the Secretary and other top officers of the Department. He is relieved of any necessity for participation in operating decisions of the new International Information Administration (IIA); he retains the responsibility for seeing that the information policy pursued by the IIA is in line with foreign policy objectives and current foreign policy decisions.

The Administrator of the IIA gains under the reorganization a consolidation of authority in his own hands which in the past was somewhat divided between the General Manager of the program, the Assistant Secretary for Public Affairs, the regional bureaus, and the central administrative offices of the Department. The Administrator now takes the responsibility for the supervision of the planning and conduct of all the overseas aspects of these programs—a job formerly performed by the Department's regional bureaus. He also acquires considerably greater flexibility in handling the mechanics of his administration.

THE SCOPE OF THE INTERNATIONAL PROGRAM

We shall know how good our reorganization is only after we have actually got it working. I should like, though, to give an indication of what this program includes: In the fiscal year 1948 around 2,500 people participated in the program that operated on a budget of approximately 20 million dollars. This was the low point of the program in the postwar years. We were forced to close down a number of our overseas posts and fire a number of skilled and experienced people in the very year in which the Marshall Plan was getting under way in Europe and the Soviet propaganda campaign against us was really beginning to roll. Since 1948, however, we have been building up again. The supplemental appropriation of 79 million dollars we received in the fall of 1950 following the President's call for a greatly expanded Campaign of Truth resulted in an operation with four times as many people on board as in the lean year 1948—and with nearly six times as much money. Our current strength is slightly under 12,000 people, at home and abroad, and our appropriation for 1952 is $85,000,000.

USIE Personnel and Appropriations, 1947 to 1952

	1947	1948	1949	1950	1951	1952
Authorized Personnel			4, 118	6, 030	10, 807	11, 556
Appropriation Amount	$24, 659, 778	$20, 730, 000	$31, 180, 900	$47, 300, 000	$121, 301, 759	$85, 000, 000

The program consists of three primary fast media—radio, press and publications, and motion pictures—and two of what are usually called “slow media” but what I prefer to call deep penetration media—information centers and exchange programs.

Most important of all are the people overseas on the firing line itself who constitute USIE—the United States Information Service.

Radio. The world-wide radio network of the Voice of America transmits programs in 46 languages around the clock and has a potential foreign listening audience of some 300,000,000 people. It operates 38 domestic shortwave transmitters with overseas relay bases at Honolulu, Manila, Munich, Tangier, and Salonika plus use of BBC relays at Wooferton, England. Soviet jamming of programs to the U.S.S.R. and the Iron Curtain areas began in the spring of 1949 and became increasingly severe. We have taken major steps to overcome jamming, including such spectacular developments as the recent commissioning of the first of our high-powered floating transmitters—which was formally inaugurated at Washington on March 4.

Radio, of course, is our primary means of hammering holes through the Iron Curtain to carry messages of truth to those peoples. Despite operation of at least 250 sky-wave jamming installations and at least 1,000 ground-wave jammers, our latest monitoring reports indicate a level of understandable reception of 25 percent inside Moscow and Leningrad, and between 75 and 80 percent in many outlying areas. We have relays over the local stations of various countries including such important ones as France, Italy, Korea, Greece, Austria, Germany, and a number of the Latin American countries.

PRESS AND PUBLICATIONS

We use the news to get facts across in a number of ways. A 9,000-word daily wireless bulletin supplies U.S. information officers in 67 U.S. diplomatic missions with official news and background material designed for local use abroad. By airmail and pouch the press branch supplies 170 points all over the world with a weekly air bulletin covering a number of short topics designed for the local press abroad. We do a major job in a steadily expanding publications operation including publication of more than 60 million copies of magazines, cartoon books, photo pamphlets, leaflets, and educational materials in 30 languages. Best known is Amerika, the big handsome slick-paper illustrated monthly about this country printed in Russian of which around 20,000 copies continued to be distributed in the Soviet Union despite Soviet obstructionist tactics. We do a major job with visual materials, including news and feature photos, wall posters, and plastic plates for use in newspapers abroad. Regional production centers at London and Manila speed up the work.

MOTION PICTURES

Through documentary motion pictures shown in more than 90 countries we are reaching audiences of more than 1 million people everyday. They are produced with sound tracks in over 30 languages and are shown to a wide variety of rural as well as urban groups, including churches, labor organizations, youth groups, and primary and secondary schools. Newsreels are used for very current and immediate hard-hitting topical material. "Eisenhower" and "A Plan for Peace" are examples of fast use for maximum impact.

OVERSEAS INFORMATION CENTERS

One hundred and forty-six U. S. Information Centers and 31 binational centers in 78 countries throughout the world are distributing American books, newspapers, and magazines, reaching additional millions. I often think of these centers as the arsenals of ideas for the freedom-loving and prodemocratic individuals in many of these countries. Last year these centers recorded more than 24 million visits from foreign nationals. There are more than 1 million books, periodicals, Government publications, and printed materials in these centers. In addition to library services, the centers carry on cultural and educational activities, including English-language teaching in many places.

EXCHANGE OF PERSONS PROGRAMS

One of the ways to straighten people out about the facts is to let them see for themselves. Government grants enable teachers, research scholars, labor leaders, newspaper publishers, editors, and reporters to come here to see what we are like. Similar grants permit Americans to travel abroad. During fiscal 1951 more than 7,500 persons received grants-in-aid for exchanges between the United States and 71 foreign countries. Our emphasis in these exchange programs is more and more on leaders, molders, and communicators of opinion.

USIE ITSELF

Approximately 850 American officers operate at 175 foreign-service posts in 84 countries and territories, ably and devotedly assisted by 4,000 local employees. This inventory to be complete should also include the information officers and their staffs at Paris and the Marshall Plan countries who operated under the Economic Cooperation Administration (now the Mutual Security Agency). It should also list the information activities conducted by the military services in Japan and Austria and the psychological warfare program in Korea today.

THE CONTENT OF THE PROGRAM

This has been simply a bare-bones inventory of the facilities and media that we are using. The content of our output is, of course, the real test of the job that we are doing. The content—what we have to say—in the long run cannot be superior to the actions and decisions taken by the free nations themselves. The policies and actions of the American Government and the behavior of the American people constitute the hard core of any content or any message that we may carry through our different media. I am often asked what it is we are trying to say in our output.

To put it very briefly, we are trying to make people believe

(1) That Soviet communism is not the progressive revolutionary movement it pretends to be but a reactionary conspiracy that would, if it succeeded, re-create the Dark Ages.

(2) That the "true revolution" in human affairs is the inevitable spread of freedom and the equitable distribution of the spiritual and material benefits of freedom.

(3) That while this "true revolution" will inevitably triumph, it will triumph in our lifetime only if all peoples resolutely and cooperatively resist the Communist conspiracy.

(4) That the United States, which since 1776 has given this "true revolution" its greatest impetus, is a strong, determined, and enlightened power which champions this concept of freedom not only for its own people but for all peoples.

(5) That it is in the self-interest of all peoples to cooperate with the United States in pursuit of this common goal.

(6) That this cooperation is gradually, often painfully, materializing, with a consequent increase in unity, confidence, and determination.

Are we making progress in the achievement of our objectives?

I can state categorically that we are. America's message is getting across, and it is getting results. At the same time, however, I want to stress the fact that there is no such thing as a clear-cut, black-versus-white test of progress. There are too many intangibles. It is exceedingly difficult to measure the opinions and reactions of our own countrymen. It is a good deal more difficult to do the same for peoples of other countries and other cultures.

We do have a number of concrete indications of our effectiveness. And those indications are steadily increasing.

AUDIENCE REACTION

Take the question of audience mail. The Voice of America alone—our radio operation—gets an average of a thousand letters a day. Mail has increased three-fold since 1949. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, the letters we receive either give us a pat on the back and urge us to expand our efforts or urgently request a copy of our program schedule booklet. In 1951, we sent out almost six million schedule booklets (5,751,529).

A lot of these audience letters come by air mail from such faraway places as India, where airmail stamps are a pretty expensive proposition.

In crucial pressure areas—areas where the free world and the Soviet sphere are in immediate contact—considerable progress has been made in building up our audience at Soviet expense. For example, in West Berlin, once the exclusive preserve of Soviet radio, 98 percent of the radio listeners are regular Voice of America patrons. One out of every 25 Swedish radio listeners tunes in on the Voice regularly.

Our record behind the Iron Curtain is real cause for confidence. Nine out of every 10 radio listeners in the Soviet zone of Germany listen to our radio broadcasts.

At Naples, a woman recently sewed together a ticket for a showing of an American film—a ticket which her pro-Communist husband had ripped to shreds.

At Helsinki, Finland, one of our films was shown in competition with an important Communist party meeting. Several party functionaries preferred to see the movie rather than attend the meeting.

In Yugoslavia, a film in which President Truman defines American foreign policy has been borrowed twice by the central committee of the Communist Party.

In Burma (Kachin), the people have gone to great lengths to get our films to their villages. Often, our trucks are stopped by the dense undergrowth. The villagers have then volunteered to carry heavy movie projectors, generators, and other equipment on poles slung over their shoulders.

PRESS CAMPAIGN

Our record in the press-materials field indicates a good measure of progress as well.

A specific example of how a well-thought-out press campaign can get concrete results comes to us from Italy, where our people made excellent use of the twelfth anniversary of the infamous Molotov-Ribbentrop pact of 1939.¹ We distributed a series of feature articles on the pact well in advance. When the anniversary arrived, virtually every non-Communist paper in the country carried something on the treaty.

What efforts are being made to prevent our messages from reaching the audience?

An important measure of the effectiveness of our over-all informational program lies in the lengths to which the Communists have been going to insulate the peoples under their control against our propaganda. Some of the things being done to keep the people behind the Iron and Bamboo Curtains from seeing, hearing, or reading our informational materials are almost inconceivable.

The Soviet Union has been engaged in a tremendous jamming campaign ever since the Voice of America began broadcasting. The Soviets now have over 2,000 stations engaged in nothing but jamming—in trying to keep us from being heard. Between 5,000 and 10,000 technicians man these jamming stations.

We are told that the Soviets and their satellites spend almost as much on jamming as we do on our entire international radio program.

The so-called "defense of peace" law enacted in virtually all satellite countries is another means toward the same end—keeping America from putting its case before the enslaved peoples. Coercion is the underlying theme here. The Czech "defense of peace" law of December 1950 is typical of such gag laws. It subjects a person caught spreading "warmongering news or propaganda by word of mouth" to from 1 to 10 years in prison. Deciphering the Communist double talk, that law means that any person caught repeating what he hears er the Voice of America or the BBC, or what he reads in a non-communist publication, can be summarily jailed.

The licensing and taxation of all persons in possession of radio equipment are common practices in the Soviet satellite areas. In Rumania, among other places, every known possessor of a radio is under constant scrutiny.

Recently, the Communists have taken to turning off the electric current in towns and villages during the hours when American broadcasts are coming through. We have had such reports from Bulgaria and Lithuania among other places.

Perhaps one of the best evidences of our effectiveness lies in the denigrated tirades against our informational media which appear in the communist press and in speeches by Communist leaders. Few weeks pass in which Pravda does not complain about the Voice of America or seek to impress its readers with the "fact" that lending ear to our broadcasts is a most dangerous and unpatriotic practice.

DEFECTORS

One of our best sources of information as to how people behind the Iron Curtain are reacting is the defector. And there has been a flood of defectors from Soviet-controlled Europe during the past several years. We recognize, of course, that the average defector is under great emotional strain and that many tend to overstate their case.

But we have checked the stories of defectors very closely. Further, we have discovered that a considerable area of agreement exists among the many accounts which we have received from such people.

We have learned, among other things, that a great percentage of the soldiers of the Red army in Soviet-controlled Germany listen to our broadcasts. We have learned that even the political commissars—the officers charged with seeing to it that soldiers are properly oriented—listen to the Voice.

We have learned that it is becoming an increasingly common practice to scrawl the wave-lengths of American broadcasts across fences and on sidewalks in the Baltic and other Sovietized areas.

COMMERCIAL SURVEYS

In France we made surveys in 1948 and in 1950 by the Gallup poll organization. We found in those years that our audience has increased in France from 16 to 24 percent of the adult population of the country; that there are 7,000,000 people in France who listen to the Voice of America at least occasionally; and that every weekday we can expect an audience of 1,000,000 people which expands to between 2,000,000 and 3,000,000 people every Sunday. Half of the adult population of France has heard of the Voice of America programs. Our problem, we know from that survey, is to get more and more of them coming to their receivers.

The analysis of the audience shows that, generally speaking, our listeners include a high proportion of the better educated and urban residents.

In Germany, public opinion surveys made under the supervision of the High Commissioner's office show that in the same couple of years we have increased our audience in the U.S. zone of Germany from 4,000,000 to 6,000,000 people.

The same sort of survey showed us that in Sweden we have an occasional audience for our English-language program of 15 percent of the total population, over 700,000 people, and that we have a regular audience for our English-language program of about 100,000, who are weighted on the side of public opinion leaders and of youths.

SPECIAL PROBLEMS OF U.S. PROPAGANDA IN THE FUTURE

I have taken you on a rapid and cursory inspection of what we are doing in the Campaign of Truth. A more leisurely and thorough survey would include more details on such subjects as the building up of an integrated organization at the highest levels of Government (the Psychological Strategy Board) for the coordination of our psychological strategy and the complementary work of the Psychological Operations Committee for the coordination of our overseas information operations; it would include some remarks on what we are doing in the research and planning fields.

Above all, no one of us is fooled into thinking that the job being done by the Government's International Information Administration—or by all agencies of Government combined—constitutes more than a fraction of the impact of the United States and the American people on peoples abroad. We know that there are many voices of America—the GI abroad in his attitude and daily conduct, the tourist, the businessman, the American newspapers, magazines, and motion pictures, the statements of the President and of congressional leaders—all of these and many more are the voices of America.

One of the most significant developments of the past 2 years has been the increasing cooperation of private enterprise in this country in every form and variety with the overseas information programs of the Government. We have a special staff exclusively devoted to working with private enterprise which has been forced, because of the great expansion of its activity, to open offices not only at Washington and New York but at San Francisco, New Orleans, Houston, Chicago, and other points in the United States. What kind of things do they help stimulate and develop? Publishers of various American magazines have agreed that their overseas newsstand returns be given without cost to U.S. offices abroad for appropriate distribution; the "letters from America" campaign sponsored by the Common Council for American Unity; affiliations between towns and cities in the United States and their counterparts abroad; encouraging private production of a leaflet to be placed in the hands of all Americans traveling abroad with some Do's and Don'ts; helping to see that positive and affirmative content is included in advertising campaigns conducted abroad by American firms; bringing newspaper editors and reporters to this country to work on American papers for short periods, etc.

Of course I should mention a very important project of private enterprise—Radio Free Europe. The Voice of America and Radio Free Europe (RFE) are two members of the great free-world team that fighting Soviet imperialism on the side of personal and national freedom throughout the world. Radio Free Europe, financed by private citizens through individual contributions to the Crusade for freedom, is an enterprise concentrating on the captive countries behind the Iron Curtain: Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, and Albania. It is a citizen's station over which Poles are able to speak to Poles, Hungarians to Hungarians, etc. They speak as "The Voice of Free Poland," "The Voice of Free Hungary," and so on. They look at their peoples' problems through their own eyes.

In contrast the Voice of America is a worldwide network financed by U. S. Government funds and speaking for the U. S. Government and the American people. It sees world problems largely through American eyes. It is the only American voice heard in the Soviet Union and in many other parts of the globe. In the area behind the Iron Curtain, in which both VOA and RFE operate, their aims are essentially the same: to keep alive the hope of liberation; to let listeners know that they have not been forgotten; to stiffen their resistance against their Communist oppressors; to expose the lies of their oppressors and the unworkability of communism. Both expose the fraudulent basis of authority on which the Moscow-dominated regimes rest. Both combat communism and the persecution of religion and denial of human rights. Both report the superior industrial power and fighting potential of the free world over the Soviet enslaved world.

VOA, which has responsibility for full reporting of official American facts and documents, American news, and world developments, cannot devote the major part of its Iron Curtain broadcasts to events inside those countries. RFE, giving less time to events outside those countries, specializes in three types of broadcasts. (1) RFE reports back all truth that can be learned about what is going on in the listeners' own country; (2) RFE spreads fear in the ranks of the Communist officials of the regime by denouncing and threatening with retribution all evil doers about whom it can obtain accurate information, including reports on dissolute private life and instances of personal cruelty and criminal acts; (3) RFE weans Communist youth workers and intellectuals from allegiance to the Moscow-dominated regime.

I was interested to see that Gordon Dean, the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, is quoted as saying in a recent interview that he regards the job he and his colleagues are doing as "the second most important task in the world that we have here at the Commission. The first, I think, is somehow or other to pierce the Iron Curtain and let the ordinary Russian know our real, and peaceful intentions."

Mr. Dean's remarks fit rather interestingly with the statement made by General Eisenhower in July 1950 in his testimony on Senate Resolution 243¹ when he said that "Truth, in my opinion, could almost be classified as our T-bomb, if you want to call it that, in this warfare. . . . It is a terrific responsibility to decide how much to do, where it would be better to divert a dollar into a tank, and where it is better to put a dollar into this information effort. But I am quite certain of one thing: that you could find no soldier, no man of experience in the business of fighting, . . . who would decry for one second the importance of morale, and if you do not have morale you know you cannot win. There is just not enough to win without morale. I believe that can be done by truth."

7. REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 8 OF 1953 ESTABLISHING THE UNITED STATES INFORMATION AGENCY, JUNE 1, 1953¹

UNITED STATES INFORMATION AGENCY

Section 1. Establishment of agency.—(a) There is hereby established a new agency which shall be known as the United States Information Agency, hereinafter referred to as the Agency.

(b) There shall be at the head of the Agency a Director of the United States Information Agency, hereinafter referred to as the Director. The Director shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and shall receive compensation at the rate of $17,500 a year. The Secretary of State shall advise with the President concerning the appointment and tenure of the Director.

(c) There shall be in the Agency a Deputy Director of the United States Information Agency, who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall receive compensation at the rate of $16,000 a year. The Deputy Director shall perform such functions as the Director shall from time to time designate, and shall act as Director during the absence or disability of the Director or in the event of a vacancy in the office of the Director.

(d) There are hereby established in the Agency so many new offices, not in excess of fifteen existing at any one time, and with such title or titles, as the Director shall from time to time determine. Appointment thereto shall be under the classified civil service and the compensation thereof shall be fixed from time to time pursuant to the classification laws, as now or hereafter amended, except that the compensation may be fixed without regard to the numerical limitations on positions set forth in section 505 of the Classification Act of 1949, as amended (5 U. S. C. 1105).

Sec. 2. Transfer of functions.—(a) Subject to subsection (c) of this section, there are hereby transferred to the Director, (1) the functions vested in the Secretary of State by Title V of the United States Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948,² as amended, and so much of functions with respect to the interchange of books and periodicals and aid to libraries and community centers under sections 202 and 203 of the said Act as is an integral part of information programs under that Act, together with so much of the functions vested in the Secretary of State by other provisions of the said Act as is incidental to or is necessary for the performance of the functions under Title V and sections 202 and 203 transferred by this section, and (2) functions of the Secretary of State with respect to information programs relating to Germany and Austria.¹

(b) Exclusive of so much thereof as is an integral part of economic or technical assistance programs, without regard to any inconsistent provision of Reorganization Plan No. 7 of 1953,² and subject to subsection (c) of this section, functions with respect to foreign information programs vested by the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended,³ in the Director for Mutual Security provided for in section 501 of the said Act are hereby transferred to the Director.

(c) (1) The Secretary of State shall direct the policy and control the content of a program, for use abroad, on official United States positions, including interpretations of current events, identified as official positions by an exclusive descriptive label.

(2) The Secretary of State shall continue to provide to the Director on a current basis full guidance concerning the foreign policy of the United States.

(3) Nothing herein shall affect the functions of the Secretary of State with respect to conducting negotiations with other governments.

(d) To the extent the President deems it necessary in order to carry out the functions transferred by the foregoing provisions of this section, he may authorize the Director to exercise, in relation to the respective functions so transferred, any authority or part thereof available by law, including appropriation acts, to the Secretary of State, the Director for Mutual Security, or the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration, in respect of the said transferred functions.

Sec. 3. Performance of transferred functions.—(a) The Director may from time to time make such provisions as he shall deem appropriate authorizing the performance of any function of the Director by any other officer, or by any employee or organizational entity, of the Agency.

(b) Representatives of the United States carrying out the functions transferred by section 2 hereof in each foreign country shall be subject to such procedures as the President may prescribe to assure coordination among such representatives in each country under the leadership of the Chief of the United States Diplomatic Mission.

¹ The President's message to Congress of June 1, 1953, stated: ". . . While divesting the Department of State of the foreign information programs, the reorganization plan does not transfer the responsibility of that Department for the educational exchange programs authorized by the various acts of Congress. Close coordination of our information and educational exchange programs, will, of course, be effected by the Secretary of State and the Director of the United States Information Agency" (Department of State Bulletin, June 15, 1953, p. 851).

Sec. 4. Incidental transfers.—(a) So much of the personnel, property, records, and unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, and other funds, employed, used, held, available, or to be made available in connection with the functions transferred or vested by this reorganization plan as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall determine shall be transferred to the Agency at such time or times as he shall direct.

(b) Such further measures and dispositions as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall deem to be necessary in order to effectuate the transfers provided for in subsection (a) of this section shall be carried out in such manner as he shall direct and by such agencies as he shall designate.

Sec. 5. Interim provisions.—Pending the initial appointment under section 1 of this reorganization plan of the Director and Deputy Director, respectively, therein provided for, their functions shall be performed temporarily, but not for a period in excess of 60 days, by such officers of the Department of State or the Mutual Security Agency as the President shall designate.

8. ESTABLISHMENT OF THE OPERATIONS COORDINATING BOARD: Executive Order No. 10483, September 2, 1953¹

By virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and statutes, and as President of the United States, it is hereby ordered as follows:

SECTION 1. (a) In order to provide for the integrated implementation of national security policies by the several agencies, there is hereby established an Operations Coordinating Board, hereinafter referred to as the Board, which shall report to the National Security Council.

(b) The Board shall have as members the following: (1) the Under Secretary of State, who shall represent the Secretary of State and shall be the chairman of the Board, (2) the Deputy Secretary of Defense, who shall represent the Secretary of Defense, (3) the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration, (4) the Director of Central Intelligence, and (5) a representative of the President to be designated by the President. Each head of agency referred to in items (1) to (4), inclusive, in this section 1 (b) may provide for an alternate member who shall serve as a member of the Board in lieu of the regular member representing the agency concerned when such regular member is for reasons beyond his control unable to attend any meeting of the Board; and any alternate member shall while serving as such have in all respects the same status as a member of the Board as does the regular member in lieu of whom he serves.

(c) The head of any agency (other than any agency represented under section 1 (b) hereof) to which the President from time to time assigns responsibilities for the implementation of national security policies, shall assign a representative to serve on the Board when the Board is dealing with subjects bearing directly upon the responsibilities of such head. Each such representative shall be an Under Secretary or corresponding official and when so serving such representative shall have the same status on the Board as the members provided for in the said section 1 (b).

(d) The Special Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs may attend any meeting of the Board. The Director of the United States Information Agency shall advise the Board at its request.

SEC. 2. The National Security Council having recommended a national security policy and the President having approved it, the Board shall (1) whenever the President shall hereafter so direct, advise with the agencies concerned as to (a) their detailed operational planning responsibilities respecting such policy, (b) the coordination of the interdepartmental aspects of the detailed operation plans developed by the agencies to carry out such policy, (c) the timely and coordinated execution of such policy and plans, and (d) the execution of each security action or project so that it shall make its full contribution to the attainment of national security objectives and to the particular climate of opinion the United States is seeking to achieve in the world, and (2) initiate new proposals for action within the framework of national security policies in response to opportunity and changes in the situation. The Board shall perform such other advisory functions as the President may assign to it and shall from time to time make reports to the National Security Council with respect to the carrying out of this order.

SEC. 3. Consonant with law, each agency represented on the Board shall, as may be necessary for the purpose of effectuating this order, furnish assistance to the Board in accordance with section 214 of the Act of May 3, 1945, 59 Stat. 134 (31 U. S. C. 691). Such assistance may include detailing employees to the Board, one of whom may serve as its Executive Officer, to perform such functions, consistent with the purposes of this order, as the Board may assign to them.

SEC. 4. The Psychological Strategy Board¹ shall be abolished not later than sixty days after the date of this order and its outstanding affairs shall be wound up by the Operations Coordinating Board.

SEC. 5. As used herein, the word "agency" may be construed to mean any instrumentality of the executive branch of the Government, including any executive department.

SEC. 6. Nothing in this order shall be construed either to confer upon the Board any function with respect to internal security or to in any manner abrogate or restrict any function vested by law in, or assigned pursuant to law to, any agency or head of agency (including the Office of Defense Mobilization and the Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization).

9. OVERSEAS INFORMATION PROGRAM: Publication of the United States Information Agency, 1955 ¹

"It is not enough for us to have sound policies, dedicated to goals of universal peace, freedom and progress. These policies must be made known to and understood by all peoples throughout the world. This is the responsibility of the U.S. Information Agency."—DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

The President created the U.S. Information Agency on August 1, 1953, as an independent agency responsible for the Government's overseas information program.²

To carry out this responsibility, the Agency maintains 206 overseas information posts in 78 nations of the free world. To the captive millions behind the Iron and Bamboo Curtains, the Agency's powerful radio network, the Voice of America, daily beams objective news reports and commentaries giving the truth about U.S. policies and actions.

Four Major Tasks.—By means of press, publications, radio, television, motion pictures, exhibits, libraries and personal contacts, the U.S. Information Agency performs four major tasks:

- (1) Explains U.S. policies and objectives.
- (2) Counters hostile propaganda.
- (3) Demonstrates the harmony of U.S. policies with the legitimate aspirations of other peoples.
- (4) Presents abroad aspects of American life and culture which will promote understanding of U.S. policies and objectives.

The Director of the U.S. Information Agency reports to the President through the National Security Council. Daily foreign policy guidance is provided to the Agency by the Secretary of State.

Country Programs.—Known overseas as the U.S. Information Service (USIS), the Agency's information program in each foreign country is conducted by the Public Affairs Officer (PAO) working directly under the U.S. Ambassador or Chief of Mission. The PAO is assisted by a small professional staff headed by Americans but composed in large part of citizens of the country. Each country program is carefully tailored to the customs and interests of the people.

In Western Europe, parts of the Far East, and eight countries of Latin America, for instance, television plays an important role. In some less developed areas, mobile exhibits and bookmobiles are employed. In areas where the illiteracy rate is high, posters, comic books and cartoons are effective. The Voice of America's broadcasts are delivered in the appropriate languages and dialects of the listening audience. Program content is carefully selected and edited.

The PAO is the focal point for all operations in his area.

² See supra, doc. 7.

Press and Publications.—More than 10,000 newspapers and magazines in the free world, with an estimated circulation of more than a billion readers, regularly receive information material through the Agency's Press and Publication Service.

The Service sends by wireless a 7,000-word news file from Washington 6 days a week to USIS posts in 66 countries. The posts translate and adapt the file and furnish it immediately to local newspaper and radio editors. In addition to news, features and commentary, the wireless file includes full texts of important foreign policy statements by the President, the Secretary of State and other Government leaders.

Newspaper and magazine features, background kits on subjects of international interest, such as the peaceful use of atomic energy, as well as photographs and plastic plates, are also distributed for use in thousands of overseas publications. This includes 59 newspapers and magazines which are published abroad by the Agency itself.

The Service also provides cartoon strips and panels to many newspapers in foreign countries. Some of these strips appear in more than 940 newspapers in 65 countries, with a readership estimated at more than 100 million.

During an average year, about 150 million leaflets, pamphlets and posters are distributed throughout the free world.

Voice of America.—Broadcasting around the globe, 7 days a week, 24 hours a day, the Voice of America speaks in 39 languages, presenting more than 75 programs daily from its studios in Washington, as well as other programs from Munich, Germany. Voice broadcasts consist primarily of factual news and commentary. They are designed as a continuing, reliable source of truth to peoples overseas.

More than three-quarters of the daily program schedule of the Voice is directed over the Iron and Bamboo Curtains to the U.S.S.R., the satellite countries of Eastern Europe and Red China. More than 55 hours of programs daily are directed to the Soviet Union and the Communist areas of Eastern Europe. Twenty hours daily, programs are transmitted to peoples behind the Bamboo Curtain in three Chinese dialects, and in Korean and Vietnamese. To overcome Communist jamming, programs originating in Washington and Munich are recorded at overseas relay bases and repeated over short, medium and long wave. Many of the programs are repeated several times a day, on various wave lengths, at peak listening periods.

Letters from behind the Curtains and reports from escapees and defectors attest that Voice programs do get through, despite Red jamming.

Other Voice language programs, totaling 22 hours a day, are beamed to free world countries. In addition, English-speaking foreigners are served through seven daily half-hour, world-wide English programs.

Voice facilities include 14 modern broadcasting studios in Washington, a radio center in Munich, Germany, and Station RIAS in West Berlin. Million-watt transmitters are located at Munich, the Philippines and Okinawa. The Agency's floating transmitter, installed on the U.S. Coast Guard Cutter Courier—now anchored in the Mediterranean—relays programs to the Soviet Union and the Near East. The Voice's 30 transmitters in the United States are operated by private broadcasting companies.

Public tours of the Voice of America studios are conducted Mondays through Fridays. Studios are at 330 Independence Ave., S. W., Washington, D. C.

Newsreels and Feature Programs on TV Film.—These are provided weekly to 33 television stations in 22 countries of Europe, Latin America, the Far East and Africa. One weekly program, "The Magic of the Atom," documents U.S. progress in the peaceful use of atomic energy.

Motion Picture Service.—Films showing American life and supporting U.S. foreign policy, as well as pictures exposing international communism, are produced (or acquired) and distributed by the Agency's motion picture service. Some are sent abroad in as many as 39 languages. An increasing number are being produced overseas, with local backgrounds and actors. All films are based on the recommendations of overseas information officers, who know what will be effective in their particular areas.

Many of the pictures are shown in the commercial movie houses abroad, and all are shown noncommercially to selective audiences, including leaders of public opinion, government officials, business and labor leaders, professional, educational and civic groups.

The Agency operates 210 film libraries abroad. More than 6,000 16-mm. sound projectors are maintained for use by USIS personnel and for loan to groups and organizations.

To make film showings possible in remote areas, the Agency has 336 mobile units equipped to generate their own electric power. Concentrated largely in the Near East and Far East, these units provide many people with their only opportunity to see motion pictures. In many cases, films are the only means of reaching these people with the United States' message.

Information Centers and Exhibits.—The Agency's information centers are located in 67 countries. In Latin America, the centers are operated in co-operation with the local governments and are known as "binational centers." Each center includes a library. In addition, staffs of Americans and citizens of the country conduct lecture and concert programs, provide classes in English, arrange film showings, exhibits and special cultural events.

The centers provide direct contact with the people, and are an effective means of presenting U.S. culture to the world.

Through the use of traveling exhibits and bookmobiles, the information centers reach people in remote areas. Some exhibits are prepared especially for local, national or international fairs. Others are designed as traveling exhibits. Particularly effective have been the "Atoms for Peace" exhibits already seen by millions in Europe, Latin America and the Near East.

The Agency's book translation project, to date, has put into circulation overseas some 18 million books by U.S. authors. In addition.

about 4 million other U.S. books have been distributed to key individuals and institutions abroad.

American publishers and motion picture distributors are encouraged to sell U.S. publications and films abroad through the informational media guaranty program which assures the conversion into dollars of foreign currency receipts.

Office of Private Cooperation.—Through the work of the Agency's Office of Private Cooperation, private American groups, business firms, nonprofit organizations and individuals are encouraged to assist in carrying out the Government's overseas information program.

These private projects are varied and include: letterwriting, overseas advertising, mailing inserts, town affiliations, and collection of books and magazines for overseas distribution.

Communist Propaganda Expenditures.—The propaganda expenditures of Moscow and Peiping are variously estimated at from $1 billion to $3 billion yearly—roughly 10 to 30 times the amount the United States expends on its program of truth.

"The United States Government is in the international information field out of sheer necessity. It dare not pull out of this field any more than it would dare to pull out of military defense. Russia's military might is within her own boundary, but her propaganda might is on the loose in the world. We must do all in our power to thwart it, unmask its lies and pretenses, and break its hold over allegiances and loyalties of men."—United States Advisory Commission on Information

10. INTERNATIONAL EDUCATIONAL EXCHANGE PROGRAM: Publication of the Department of State (With Chart), March 1956¹

SCOPE.—The International Educational Exchange Program is principally concerned with strengthening our foreign relations through the interchange of persons between the United States and other countries. The program [which began in 1938 with a small number of exchangees from the other American republics] involves an annual interchange of about 6,000 people between the United States and over 70 countries of the free world.

PURPOSE.—The Congress of the United States has authorized this program "to promote a better understanding of the United States in other countries and to increase mutual understanding between the people of the United States and the people of other countries." Specifically, it seeks—

To build up a greater and more accurate store of knowledge and information about the United States in other countries, so that respect for and confidence in our aims and policies will be increased;

¹ International Educational Exchange Service, Facts About the International Educational Exchange Program (Department of State, March 1956). The accompanying chart was specially prepared for this volume by the International Educational Exchange Service.

To contribute to a better understanding in the United States of the way of life, the culture, and the aspirations of other people; and

To promote greater stability in international relationships by broadening the community of interests between the people of the United States and other free peoples and by increasing awareness of the common principles underlying a free and orderly society.

PARTICIPANTS.—The success of the program depends primarily on the careful choice of participants. Those selected are persons who, because of their background and experience at home and through their activities and contacts while abroad, can make a positive contribution to mutual understanding between us and the people of other countries.

About one-third of the participants each year are Americans who receive grants to go abroad to—

Do graduate study for a year at universities and other institutions of higher learning;

Teach for a year in elementary or secondary schools;

Lecture preferably for a year or at least a semester or carry on advanced (post-doctoral) research for six months to a year at universities and other institutions of higher learning; and

Serve as consultants at the invitation of foreign groups or lecture before general audiences on topics of current interest. These people often visit several countries and spend from three to six months overseas.

The other two-thirds of the people exchanged each year are nationals of other countries who receive grants to come to the United States to—

Study for a year at our colleges and universities. Most of these grantees are between the ages of 25 and 35, are already launched on their professional careers at home, and are studying at the graduate level in this country;

Teach for a year in our elementary or secondary schools;

Undertake six months of specialized study and observation of teaching methods at the elementary and secondary school level;

Lecture for a year or at least a semester or do advanced (post-doctoral) research for three months to a year at our colleges, universities and other institutions of higher learning;

Consult for three months with their American colleagues and become acquainted with the contemporary American scene; or Undertake three to six months of specialized training and observation in their field, often combined with actual on-the-job experience.

Grants are also made to young people in certain other countries to attend American schools abroad.

SPECIAL PROGRAMS.—In addition to the exchange of persons listed above, the International Educational Exchange Service is responsible for three other types of educational exchange activity—

The Cultural Presentations Program, financed by the President's Emergency Fund for International Affairs, provides limited assistance to outstanding American cultural and sports groups for tours abroad. These tours are building better understanding of and friendship for our country through the common language of music, art, and athletics. The program assistance supplements private financial support and the income received by professional groups for overseas commercial performances.

Books and scientific equipment to Finland and India are supplied under special legislative authority.

Assistance to American-sponsored schools in the other American Republics is also a special activity of the program.

EXCHANGE-VISITOR PROGRAMS.—The Smith-Mundt Act ¹ places in the Department of State responsibility for certifying exchange-visitor programs to facilitate entry of foreign nationals into the United States for educational activities which will further the purposes of that Act. In discharging this responsibility the Department must be assured that any program so designated does contribute, in a reasonably effective way, to the objectives of the Smith-Mundt Act.

Extensive and continuous assistance and guidance are given to the American sponsors requesting these designations so that their programs will measure up to required standards. Hospitals, medical schools, library groups, and industrial firms are among the groups which bring foreign nationals to this country for bona fide educational purposes. More than 2,100 exchange-visitor programs involving an estimated 30,000 visitors have been designated.

SIGNIFICANCE OF ACTIVITIES.—Whether grantees engage in study, teaching, research, or specialized observation and consultation, their activities, in addition to producing personal, professional benefits, serve the goals of the program in one or several of the following ways. Many of the activities which the program encourages are concerned with securing a clearer understanding of the life, institutions, and culture of Americans and their historical background. Among the activities are those which increase the knowledge overseas of our literature, language, history, and political and social institutions. Some spread information about characteristically American practices such as free public libraries or agricultural extension work. Others are specific skills of joint concern, for example, the peaceful uses of atomic energy. And specialized groups demonstrate American educational, artistic, and cultural achievement, for example, through performances abroad by outstanding musical, theater, and dance groups.

Of equal importance are those activities which help us to develop and broaden our knowledge of the life, institutions, and culture of other areas of the world. These include grants to foreign professors to teach at American colleges and universities, to the staffs of these institutions to do research abroad, and the interchange of graduate students. It likewise includes the work of many Americans whose study and research abroad enlarge the corps of experts needed for many types of overseas service and enrich our educational curriculum.

Still other activities draw their primary significance from the special role which the participants play in their home countries, for example, the visits to the United States of members of national legislatures, trade union officials, top newsmen, or leaders of youth groups. Others concentrate primarily on the establishment and strengthening of contacts in significant institutions overseas or between institutions and organizations in the United States and those in other countries. Finally, some activities are designed to complement the work of other United States Government agencies, private organizations or international bodies of which the United States is a member. In this group, for example, would fall certain social science projects which undergird some of the technical assistance programs of the International Cooperation Administration.

In going about their educational work and in their everyday living, the participants reflect in their views, behavior, and services the ways of life and attitudes of their own countries. They may also informally present such matters in discussions, lectures, or published writings. All of the participants, when they return home, interpret their experience to their fellow-countrymen in terms which they can best understand. The informal give and take of such discussions make these contacts a highly effective form of communication.

METHOD OF OPERATION: The Role of Advisory Groups.—Two public boards, appointed by the President, have been designated by the Congress to advise and assist the Department in the administration of the educational exchange program.

The United States Advisory Commission on Educational Exchange was established by provision of the Smith-Mundt Act and is responsible for formulating and recommending to the Secretary of State policies and programs.

The Board of Foreign Scholarships is responsible for supervising the operations of and for selecting individuals and educational institutions qualified to participate in the program authorized by the Fulbright Act.

The Role of the Department.—The International Educational Exchange Service functions under the general supervision of the Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs. This Service, headed by a Director, is organized into two principal parts: Staffs for planning, orting on, and evaluating the substantive program, an operations ff for the Board of Foreign Scholarships, and a staff to provide cessary administrative services and facilities; and five operating isions which conduct the programs for both American and foreign ntees and which provide special services necessary to educational change activities.

Four reception centers are operated by the Department at New rk, Miami, New Orleans, and San Francisco to handle arrivals of oming participants in the program. These centers arrange to et grantees at docks and airports and assist with hotel accommoda- ns and internal travel in the United States. Local programs for itors are also often arranged and carried out by reception center rsonnel working with community groups. These local programs quently supplement the regular activities of a grantee who may be r transit through the city where the center is located.

Participation of Other Agencies.—The Smith-Mundt Act recog- ized the diverse nature of the operations necessary to conduct an ternational educational exchange program and provided for the aximum use by the Department of the services and facilities of other overnment agencies and of private groups. Contracts are made a continuing basis with certain of these agencies for the services eded. Short-term arrangements are also made with many others r handling evaluation studies and for particular programs involving eign specialists.

Three agencies assist in the screening of American candidates and e placement and supervision of foreign grantees.

The Institute of International Education: for persons studying in educational institutions.

The U.S. Office of Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare: for persons teaching in elementary or secondary schools, or undertaking specialized study and obser- vation of teaching methods.

The Conference Board of Associated Research Councils: for persons engaging in university teaching or post-doctoral research.

Three agencies assist in arranging programs in this country for reigen grantees who come to the United States for short periods to on- sult with their colleagues.

The Governmental Affairs Institute: for those primarily in- terested in public administration and government.

The Department of Labor: for those primarily interested in labor and industry.

The American Council on Education: for those primarily in- terested in education and related fields.

Practically all federal agencies assist in the selection of foreign specialists and arrange programs for them in the United States.

The American Council on Education also provides orientation for certain foreign grantees at the Washington International Center, and professional assistance to American-sponsored schools in the other American Republics.

The American Language Center of American University, Washington, D. C., provides English-refresher courses for foreign grantees who have special needs for short periods for intensive study in speaking and understanding English.

In addition a large number of organizations and institutions voluntarily assist the program in many ways. Screening committees composed of persons from many professional and other occupations give of their time extensively in recommending American candidates from the thousands of applications submitted. Each year financial assistance estimated at between $8 and $10 million is contributed from non-U.S. Government sources as tuition, maintenance, and other stipends. Other services, not easily measurable in terms of dollars, are the hospitality and program assistance given to foreign visitors by civic groups, community and professional organizations, and literally thousands of individual Americans.

Overseas Administration.—The administration of the program overseas, under the supervision of the Foreign Service establishments, is carried out through contractual arrangements with the United States Information Agency. In those countries participating under the Fulbright Act, binational Educational Commissions, established by Executive Agreement with each country, play a large part in supervising and administering the program. Binational selection committees help in preliminary screening of student applications in most of the countries where educational exchange programs are conducted; Ministries of Education also aid in announcing opportunities for teachers and in recommending candidates; and other agencies of local governments cooperate in similar fashion.

COOPERATION WITH OTHER PROGRAMS.—The many agencies, organizations, and institutions conducting educational exchange programs find that greater effectiveness can be achieved through the reciprocal services they give each other.

Thus, the Department assists groups and individuals and foreign governments in carrying out programs in which the objectives are similar to ours. Each year from 400 to 700 projects for these groups involving more than 6,500 exchanges are facilitated by the Department.

The assistance given involves such services as (1) arranging with Foreign Service posts to announce American exchange opportunities, to receive applications, and to assist in selecting candidates; (2) guidance in planning exchange projects; (3) providing professional and community contacts in the United States for foreign visitors; and (4) cooperating with Foreign Service posts to facilitate tours abroad of American groups and individuals.

Assistance to the fellowship programs of the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration and to some of the specialized agencies of the United Nations is also given. Such help usually includes aring placement for persons coming to the United States for practical training and experience.

Similar assistance has been given to the NATO Cultural Council. Selection procedures for American candidates under the NATO fellow-ship program have recently been established. Increased support to NATO has resulted from the fact that, since 1952, the Department has brought groups of outstanding newsmen and cultural leaders from the NATO countries to the United States under its own program.

EFFECTIVENESS.—Several major sources of information provide evidence that the program has been successful in fulfilling its purpose. These include accounts of personal experience, appraisals by responsible officers and private citizens, and evaluation studies by private research organizations.

The grantees themselves emphasize specific activities and accomplishments. Their reports reflect rich personal insights and gains both in knowledge and understanding. They also reveal a sense of individual responsibility for continuing to improve international understanding.

Responsible public officials and private citizens observe the program in operation around the world and at home and make careful appraisals. These appraisals provide information that goes beyond the experience of the grantee and provide more general evidence of program results. Their reports tell of the effects of educational exchange—how new knowledge, ideas, and skills are employed when grantees return home; how the grantees write books and articles and lecture on their exchange activities; how American studies courses in foreign universities and area studies in American universities are strengthened; and how returned grantees take an active part in "alumni associations" and other groups through which they keep in touch with America.

Private research organizations, employing a variety of social science techniques, make objective evaluations of program results. These studies have compared groups of returned grantees with those who have not had such experience; they have studied the grantees in "before and after" settings.

The studies concerning returned American grantees illustrate wider knowledge and appreciation of other cultures and international problems, and certain personal accomplishments accruing to them as individuals.

Studies of foreign grantees show that firsthand observation of America helps to correct their unrealistic and often unfavorable views of us; that they gain more accurate knowledge of American culture, American achievements in many fields, and of general conditions in the United States; that when they return home they share their experience not only with their friends and associates but with the general public through lectures, articles, radio, etc.; that their compatriots consider them among the most reliable sources of information about the United States.

AUTHORITY.—There are several legislative authorities under which funds for conducting the international educational exchange program of the Department are made available. Dollar funds appropriated annually by the Congress under the provisions of the Smith-Mundt Act are used jointly with foreign currencies available under provisions of the Fulbright Act in the interest of economical administration and to expand the scope of the program.

The United States Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948, Public Law 402, 80th Congress (also known as the Smith-Mundt Act),¹ provides the basic authority for reciprocal educational exchange programs between the United States and other countries and authorizes the annual appropriations by the United States Congress.

An Act for Cooperation with the Other American Republics, Public Law 355, 76th Congress,² provides for the annual exchange of graduate students between the United States and the 20 other American Republics under the terms of the Convention for the Promotion of Inter-American Cultural Relations. Appropriations for this phase of the program are made under the general authority of the Smith-Mundt Act.

Public Law 584, 79th Congress (also known as the Fulbright Act)³ provides that certain foreign currencies owed to or owned by the United States as a result of surplus property sales abroad may be used to finance exchanges between the United States and certain foreign countries for study, teaching, lecturing, or advanced research, or other educational activities. Pursuant to this legislation, Executive Agreements are negotiated with individual countries to provide for educational exchange programs. No appropriations are authorized under this Act.

The Mutual Security Act of 1952, Public Law 400, 82d Congress,⁴ amended the Fulbright Act by providing for the use for educational exchange of foreign currency credits owed to or owned by the United States and not required by law or agreement to be expended or used for any other purposes.

The Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, Public Law 480, 83d Congress,⁵ authorizes proceeds from the sale of surplus agricultural commodities for educational exchange programs established under other legislative authorizations.

The Finnish Educational Exchange Act, Public Law 265, 81st Congress,¹ provides that part of the annual payment of Finland's World War I debt to the United States may be used for educational exchanges between the two countries. The contractual costs of this program must be financed by appropriations under the Smith-Mundt Act.

The India Emergency Food Aid Act of 1951, Public Law 48, 82d Congress,² authorizes the use of certain sums, payable by the Government of India to the United States as interest on the emergency food relief loan, for educational exchanges between the two countries. Public Law 701, 79th Congress,³ authorizes the instruction at the United States Merchant Marine Academy of citizens from the other American Republics.

1. THE TABLE above should be used with certain explanations and interpretations. Although the dates given are 1949 through 1955, the program was not in operation in all of the countries for the whole period. The table, as given, includes grants awarded under the Fulbright Act (P.L. 584, 79th Cong., 2d sess., Aug. 1, 1946; A Decade of American Foreign Policy, pp. 1235-1236) as well as those under the United States Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948 (P.L. 402, 80th Cong., 2d sess., Jan. 27, 1948; ibid., pp. 1224-1234) and other legislative authority. For a special listing of grants awarded under the Fulbright Act, see Swords Into Plowshares—A New Venture in International Understanding: The Story of the Educational Exchange Program Authorized by the Fulbright Act of 1948 (Department of State publication 6344; 1956), Appendix 1, p. 47.

In addition to the totals given in the table, there were, for the period 1939-1948, 5,481 exchanges which are not listed by country. These exchanges were principally with the other American Republics under the provisions of P.L. 355 of the 76th Congress, 1st session (approved Aug. 9, 1939; 53 Stat. 1290) which implements the Convention for the promotion of Inter-American Cultural Relations signed at Buenos Aires, Dec. 23, 1936 (Treaty Series 928; 51 Stat. 178). These include grants to Americans as follows: 142 students, 220 research scholars, 1 teacher, and 641 specialists. The following grants were awarded to nationals of other countries during this period: 1,807 students, 30 research scholars, 140 teachers, and 2,481 leaders and specialists, of whom more than 500 were trainees from the Philippines under the Philippine Rehabilitation Act (P.L. 370, 79th Cong., 2d sess., approved Apr. 30, 1946; 60 Stat. 128). In some instances these early figures were estimated totals.

During the period 1949-1955 emergency aid grants were given, following the withdrawal of the Government of China to Taiwan, to 3,641 Chinese nationals to enable them to complete educational projects. Of these grantees, 3,498 were students already in the United States, 104 were teachers and research scholars, and 39 were Chinese students and scholars from other areas of the Far East who were brought to the United States under provisions of the legislation. For the details of this program, see Program of Emergency Aid to Chinese Students (Department of State publication 6343; 1956). Sixty-one Korean students were also given assistance under this program.

2. Belgium and Luxembourg were combined under Belgium for 1949 and 1950.

3. Laos, Cambodia, and Viet-Nam were grouped under Indochina for the years 1950, 1951, and 1953. Figures in this table were included under Viet-Nam for those years.

Part XX

ORGANIZATION AND SPECIAL RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND THE FOREIGN SERVICE

Organization

[FOREIGN SERVICE ACT OF 1946: Public Law 724 (79th Congress, 2d Session), August 13, 1946] ¹

1. IMPLEMENTATION OF THE ROWE-RAMSPECK-DeCOURCY COMMITTEE'S RECOMMENDATIONS: Directive of the Department of State for the Improvement of Personnel Systems and Personnel Management of the Departmental and Foreign Services, April 16, 1951 ²

A. GENERAL EXPLANATION

This is a directive to improve the personnel systems and personnel management of the Departmental and Foreign Services. The course of action outlined below stems from the findings and recommendations of the Secretary's Advisory Committee on Personnel.³ This course of action is designed to improve personnel management primarily by administrative adjustments. It is consistent with the objectives advocated by the Advisory Committee but does not at this time go as far as the program recommended by the Committee.

B. PRINCIPAL OBJECTIVES AND BASIC APPROACH

The principal objectives of this directive are to—

1. Obtain, develop, and maintain an experienced and versatile career service capable of meeting the present and future needs of the Department and the Foreign Service of the United States in the conduct of foreign affairs and to provide means for quickly supplementing this staff whenever conditions require temporary or permanent expansion of personnel.

² An Analysis of the Personnel Improvement Plan of the Department of State, (House Foreign Affairs Committee Print, 82d Cong., 1st sess.), pp. 1-6.

³ For the text of the report to the Secretary of State by the Secretary's Advisory Committee on Personnel, see ibid., pp. 19-67. The members of this committee were James H. Rowe, Jr., Robert Ramspeck, and William E. DeCourcy.

2. Make maximum use of the skills and abilities of Departmental and Foreign Service personnel and broaden the range of their usefulness through training and developmental programs.

3. Eliminate inequities in the treatment of certain categories of Foreign Service employees.

4. Increase through voluntary means the flexible use of domestic and Foreign Service personnel interchangeably between overseas and domestic assignments, including a greater interchange with other Government agencies concerned with foreign affairs and increased utilization in the Foreign Service of qualified persons not now in the Government by means of lateral appointment to the Foreign Service Reserve.

5. Establish and maintain uniformly high standards in all phases of personnel management.

These objectives should be accomplished basically by administrative adjustments under the present Foreign Service Act of 1946¹ and in the Departmental personnel system, supplemented by legislative measures. The administration of the Foreign Service Act of 1946 should be adjusted so as to supply a substantially increased number of trained and experienced officers for present and future needs of the Government in the conduct of foreign affairs. Concurrently, the administration of the Departmental personnel system should give particular emphasis to developing a larger staff of persons willing and qualified to serve at home and abroad.

Achievement of these objectives will provide an informed basis for possible further integration in the future of the Departmental and Foreign Services under an improved personnel career system and for utilizing this system for staffing additional civilian overseas activities of the United States Government.

C. ASSIGNMENT OF RESPONSIBILITY

The Director of Personnel is hereby authorized and directed to develop and recommend to the Deputy Under Secretary for Administration implementing instructions and drafts of legislation and to take such other action within established delegations of authority as is necessary to accomplish the action steps outlined below. Policy and procedural changes affecting the Foreign Service will be submitted to the Board of the Foreign Service.

D. SPECIFIC IMPROVEMENT STEPS

The steps set forth below should be taken without delay to improve and strengthen the personnel management of the Departmental and Foreign Services.

1. Estimate of personnel requirements

Subject to the limitations imposed by a state of national emergency of indefinite duration, the types, levels, and numbers of personnel that will be required by the Department of State and the unified Foreign Service of the United States for the conduct of foreign affairs of the Government should be estimated for each of the next five years and for a longer period if practicable. This estimate should be used as a general guide in developing both short- and long-range programs for recruitment, training, promotion, and assignment of Departmental and Foreign Service personnel.

2. Exchange program

The scope of the present exchange program should be stepped up for an indefinite period with particular reference to: (1) the inclusion on a voluntary basis of Departmental employees occupying positions in which overseas experience is essential or desirable and, (2) the inclusion on a voluntary basis of employees of other agencies in numbers adequate to meet the needs of such agencies. As a consequence, there should be an increase in the number of assignments of Foreign Service personnel to the Department and to other agencies.

The performance records of participants in this program should adequately recognize the added experience acquired by all such officers.

3. Recruitment

More vigorous and far-reaching recruitment efforts should be undertaken both for the Departmental and Foreign Services, using as a basis the projection of personnel needs referred to in item A. In recruiting persons for positions in the Department for which dual service at home and abroad is desirable, efforts should be made to employ persons who are qualified and willing to serve abroad.

Departmental and Foreign Service recruitment activities should be closely coordinated and to the extent possible recruitment standards should be devised for types of work common to the two services.

4. Separation of unfit employees

Departmental and Foreign Service employees whose records clearly indicate that, after an adequate opportunity, they are incapable of meeting performance requirements should be separated. Full use should be made of the probationary period in this connection.

5. Additional improvements in Foreign Service personnel management

(a) Complexion and use of personnel categories.—Appointments to the Foreign Service and subsequent assignments and use of personnel should be made in accordance with the following:

The Foreign Service Staff category should be sharply reorganized in line with the intent of the Foreign Service Act of 1946 and in accordance with the recommendations of the Advisory Committee concerning the functions of a clerical and technical branch. As a consequence the Staff category should be used primarily to perform technical, technical-administrative, clerical, and other closely related functions. Both permanent and temporary appointments may be made to the Staff category as the needs of the Service require.

The Foreign Service Reserve category should be sharply redefined so that it is in fact the temporary-appointment vehicle for supplementing the Foreign Service officer category. In this connection the Foreign Service Act of 1946 should be amended to extend the period of service of a Reserve officer from four to five years. The Reserve category should be used to perform work which the Foreign Service officer category is insufficiently staffed to handle; to carry out special projects or programs of a temporary or emergency nature; to help in the initial staffing of new or expanded programs of a continuing nature; for the present exchange program; and as a means of enabling other agencies to temporarily assign personnel to the Service under a positive interagency exchange program to be worked out with those agencies. Concurrently, the Reserve category should not be used to staff activities normally performed by the Foreign Service Staff category.

In keeping with the Foreign Service Act of 1946, the Foreign Service officer category should be built to the strength necessary and used as the vehicle for staffing those executive and professional functions of a continuing nature which the Advisory Committee recommended be staffed by a Foreign Affairs officer branch.

(b) Expansion of the Foreign Service officer category.—The appointment of class 6 Foreign Service officers should be substantially increased to support the larger corps of Foreign Service officers.

Lateral entry into the Foreign Service officer category should be substantially increased in accord with the provisions of section 517 of the Foreign Service Act of 1946 but by the following liberalized measures:

(1) The present percentage limitations on the number of vacancies that can be filled by lateral entry should be removed for the next three years. (The number of vacancies to be established should take into account such additional needs for Foreign Service officers as may be required by the Government generally and for which the requisite funds can be secured.)

(2) Positive efforts should be made to induce qualified Departmental and Foreign Service Reserve and Staff personnel to compete for appointment under section 517.

(3) For each person appointed as a Foreign Service officer under section 517, a corresponding increase should be made in the authorized strength of the FSO category so as to assure maintenance of adequate promotional opportunities for Foreign Service officers presently employed.

(4) Candidates appointed as Foreign Service officers under these provisions should meet a standard with respect to experience, performance, and other evidences of qualifications which, in the aggregate, is comparable to the average of the Foreign Service officer class to which appointment is made.

(5) Section 413 (b) of the Foreign Service Act of 1946 should be amended to permit persons appointed as a Foreign Service officer to receive salary at any one of the rates provided for the class to which they are appointed.

(c) Curtailment of Staff officer appointments.—There should be a gradual curtailment in the appointment of permanent Foreign Service Staff officers for work which should be performed by Foreign Service officers or Foreign Service Reserve officers. This should be accomplished as rapidly as the other categories can be expanded to meet normal replacement needs; but without prejudicing compelling or emergency requirements for staffing expanded program activities of a continuing nature.

(d) Examination and selection.—Assure that the methods of examination and selection of personnel for all levels and all categories are consistent with the needs of the Department and the unified Foreign Service. In filling positions in labor, agriculture, and commercial categories, the qualifications standards to be applied will be developed in consultation with the member agencies of competence.

(e) Assignment.—Improved methods should be devised for the assignment, development, and utilization of personnel, including provisions for more realistic post complements and, to the extent practicable, elimination of excessively short tours of duty at any post.

As soon as additional qualified staff are available, increased use should be made of Foreign Service personnel in staffing special missions and programs in the foreign-affairs field and delegations to international organizations.

(f) Training.—Present training programs and efforts should be maintained and expanded if possible, with particular reference to such fields as international security, psychological warfare, civil affairs, and intelligence.

Increased emphasis should be placed on a positive program of executive development.

(g) Promotion.—The present promotion system, based on regular and systematic evaluation of employee qualifications, should be continued and strengthened. Adequate provision should be made for meritorious promotions. Foreign Service officers who develop occupational or area specialization should have promotional opportunities equal to those of "general officers". Executive ability should be given full recognition in selecting officers for promotion to positions of leadership and command.

(h) Pay and related benefits.—Salary differentials for service at hardship posts should be extended on an equal basis to all American personnel.

Legislation should be secured providing for an improved salary schedule and pay plan. The present separate schedules for the Foreign Service officer and Staff categories should be integrated into a single schedule which will reflect a reduction in the number of staff corps classes and an increase in the number of FSO classes.

Legislation should be sought to place permanent Foreign Service Staff personnel under the Foreign Service retirement and disability system to the extent that actuarial and related studies make this feasible. Except for purposes of disability retirement, future extra retirement credit for service at unhealthful posts should be eliminated when salary differentials for service at hardship posts are extended to all American personnel.

The Foreign Service leave system should be reexamined and consideration should be given to adjusting present leave benefits in the case of persons assigned to the United States to correspond more closely to leave benefits currently accruing to departmental employees.

(i) Selection-out.—A selection-out process should be retained for the Foreign Service and should be used to retire from the Service those who fail to meet performance requirements and those whose usefulness has become so marginal as to unduly inhibit the advancement of more able employees.

(j) Emergency provisions.—Provision should be made for the Secretary, whenever he determines an emergency to exist, to—

Recall any retired Foreign Service officer to active service.

Make temporary promotions in all categories of personnel.

Extend the period of service of a Reserve officer for an additional two years beyond the proposed five year maximum based on an extraordinary and compelling need in connection with a specific project.

Extend the period of service that an officer or employee of the Foreign Service may serve in the United States, not to exceed one additional year, based on an extraordinary and compelling need in connection with a specific project.

5. Additional improvements in departmental service personnel management

(a) Dual service positions.—Positions in the departmental service for which overseas experience is an essential or highly desirable qualification should be identified. To the extent that it is practical to do so these positions should be filled by persons possessing this qualification.

(b) Recruitment and selection.—Consistent with the difficulties imposed by the national mobilization effort and in the interest of building for the future, a maximum effort should be made to increase the employment of promising junior officers for the departmental service. In this connection, programs of intern training should be continued and strengthened in close coordination with entrance level requirements for the Foreign Service.

(c) Promotion.—Positive steps should be taken to develop an improved promotional system for the departmental service which will assure periodic evaluation of employee fitness for promotion.

(d) Training and career development.—Efforts should be made to develop further training and career-development programs for the departmental service. Legislation should be secured to enable departmental officers to receive training at Government expense in the same manner that Foreign Service personnel now receive training.

Increased emphasis should be placed on the Department's program of executive development, with particular reference to broadening the range of experience and competence of junior departmental and Foreign Service officers through training and work assignment rotation.

(e) Turn-over.—Efforts should be made to reduce voluntary turn-over of well-qualified personnel by improved placement and full utilization of employee skills and abilities.

E. GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS

Appropriate officers of the Department should be kept advised of progress toward achievement of the objective of an improved personnel system.

The Director of Personnel should arrange on an informal basis to obtain advisory assistance from other departments represented on the Board of the Foreign Service and from appropriate officers of the Department as will help him implement this directive. These arrangements should be considered as supplementary to (and not in lieu of) established procedures governing the advisory functions of the Board of the Foreign Service with respect to the personnel management of the Foreign Service. Maximum participation of other interested agencies in interagency bodies should be encouraged.

Employees should be kept informed periodically of important developments affecting their interests.

The continuing administration of the personnel program should be adjusted to conform to directives and instructions issued to implement the policies expressed in this directive.

The planning staff in the Office of Personnel should be strengthened to the full extent that this will facilitate the adjustments called for in this directive. This staff should include representatives of departmental personnel and of the Foreign Service and should consult with other Government agencies which rely upon the support of the Foreign Service abroad.

The limited legislation needed to accomplish the above improvements should be drafted and made ready for submission to the Congress no later than May 1, 1951.

TOWARD A STRONGER FOREIGN SERVICE: Report of the Secretary of State's Public Committee on Personnel (the Wriston Report), May 18, 1954¹

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE WRISTON COMMITTEE: Letter From the Secretary of State to the Chairman of the Public Committee on Personnel, June 15, 1954²

DEAR DR. WRISTON: I have received and carefully studied the report of the Public Committee on Personnel transmitted by your letter of May 18.³ At my instruction, the report has been printed and is being released today.⁴

I should like to commend the Committee for the thorough and penetrating manner in which its public-spirited members, under your chairmanship, have dealt with the very difficult personnel and administrative problems of the Department of State. It was the complexity and vital importance of these problems, most of which have been recognized—but left unsolved—for some years, that persuaded me to seek appropriate corrective recommendations from this group of outstanding private citizens.

I felt that this study could not be attempted while the Department of State and Foreign Service were undergoing the dislocations of the reduction-force necessitated by budgetary restrictions. With that obstacle removed, we could proceed. Accordingly, I share the view of the Committee that now is the time for action.

Department of State publication 5458 (1954). The report was submitted May 18, 1954, was approved by the Secretary on June 7, 1954, and was made public on June 15, 1954. On Mar. 3, 1954, the Department of State announced the establishment of a Public Committee on Personnel to study and advise on measures necessary to increase the effectiveness of the career service to meet the vastly increasing responsibilities in the field of foreign policy that had devolved on the President and the Secretary. Members of the committee included: Herman Armour, Foreign Service officer, retired, former Assistant Secretary of State, and former Ambassador; John A. McCone, president, the Joshua Hendy Corp., Los Angeles; Robert Murphy, ex-officio member, Deputy Under Secretary of State; Morehead Patterson, chairman and president, American Machine and Foundry Co., N. Y.; Donald Russell, president of the University of S. C., and former Assistant Secretary of State; Charles E. Saltzman, general partner, Henry Sears & Co., N. Y., and former Under Secretary of State for Administration; John Hay Whitney, senior partner in J. H. Whitney and Co., N. Y.; and Dr. Henry M. Wriston, president of Brown University. Dr. Wriston was to serve as chairman of the committee (Department of State Bulletin, Mar. 15, 1954, pp. 413-414). The Department of State announced on Mar. 5, that the committee's field of interest would include the basic organization of the Service and its strength; personnel management with particular reference to the improvement of recruitment, training, and career-development programs; and the requirement to increase public confidence and fortify personnel morale (ibid., p. 414).

Department of State Bulletin, June 28, 1954, pp. 1002-1004.

Ibid., p. 1004.

See Toward a Stronger Foreign Service: Report of the Secretary of State's Public Committee on Personnel (Department of State publication 5458; 1954).

I have been particularly concerned that the professional service, which bears the responsibility for carrying out the vastly intricate business of foreign affairs, has not expanded and broadened to meet the growing demands of today in the manner envisioned by the Congress when it passed the Foreign Service Act of 1946.¹ I am, therefore, particularly pleased that the Committee's recommendations not only embody an immediate program for strengthening this service, but also provide a long-range method of maintaining that essential strength.

As a first and fundamental step, I have today recommended, and the President has agreed to, the nomination of Mr. Charles E. Saltzman as Under Secretary of State for Administration. Mr. Saltzman, who served as one of the members of the Public Committee, is also a former Assistant Secretary of State. He will have the duty of initiating and directing the execution of this new program. Under my supervision he will also be in complete charge of the administrative offices and operations of the Department, and will, of course, have my full support in carrying out his mission.

Mr. Thruston Morton, with exceptional ability and devotion to public service, has been carrying the additional job of Acting Deputy Under Secretary for Administration. Mr. Saltzman's appointment will enable Mr. Morton once again to devote full time to his duties as Assistant Secretary for Congressional Relations. I am grateful to him for the administrative leadership he has provided during the interim period while the Committee was formulating its recommendations.

Mr. Saltzman believes, and I concur, that this new program can be fully launched and well underway by December 31, 1954, at which time the statutory authority for the position of Under Secretary of State for Administration expires, and at which time Mr. Saltzman intends to return to his business, from which he is taking a leave of absence.

I heartily endorse the two key recommendations made by the Committee:

A. Integration of the personnel of the Departmental home service and the Foreign Service where their functions and responsibilities converge.

B. The bold and imaginative recruitment and scholarship program whereby the Foreign Service would obtain a constant and adequate flow of qualified young men and women representing the best cross section of American life. Under this program, members of Congress would in the future have a part in selecting the candidates for the Foreign Service Corps, much as they now do for West Point and Annapolis.

I have issued instructions to initiate these forwardlooking recommendations. Specifically, I have taken the following actions:

By signing certain orders, I have accepted as valid your central recommendation that those officers of the Departmental home office and the Foreign Service who perform similar and related functions should be integrated into one personnel system. Such a system, as you point out, can fortunately be built, in large part, on the excellent existing statutory foundation of the Foreign Service Act of 1946.

I believe, with the Committee, that the national interest dictates the creation of a Foreign Service Officer (Fso) Corps that is more flexible and broadly versatile than at present. We must take into particular account the need for specialized skills in the solution of the increasingly complex problems of today. I have directed that this be done.

I have accepted the Committee's recommendation that a substantial number of Departmental positions, probably about 1,450, be designated for staffing by the Fso Corps, and that the present incumbents of those positions be encouraged to enter the new Foreign Service to serve at home or abroad, as the Department's needs require.

I also agree that all officer positions abroad under the Chiefs of Mission should be similarly designated, and members of the Foreign Service Reserve (Fsr) Corps and such of the Foreign Service Staff (Fss) Corps as presently hold those positions should likewise be encouraged to enter the Fso group.

I have endorsed the Committee's recommendations that a revised and liberalized examination process should be instituted to effect these transfers, which I expect will raise the strength of the Fso Corps from about 1,300 to nearly 4,000.

I have issued instructions to consult with appropriate members of the Congress regarding the Committee's report and its recommendations with the objective of putting into effect as quickly as possible the fundamental recommendations of the Committee related to the proposed integration program. I understand from your report that certain minor amendments to existing legislation will be necessary to carry out this program.

I have also directed that action be taken to seek legislative authority for the scholarship program proposed by the Committee. This program, providing for two-year scholarship awards to outstanding young men and women after competitive examinations, would insure the constant renewal of the Foreign Service from colleges in all parts of the country. It seems to me that the scholarship program is a most important and unique feature of the Committee's recommendations.

I agree with the Committee that Congressional appointment to the competitions for the majority of these scholarships is desirable, with the Executive Branch having an appropriate share.

Since the scholarship training program will require legislative action and, in any case, will take time to initiate, there is need for immediate and interim action. I am particularly gratified that the Committee considered this factor, and I have adopted the recommendations to modernize and speed up the examining and appointment procedures for Foreign Service officers of the beginning grade.

10. I have endorsed your recommended steps to insure that entering officers will be truly representative young men and women, from all sections of our country.

11. I agree with the Committee's analysis of the importance of the training function of the Foreign Service Institute in preparing our diplomatic officers for their tasks, and for inculcating in them the skills and knowledge so necessary in the practice of present day foreign affairs. To this end, I have accepted your recommendations for strengthening the Institute so that it will have a status more nearly equivalent to that of our war colleges, as envisioned by the Congress when it enacted the Foreign Service Act of 1946.

12. I am completely in agreement with the Committee's views on the importance of establishing a true career development system, especially as reflected in the training and assignment of the Department's personnel. Only through the existence of such a system can the Department attract and hold the highly qualified and dedicated body of men and women who must make up our professional service.

These, it seems to me, are the basic recommendations of the Committee, and they will be put into effect as rapidly as possible. There are, of course, a few other detailed recommendations dealing with personnel administration which require further study by myself and the other senior officers of the Department. I have in mind such suggestions as those concerning the inspection function, allowances and retirement benefits, and leave and salary adjustments. I shall see that this study is vigorously carried forward.

I am glad to have the Committee's endorsement of the Department's present effort to complete its security screening program as quickly as possible. We shall continue that effort, and shall equally, of course, continue to insure that this program is administered with the most careful fairness and objectivity.

Please allow me to express to you, and to the other members of the Committee, my appreciation of your efforts and my conviction that you have made a substantial contribution to the strength and future of the Department of State and its career service.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN FOSTER DULLES

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE WRISTON COMMITTEE'S RECOMMENDATIONS: Report of the Third Audit Meeting of the Public Committee on Personnel, December 13, 1955¹

Mr. Secretary:

in accordance with your request the members of your Committee have completed a third review of actions taken by the Department in carrying out your orders implementing our recommendations.² Deputy Under Secretary Loy W. Henderson³ and his staff presented a detailed review of developments since our meeting last February.⁴ We note progress toward the implementation of many of the recommendations in our report to you, and the supplemental suggestions following our second meeting. Mr. Henderson is to be warmly congratulated on a fine performance and on the initiative and untiring attention which he has shown in the crucial position which he holds. The Committee is gratified that, with the sympathetic interest of Congress, the Department has obtained much of the legislative authority required to meet its various recommendations.

Among the principal actions are the following:

Public Law 250⁵ authorized the appointment of three Deputy Under Secretaries of State, thus permitting the establishment of the position of Deputy Under Secretary of State for Administration.

The position of Career Ambassador of the United States has been created (P. L. 250, Sec. 4) and we note that steps have been taken which should shortly enable the President to name a few outstanding Career Ministers to that high position.

Section 821 of the Act of 1946 has been amended⁶ so that retirement annuities of Foreign Service officers may be calculated on the basis of the highest five years of service for which full contributions to the fund have been made. This action removes the former ceiling which we viewed as unjust; it gives more equitable treatment to See in this connection Department of State statement of Oct. 4, 1954 (ibid., Oct. 18, 1954, p. 570); statement by Secretary of State of Sept. 8, 1954 (ibid., Sept. 27, 1954, pp. 444-446); and address by Charles L. Saltzman, Under Secretary for Administration, on Sept. 10, 1954 (ibid., pp. 436-444). The second audit report, dated Feb. 26, 1955, was made public on Mar. 23, 1955, also as a "Departmental Notice"; ibid., Apr. 11, 1955, pp. 623-627.

officers of long service. Also of benefit is the provision which permits Foreign Service officers to choose whether they wish to receive the pay differential at a hardship post or credit for time and a half toward retirement. Provisions for education allowances for children of Foreign Service employees serving overseas and for a home transfer allowance give a much brighter aspect to the entire allowances structure in which the Committee has a continuing interest. The officers who did the necessary work to implement the authorizing legislation deserve commendation.

Section 413 (b) of the Act¹ has been amended to permit appointment of lateral entrants at any salary step within a Foreign Service officer class, thereby permitting transfer without diminution of salary. The results of this action on the rate of integration and in equitable treatment of officers being integrated are notable. Congress has established a ceiling of 1,250 (in addition to the first authorization of 500) on the number of lateral entrants who may be brought into the Foreign Service officer corps and has undertaken to review a request for added authority if the need should arise.

New Legislation:

The Committee has been asked for its views on additional legislation to amend the Foreign Service Act of 1946.

It fully supports the proposal for an increase in salaries of Chiefs of Mission and of the senior Foreign Service officer classes. It is likewise sympathetic to the Department's plans to request the Congress for authority to permit a modest number of additional lateral appointments (in the neighborhood of 100 to 125) to be made from among persons who were not on the rolls of the Department or the Foreign Service Reserve or Staff as of March 1, 1955, yet possess abilities needed in the Foreign Service.

Members of the Committee who have travelled extensively during the past year and observed conditions in foreign posts also stressed the need for additional facilities, most particularly housing and commissaries, recreational facilities, provisions for education and health for Foreign Service personnel and their dependents in hardship areas. We note that the Department is considering requesting authority and appropriations to proceed with improvements of this nature. We urge that these be pursued vigorously with the appropriate committees of Congress.

Foreign Service Positions:

After unusually careful consideration, the Committee noted with concern that several positions which had been designated as "Foreign Service" had, notwithstanding, been filled by persons with Civil Service classifications, who were either unable or unwilling to be integrated. This practice breaches the basic policy of the program, which was to cease staffing Foreign Service positions with Civil Service personnel and to transfer those who had not been integrated into non-Foreign Service posts.

The Committee notes that your directive as set forth in Departmental Circular #115, dated September 8, 1954,¹ read "With exceptions based on individual circumstances, Departmental officers holding 'Foreign Service positions' who are unwilling to transfer will be moved to 'non-Foreign Service positions' in the Department or assisted to find other employment. The Department will endeavor to minimize the disruption to the careers of such employees. Every effort will be made to complete this phase of the program within three years". The Committee now discerns a tendency not to pursue this directive with sufficient vigor. This was evidenced by the fact that very few persons classified in the Civil Service have been moved from Foreign Service positions into others still classified in the Civil Service. Further evidence indicated that nothing has been done to encourage those "unwilling" to transfer to find other employment. It seems clear to the Committee that the difficult problems in effecting so large a re-organization are sufficiently numerous under the best circumstances. They will most certainly be multiplied by the adoption of expedients which readily harden into routine practices and defeat the clear and explicit directive of the Secretary.

Age:

The problem of the application of age limitations to the transfer of lateral entrants has been of continuing concern to the Committee. The adoption of more liberal regulations by the Board of Examiners of the Foreign Service is, therefore, encouraging. These modifications should help to meet the Committee's apprehension that the previously more restrictive standards tended to perpetuate the duality in Foreign Service personnel administration which the present program is designed to eliminate.

Assignment and Career Development:

Career development is a field in which the Committee has had a long-standing interest and one which has particular significance for the future of the Foreign Service. Members of the Office of Personnel have outlined their views, their long-range planning and the steps which they have taken. It is evident that much time and thought has been devoted to the problem. Nevertheless a great deal remains to be done.

¹ Department of State Bulletin, Sept. 27, 1954, pp. 444-446.

The Committee has given close attention to the report of the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Personnel on the problems involved in sending to the field Departmental officers who have been integrated and in creating an even flow between the field and the Department without disrupting the work of either. It is fully convinced that this process will not proceed either at the pace that it should, as smoothly as it ought, or as effectively as it needs to, until the job analysis for each post has been put upon punch cards and the personnel characteristics, experience, skills and capabilities of each officer have also been put on punch cards, and put into active use.

Only when this is done will it be possible to make the swift and accurate assignments which are so essential to the smooth operation of so complex a process. We consider it essential that this should be put in the hands of some person of experience and skill charged with it not as a matter of marginal attention, but as his central responsibility; the process should be started without further delay. It would not substitute mechanical for personal judgment, but should help speed up and make more effective and economical a routine operation presently carried out laboriously by hand. This would facilitate more speedy personal judgments.

We are gratified to learn of plans to reappraise officers periodically for personnel purposes and to enable assignment officers to benefit from multiple rather than one man appraisals. With the growth of the Foreign Service there is need to improve and extend the information available to officers in charge of assignments. Without such information no career development system can be meaningful. A necessary corollary to this improvement of personnel information must be the selection and training of qualified officers for administrative work, for specialized economic tasks and for other specialized fields.

Man-in Motion:

The Committee was particularly happy to note clear evidence of increased effectiveness in the presentation of the needs of the Department to the Bureau of the Budget. It expressed the hope that these procedures will be still further strengthened in future presentations. We are greatly pleased also at the cooperative spirit manifested by the officers of the Bureau of the Budget toward Departmental requests.

At our last meeting we were impressed with the necessity for developing a realistic personnel and budget procedure in order to keep full post complements available at all times in Foreign Service establishments. We are informed that the Bureau of the Budget has recognized this need in principle. The Department's plans for its fiscal year 1957 budget would permit the assignment of replacements to positions designated as of special importance simultaneously with the departure for home leave and transfer of previous incumbents. We hope that when the next presentation to the Bureau of the Budget is made there [will] be further provision for the "full staffing factor"

Commitment:

We congratulate the Department on the impressive success of its writing program. It has resulted in more than ten times as many persons taking the written examination for the Foreign Service in 1955 than in 1954. This is clear evidence that the reputation of the Foreign Service among young people has been restored and they are anxious to make it their careers.

We note also that the new form of examination has produced substantially the same percentage of passing grades as the earlier examination, the figures for six years being:

1950	1951	1952	1953	1954	1955
20.2	22.79	22.4	20.8	20.7	19.7

The screening in the oral examinations is being carried forward vigorously. A somewhat smaller percentage of those who have passed the written examination are being accepted after the oral examination.

The wastage of prospective officers through security requirements continues to be negligible. From these observations the Committee concludes that there is no evidence of any deterioration of quality because of the revisions in examination procedures which have been instituted during the last 18 months.

As has been the case in the past and as the Committee hoped, no "specialized" preparation for the Foreign Service dominated the recruitment; indeed, those with the broadest and most fundamental educational programs showed the best percentages in passing the written examination.

However, we consider it important that the results of the examinations be continuously evaluated with a view to determining whether new procedures are producing not only the number but also the type of officer required to meet the needs of our representation abroad. The continuing reappraisal will pay worthwhile dividends and will assist in maintaining the momentum built up through the growing effectiveness in the colleges and universities of the rewarding possibilities of a Foreign Service career.

Applicants in Processing:

The Committee is seriously disturbed, however, by the present delay in processing applicants for the Foreign Service officer corps, particularly prospective FSO-6's.

Even with increased centers where the written examinations for entry into Class 6 may be taken, with the decentralizing of the oral examination process to various parts of the United States and with modification of the former requirement for full security clearance of applicants before oral examination, it still remains a fact that the completion of the appointment process is requiring a minimum of about six months. While it is realized that delay in many cases arises from unavailability due to military service or other causes, we believe that a determined attempt should be made to speed up this operation. The striking improvement in recruiting rests upon assurances that protracted waiting between examination and appointment would be remedied. Failure to carry out those assurances would impair the improved relationship with educational institutions.

Foreign Service Institute:

We are pleased with the evidence of the strengthening of the Foreign Service Institute. With the approval of the White House and the Secretary, the training plans of the Institute have been given high priority and the program has been expanded. Organization has been markedly improved, and the staff has been augmented both quantitatively and qualitatively. Junior and mid-career officer training courses have been instituted.

The Director of the Institute is to be commended on the devotion and imagination he has brought to his work. Three points, however, we would like to emphasize. First, the physical facilities remain unsatisfactory. In spite of energetic attempts to ameliorate the situation, the results fall short of providing the facilities such a high-level institution should have. Second, we reiterate our conviction that the Institute program should be greatly strengthened for the career development of senior officers. Third, the language program should be enlarged and made more readily available.

There are and long have been more full time language students enrolled in the Foreign Service Institute for a considerable period of time who come from the Air Force than from the Department of State and the Foreign Service. This means simply that the budget of the Air Force has for years provided enough persons so that when an officer is to be assigned overseas as an attaché there are replacements available to carry on while he spends many months studying a foreign language. This is wise and we commend the Air Force for the procedure.

It is obvious, however, that the Foreign Service has more need for foreign languages than the Air Force. Yet it has been so restricted in available personnel that it has not released adequate numbers of men from daily tasks to permit mastery of the language of the country to which they are to be assigned. We observe with satisfaction that the number is increasing and that requests in the next budget propose to increase it still further; we earnestly hope that this practice will continue to be developed.

We also feel strongly that the mere requirement that a person shall "pass an examination" in a modern foreign language before he is promoted to grade FSO-5 is inadequate. There should be a requirement that before he is promoted to Class 3 he should be given the portunity for further study, if necessary, so that he shall not have what knowledge he had but will actually be in fluent command of the appropriate language. In order to make this possible, however, our personnel must be found to permit releasing Foreign Service officers for study on a more comprehensive basis than heretofore.

With regard to earlier recommendations regarding the services which can be adequately and economically performed elsewhere on a contract basis we have noted that university assignments have been substantially expanded and that the Institute has plans for further expansion.

In connection with this and other developments within the Institute we are pleased to learn that the Department will reconstitute its Advisory Committee. In our judgment this Committee should be formed soon so that its advice may be available to the Institute and give it added prestige.

The Committee has at all times been aware of the Foreign Service's difficulties in finding needed specialists. It heard with particular satisfaction that arrangements are being entered into with the Department of Commerce for the exchange of some Foreign Service personnel with Commerce personnel and that a like arrangement has been made for the exchange of an officer with the Budget Bureau. This process is certain to promote better understanding of the problems of mutual concern. We hope this practice may be expanded so that it will facilitate the staffing of posts requiring specialists, particularly during the difficult transition period. We feel also that the problems of staffing which have been acute can be met by better use of the Foreign Service Reserve provisions of the Law of 1950.

In our discussion there was comment upon recent articles appearing in newspapers and periodicals critical of the Foreign Service and the Department. These have stressed faults or shortcomings to the correction of which your program was directed. These articles and letters have seldom taken cognizance of the new administrative program or the progress which has been made in its implementation. The Committee recommends urgently that ways be found not only to employ all the available facilities of the Department but also every other means to bring to the attention of the public the essential nature of the program and the steps which are in progress to carry out and the benefits to the Department and the Foreign Service which will ensue therefrom.

This Committee was appointed in March 1954 and has been in existence, at various times, for a year and two-thirds. Since our major report, in June 1954,¹ we have had three auditing sessions.

Toward a Stronger Foreign Service: Report of the Secretary of State's Public Committee on Personnel (Department of State publication 5458; 1954).

It was upon the suggestion of this Committee itself, when it made its original report, that you continued it in a consultative capacity in order to advise you as to progress in implementing those portions of the program which you specifically approved. The principles of the reorganization have now been established and much of the machinery for the implementation has been framed.

The Committee feels, therefore, that it ought not to continue in the capacity of "watchdog" unless, on thorough review by you and the officers associated with you, you are convinced there are positive reasons for so doing.

Passports

6. AUTHORITY OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE IN THE ISSUANCE OF PASSPORTS: Statement by the Department of State, May 24, 1952¹

1. The Secretary of State has discretionary authority in the issuance of passports, both as a power inherent in the exercise of the Presidential authority to conduct foreign relations and as a matter of statutory law.²

2. Various Secretaries of State have exercised the right to refuse passports or withdraw passports already issued. Various courts and attorneys general of the United States have rendered opinions in which the discretionary authority of the Secretary of State in the issuance of passports has been recognized. In an opinion of August 29, 1901, the Attorney General stated:

Substantial reasons exist for the use by Congress of the word "may" in connection with authority to issue passports. Circumstances are conceivable which would make it most inexpedient for the public interests for this country to grant a passport to a citizen of the United States. For example, if one of the criminal class, an avowed anarchist for instance, were to make such application, the public interests might require that his application be denied.

Without expressing any opinion as to whether a passport should be granted to Ng Faun, I advise you that it may, in your discretion, be granted or withheld.³

In the case of Perkins v. Elg, 307 U. S. 325 (1939), the Supreme Court, after holding that the Secretary of State should be included in a decree declaring the plaintiff to be a natural-born citizen of the United States, had the following to say:

The decree in that sense would in no way interfere with the exercise of the Secretary's discretion with respect to the issue of a passport but would simply preclude the denial of a passport on the ground⁴ that Miss Elg had lost her American citizenship.

3. For many years the Department has refused passports to persons for many reasons. For example, passports are denied when evidence in the Department's files shows that the applicant for the passport is a fugitive from justice or mentally ill or likely to become a public charge abroad, et cetera.

4. For many years the Department has also refused passports to persons when it had in its files clear evidence that they had, on previous trips abroad, engaged in political activities in foreign countries.

5. The Department reexamined its policy respecting the issue of passports to Communists and persons believed to be Communists and subversives after both the judicial and legislative branches of the ³ 23 Op. Atty. Gen. 509-511, at 511.

⁴ This phrase in the opinion of the Supreme Court as reported in 307 U. S. 325 reads "on the sole ground."

Government had made certain findings concerning the Communist movement in the United States. The U. S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, in upholding the conviction of the 11 leading Communists in New York, found that the conspiracy in which they were participants was a "clear and present danger to the United States."¹ The Congress of the United States, in the Internal Security Act of 1950,² made these findings: That there exists a world-wide Communist revolutionary movement, the purpose of which is by treachery, deceit, espionage, and sabotage to establish a Communist totalitarian dictatorship in countries throughout the world; that, due to the world-wide scope of the movement, the travel of Communist members, representatives, and agents from country to country is a prerequisite for the carrying on of activities to further the purpose of this revolutionary movement; and that individuals in the United States, by participating in this movement, in effect, repudiate their allegiance to the United States and transfer their allegiance to the foreign country which controls the Communist movement.

It was decided that, in view of the findings by the court and the Congress, it would be inappropriate and inconsistent for the Department to issue a passport to a person if information in its files gave reason to believe that he is knowingly a member of a Communist organization or that his conduct abroad is likely to be contrary to the best interests of the United States. This policy has been followed since February 1951, and, in view of the national emergency proclaimed by President Truman³ and the conditions existing in various areas of the world, it is believed that it should be closely adhered to.

6. A passport certifies to foreign governments not only the citizenship and identity of the bearer, but requests them to permit him safely and freely to pass and, in case of need, to give all lawful aid and protection. Possession of the passport indicates the right of the bearer to receive the protection and good offices of American diplomatic and consular officers abroad. The right to receive the protection of this Government is correlative with the obligation to give undivided allegiance to the United States. A person whose activities, either at home or abroad, promote the interests of a foreign country or a political faction therein to the detriment of the United States or of friendly foreign countries should not be the bearer of an American passport.

7. Passports are refused only on the basis of very clear and definite reports from the investigative and security offices of this Department and of other Government departments and agencies and from foreign governments containing well-authenticated information concerning past and present activities and associations of the applicant. The decision not to issue a passport or to withdraw a passport already issued does not represent the judgment of the Passport Division alone, but is reached after consultation by responsible officers of the Passport

Division with security officers, and political and administrative officers of the Department. This group varies according to the area or areas in which the applicant desires to travel. The decision is therefore the decision of the Department.

8. Any applicant who has been refused a passport has every right and is given every opportunity to request further consideration of his case and may present any evidence or information which he may wish to have considered. The particularity with which he may be informed of the contents of the reports in the Department's file depends, of course, upon the source and classification of such reports, but it is usually possible to inform him in a general way of the nature of the evidence and the information upon which he has been refused a passport. Any new evidence or information which the applicant may submit is referred to the officers who first examined the case for evaluation and expression of opinion as to whether a passport may be issued. The Department cannot violate the confidential character of passport files by making public any information contained therein.

9. The Secretary of State has the authority to establish any administrative procedures respecting passports which he may deem appropriate. These procedures are under constant review and a continuing effort is made to see that they are fair and efficient. There is a board in the Passport Division for questions of loss of nationality. The consultations between officers of the Passport Division and officers of other divisions of the Department and with the Foreign Service abroad, in effect, constitute in a given case a most fair and comprehensive board of review action in the denial of a passport in the interests of the United States.¹

7. REGULATIONS CONCERNING THE ISSUANCE OF PASSPORTS, AUGUST 28, 1952²

Pursuant to the authority vested in me by paragraph 126 of Executive Order No. 7856, issued on March 31, 1938 (3 F. R. 681; 22 CFR 1.177), under authority of section 1 of the act of Congress approved July 3, 1926 (44 Stat. 887; 22 U. S. C. 211 (a)), the regulations issued on March 31, 1938 (Departmental Order 749) as amended (22 CFR 51.101 to 51.134) are hereby further amended by the addition of new §§ 51.135 to 51.143 as follows:

Sec.

- 1.135 Limitations on issuance of passports to persons supporting Communist movement.
- 1.136 Limitations on issuance of passports to persons likely to violate laws of the United States.

Sec.

- 51.137 Notification to person whose passport application is tentatively disapproved.
- 51.138 Appeal by passport applicant.
- 51.139 Creation and functions of Board of Passport Appeals.
- 51.140 Duty of Board to advise Secretary of State on action for disposition of appealed cases.
- 51.141 Bases for findings of fact by Board.
- 51.142 Oath or affirmation by applicant as to membership in Communist Party.
- 51.143 Applicability of §§ 51.135 to 51.142.

AUTHORITY: §§ 51.135 to 51.143 issued under sec. 1, 44 Stat. 887; 22 U. S. C. 211a.

§ 51.135 Limitations on issuance of passports to persons supporting Communist movement. In order to promote the national interest by assuring that persons who support the world Communist movement of which the Communist Party is an integral unit may not, through use of United States passports, further the purposes of that movement, no passport, except one limited for direct and immediate return to the United States, shall be issued to:

(a) Persons who are members of the Communist Party or who have recently terminated such membership under such circumstances as to warrant the conclusion—not otherwise rebutted by the evidence—that they continue to act in furtherance of the interests and under the discipline of the Communist Party:

(b) Persons, regardless of the formal state of their affiliation with the Communist Party, who engage in activities which support the Communist movement under such circumstances as to warrant the conclusion—not otherwise rebutted by the evidence—that they have engaged in such activities as a result of direction, domination, or control exercised over them by the Communist movement.

(c) Persons, regardless of the formal state of their affiliation with the Communist Party, as to whom there is reason to believe, on the balance of all the evidence, that they are going abroad to engage in activities which will advance the Communist movement for the purpose, knowingly and wilfully of advancing that movement.

§ 51.136 Limitations on issuance of passports to persons likely to violate laws of the United States. In order to promote the national interest by assuring that the conduct of foreign relations shall be free from unlawful interference, no passport, except one limited for direct and immediate return to the United States, shall be issued to persons as to whom there is reason to believe, on the balance of all the evidence, that they are going abroad to engage in activities while abroad which would violate the laws of the United States, or which if carried on in the United States would violate such laws designed to protect the security of the United States.

§ 51.137 Notification to person whose passport application is tentatively disapproved. A person whose passport application is tentatively disapproved under the provisions of § 51.135 or § 51.136 will be tified in writing of the tentative refusal, and of the reasons on which is based, as specifically as in the judgment of the Department of State security considerations permit. He shall be entitled, upon request, and before such refusal becomes final, to present his case and all relevant information informally to the Passport Division. He shall be entitled to appear in person before a hearing officer of the Passport Division, and to be represented by counsel. He will, upon request, confirm his oral statements in an affidavit for the record. After the applicant has presented his case, the Passport Division will review the record, and after consultation with other interested offices, advise the applicant of the decision. If the decision is adverse, such advice will be in writing and shall state the reasons on which the decision is based as specifically as within the judgment of the Department of State security limitations permit. Such advice shall also inform the applicant of his right to appeal under § 51.138.

§ 51.138 Appeal by passport applicant. In the event of a decision adverse to the applicant, he shall be entitled to appeal his case to the Board of Passport Appeals provided for in § 51.139.

§ 51.139 Creation and functions of Board of Passport Appeals. There is hereby established within the Department of State a Board of Passport Appeals, hereinafter referred to as the Board, composed of not less than three officers of the Department to be designated by the Secretary of State. The Board shall act on all appeals under § 51.138. The Board shall adopt and make public its own rules of procedure, to be approved by the Secretary, which shall provide that its duties in any case may be performed by a panel of not less than three members acting by majority determination. The rules shall accord applicant the right to a hearing and to be represented by counsel, and shall accord applicant and each witness the right to inspect the transcript of his own testimony.

§ 51.140 Duty of Board to advise Secretary of State on action for disposition of appealed cases. It shall be the duty of the Board, on all the evidence, to advise the Secretary of the action it finds necessary and proper to the disposition of cases appealed to it, and to this end the Board may first call for clarification of the record, further investigation, or other action consistent with its duties.

§ 51.141 Bases for findings of fact by Board. (a) In making or renewing findings of fact, the Board, and all others with responsibility for so doing under §§ 51.135 to 51.143, shall be convinced by a preponderance of the evidence, as would a trial court in a civil case.

(b) Consistent and prolonged adherence to the Communist Party line on a variety of issues and through shifts and changes of that line will suffice, prima facie, to support a finding under § 51.135 (b).

§ 51.142 Oath or affirmation by applicant as to membership in Communist Party. At any stage of the proceedings in the Passport Division or before the Board, if it is deemed necessary, the applicant may be required, as a part of his application, to subscribe, under oath or affirmation, to a statement with respect to present or past membership in the Communist Party. If applicant states that he is a Communist, refusal of a passport in his case will be without further proceedings.

§ 51.143 Applicability of §§ 51.135 to 51.142. When the standards set out in § 51.135 or § 51.136 are made relevant by the facts of a particular case to the exercise of the discretion of the Secretary under § 51.75, the standards in §§ 51.135 and 51.136 shall be applied and the procedural safeguards of §§ 51.137 to 51.142 shall be followed in any case where the person affected takes issue with the action of the Department in granting, refusing, restricting, withdrawing, cancelling, revoking, extending, renewing, or in any other fashion or degree affecting the ability of a person to use a passport through action taken in a particular case.

Date of issuance: August 28, 1952.

For the Secretary of State.

W. K. SCOTT,
Acting Deputy Under Secretary.

8. RULES OF THE BOARD OF PASSPORT APPEALS, JANUARY 4, 1954¹

Pursuant to the authority vested in the Board of Passport Appeals by the Regulations of the Secretary of State issued on August 28, 1952 (17 F. R. 8013; 22 CFR 51.139)² and pursuant to the authority vested in the Secretary of State by paragraph 126 of Executive Order No. 7856, issued on March 31, 1948 [1938] (3 F. R. 681; 22 CFR 51.77), under authority of section 1 of the act of Congress approved July 3, 1926 (44 Stat. 887; 22 U. S. C. 211 (a)), the regulations issued on March 31, 1938 (Departmental Order 749) as amended (22 CFR 51.101 through 51.143) are hereby further amended by the addition of the following rules of the Board of Passport Appeals as adopted by the Board, and approved by the Secretary for incorporation as §§ 51.151 through 51.170 of Subpart B of Part 51 of 22 CFR:

Sec.

Sec.

- 51.161 Applicant's attorney.
- 51.162 Supplementary information to applicant.
- 51.163 Hearings.
- 51.164 Admissibility.
- 51.165 Argumentation.
- 51.166 Privacy of hearings.
- 51.167 Misbehavior before Board.
- 51.168 Transcript of hearings.
- 51.169 Notice of decision.
- 51.170 Probative value of evidence.

AUTHORITY: §§ 51.151 to 51.170 issued under sec. 1, 44 Stat. 887; 22 U. S. C. 211a.

§ 51.151 Organization of Board. The Secretary of State shall appoint a Board of Passport Appeals consisting of three or more members, one of whom shall be designated by the Secretary as Chairman. The Chairman shall assure that there is assigned to hear the appeal of any applicant a panel of not less than three members including himself or his designee as presiding officer, which number shall constitute a quorum.

§ 51.152 Decisions of the Board. Decisions shall be by majority vote. Voting may be either in open or closed session on any question except recommendations under § 51.140, which shall be in closed session. Decisions under § 51.140 shall be in writing and shall be signed by all participating members of the Board.

§ 51.153 Counsel to the Board. A Counsel, to be designated by the Secretary of State, shall be responsible to the Board for the scheduling and presentation of cases, aid in legal and procedural matters, information to the applicant as to his procedural rights before the Board, maintenance of records and such other duties as the Board or the Chairman, on its behalf, may determine.

§ 51.154 Examiner. The Board may, within its discretion, appoint an examiner in any case, who may, with respect to such case, be vested with any or all authority vested in the Board or its presiding officer, subject to review and final decision by the Board, but, an applicant shall not be denied an opportunity for a hearing before the Board unless he expressly waives it.

§ 51.155 Chairman. The Chairman, or his designee, shall preside at all hearings of the Board, and shall be empowered in all respects to regulate the course of the hearings and pass upon all issues relating thereto. The Chairman, or his designee, shall be empowered to administer oaths and affirmations.

§ 51.156 Prior administrative remedies. It is required that prior to petitioning for an appeal, an applicant shall (a) exhaust the administrative remedies available in the Passport Office, as set out in § 51.137, and (b) comply with the provisions of § 51.142, as a part of his application, if deemed necessary by the Passport Office.

§ 51.157 Petition. An applicant desiring to take an appeal shall, within thirty calendar days after receipt of the advice of adverse decision by the Passport Office, file with the Board a written petition under oath or affirmation which shall, in plain and concise language, refute or explain the reasons stated by the Passport Office for its decision.

§ 51.158 Delivery of papers. Petitions or other papers for the attention of the Board may be delivered personally, by registered mail, or by leaving a copy at the offices of the Board at the address to be stated in the advice of adverse action furnished applicant by the Passport Office.

§ 51.159 Notice of hearing. Applicant shall receive not less than five calendar days notice in writing of the scheduled date and place of hearing which shall be set for a time as soon as possible after receipt by the Board of applicant's petition.

§ 51.160 Appearance. Any party to any proceedings before the Board may appear in person, or by or with his attorney, who must possess the requisite qualifications, as hereinafter set forth, to practice before the Board.

§ 51.161 Applicant's attorney. (a) Attorneys at law in good standing who are admitted to practice before the Federal courts or before the courts of any State or Territory of the United States may practice before the Board.

(b) No officer or employee of the Department of State whose official duties have, in fact, included participation in the investigation, preparation, presentation, decision or review of cases of the class within the competence of the Board of Passport Appeals shall, within two (2) years after the termination of such duties appear as attorney in behalf of an applicant in any case of such nature, nor shall any one appear as such attorney in a case of such class if in the course of prior government service he has dealt with any aspects of the applicant's activities relevant to a determination of that case.

§ 51.162 Supplementary information to applicant. The purpose of the hearing is to permit applicant to present all information relevant and material to the decision in his case. Applicant may, at the time of filing his petition, address a request in writing to the Board for such additional information or explanation as may be necessary to the preparation of his case. In conformity with the relevant laws and regulations, the Board shall pass promptly and finally upon all such requests and shall advise applicant of its decision. The Board shall take whatever action it deems necessary to insure the applicant of a full and fair consideration of his case.

§ 51.163 Hearings. The Passport file and any other pertinent Government files shall be considered as part of the evidence in each case without testimony or other formality as to admissibility. Such files may not be examined by the applicant, except the applicant may examine his application or any paper which he has submitted in connection with his application or appeal. The applicant may appear and testify in his own behalf, be represented by counsel subject to the provisions of § 51.161, present witnesses and offer other evidence in his own behalf. The applicant and all witnesses may be cross-examined by any member of the Board or its counsel. If any witness whom the applicant wishes to call is unable to appear personally, the Board may, in its discretion, accept an affidavit by him or order evidence to be taken by deposition. Such depositions may be taken before any person designated by the Board and such designee is hereby authorized to administer oaths or affirmations for the purpose of the depositions. The Board shall conduct the hearing proceedings in such manner as to protect from disclosure information affecting the national security or tending to disclose or compromise investigative sources or methods.

§ 51.164 Admissibility. The Board and the applicant may introduce such evidence as the Board deems proper. Formal rules of evidence shall not apply, but reasonable restrictions shall be imposed as to the relevancy, competency, and materiality of evidence presented to the Passport Office's stated reasons for its decision and/or to the application of § 51.135 or § 51.136 to applicant's case.

§ 51.165 Argumentation. All argumentation shall be directed to the application of the passport regulations to the facts of the particular case. The Board will permit no oral argument or motions relative to the legality or propriety of the hearing or other procedures of the Board. Submission of such argument or motions will be confined to the filing of written briefs, objections, or motions to be made a part of the record. The Board will not undertake to consider any such motion or contention.

§ 51.166 Privacy of hearings. Hearings shall be private. There shall be present at the hearing only the members of the Board, Board's Counsel, official stenographers, Departmental employees concerned, the applicant, his counsel, and the witnesses. Witnesses shall be present at the hearing only while actually giving testimony.

§ 51.167 Misbehavior before Board. If, in the course of a hearing before the Board, an applicant or attorney is guilty of misbehavior, he may be excluded from further participation in the hearing. In addition, he may be excluded from participation in any other case before the Board.

§ 51.168 Transcript of hearings. A complete verbatim stenographic transcript shall be made of hearings by qualified reporters, and the transcript shall constitute a permanent part of the record. Upon request, the applicant and each witness shall have the right to inspect the transcript of his own testimony.

§ 51.169 Notice of decision. The Board shall communicate the action recommended under § 51.140 on all cases appealed to it, to the Secretary of State. The decision of the Secretary of State shall be notified in writing to the applicant. Such notice shall be given the applicant as promptly as possible after his hearing before the Board.

§ 51.170 Probative value of evidence. In determining whether there is a preponderance of evidence supporting the denial of a passport the Board shall consider the entire record, including the transcript of the hearing and such confidential information as it may have in its possession. The Board shall take into consideration the inability of the applicant to meet information of which he has not been advised, specifically or in detail, or to attack the creditability of confidential informants.

Adopted by the Board of Passport Appeals December 30, 1953.

Dated: January 4, 1954.

10. REFUGEE RELIEF ACT OF 1953,¹ AS AMENDED BY THE ACT OF AUGUST 31, 1954²

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the Refugee Relief Act of 1953.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 2. (a) "Refugee" means any person in a country or area which is neither Communist nor Communist-dominated, who because of persecution, fear of persecution, natural calamity or military operations is out of his usual place of abode and unable to return thereto, who has not been firmly resettled, and who is in urgent need of assistance for the essentials of life or for transportation.

(b) "Escapee" means any refugee who, because of persecution or fear of persecution on account of race, religion, or political opinion, fled from the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics or other Communist, Communist-dominated or Communist-occupied area of Europe including those parts of Germany under military occupation by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and who cannot return thereto because of fear of persecution on account of race, religion or political opinion.

(c) "German expellee" means any refugee of German ethnic origin residing in the area of the German Federal Republic, western sector of Berlin, or in Austria who was born in and was forcibly removed from or forced to flee from Albania, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Rumania, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia, or areas provisionally under the administration or control or domination of any such countries, except the Soviet zone of military occupation of Germany.

(d) "Administrator" means the administrator of the Bureau of Security and Consular Affairs established in the Department of State pursuant to subsection (b) of section 104 of the Immigration and Nationality Act.³

SPECIAL NONQUOTA VISAS; NUMBERS

SEC. 3. There are hereby authorized to be issued two hundred five thousand special nonquota immigrant visas to aliens, specified in section 4 of this Act, seeking to enter the United States as immigrants and to their spouses and their unmarried sons or daughters under twenty-one years of age, including stepsons or stepdaughters and sons or daughters adopted prior to July 1, 1953, if accompanying them.

ALLOCATION OF SPECIAL NONQUOTA VISAS

SEC. 4. (a) Special nonquota immigrant visas authorized to be issued under section 3 of this Act shall be allotted as follows:

(1) Not to exceed fifty-five thousand visas to German expellees residing in the area of the German Federal Republic or in the western sectors of Berlin or in Austria: Provided, That the visas issued under this paragraph shall be issued only in the German Federal Republic or in the western sector of Berlin or in Austria.

(2) Not to exceed thirty-five thousand visas to escapees residing in the area of the German Federal Republic or the western sectors of Berlin or in Austria: Provided, That the visas issued under this paragraph shall be issued only in the German Federal Republic or in the western sector of Berlin or in Austria.

(3) Not to exceed ten thousand visas to escapees residing within the European continental limits of the member nations of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or in Turkey, Sweden, Iran or in the Free Territory of Trieste and who are not nationals of the area in which they reside: Provided, That such visas shall be issued only in the area or areas mentioned in this paragraph.

(4) Not to exceed two thousand visas to refugees who (a) during World War II were members of the armed forces of the Republic of Poland, (b) were honorably discharged from such forces, (c) reside on the date of the enactment of this Act in the British Isles, and (d) have not acquired British citizenship.

(5) Not to exceed forty-five thousand visas to refugees of Italian ethnic origin, residing on the date of the enactment of this Act in Italy or in the Free Territory of Trieste: Provided, That such visas shall be issued only in the area or areas mentioned in this paragraph.

(6) Not to exceed fifteen thousand visas to persons of Italian ethnic origin, residing on the date of the enactment of this Act in Italy or in the Free Territory of Trieste, who qualify under any of the preferences specified in paragraph (2), (3) or (4) of section 203 (a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act: Provided, That such visas shall be issued only in Italy or in the Free Territory of Trieste.

(7) Not to exceed fifteen thousand visas to refugees of Greek ethnic origin residing on the date of the enactment of this Act in Greece: Provided, That such visas shall be issued only in Greece.

(8) Not to exceed two thousand visas to persons of Greek ethnic origin, residing on the date of the enactment of this Act in Greece, who qualify under any of the preferences specified in paragraph (2), (3) or (4) of section 203 (a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act: Provided, That such visas shall be issued only in Greece.

(9) Not to exceed fifteen thousand visas to refugees of Dutch ethnic origin residing on the date of the enactment of this Act in continental Netherlands: Provided, That such visas shall be issued only in continental Netherlands.

(10) Not to exceed two thousand visas to persons of Dutch ethnic origin, residing on the date of the enactment of this Act in continental Netherlands, who qualify under any of the preferences specified in paragraph (2), (3) or (4) of section 203 (a) of the Immigration and ationality Act: Provided, That such visas shall be issued only in continental Netherlands.

(11) Not to exceed two thousand visas to refugees, residing within the district of an American consular office in the Far East: Provided, that such visas shall be issued only in said consular office district and only to refugees who are not indigenous to the area described in this paragraph.

(12) Not to exceed three thousand visas to refugees, residing within the district of an American consular office in the Far East: Provided, that such visas shall be issued only in said consular office district and only to refugees who are indigenous to the area described in this paragraph.

(13) Not to exceed two thousand visas to refugees of Chinese ethnic origin whose passports for travel to the United States are endorsed by the Chinese National Government or its authorized representatives.

(14) Not to exceed two thousand visas to refugees who on the date of the enactment of this Act are eligible to receive assistance from the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East: Provided, That such visas shall be issued only in the area described in this paragraph.

(b) The allotments provided in subsection (a) of this section shall be available for the issuance of immigrant visas to the spouses and unmarried sons or daughters under twenty-one years of age, including stepsons or stepdaughters and sons or daughters adopted prior to July 1, 1953, referred to in section 3 of this Act, of persons referred to in subsection (a) of this section.

(c) Any allotments of visas provided in paragraphs (5) and (6), paragraphs (7) and (8), and paragraphs (9) and (10) of subsection (b) of this section, shall be available bilaterally within each of the three ethnic groups therein defined.

ORPHANS

SEC. 5. (a) Not to exceed four thousand special nonquota immigrant visas may be issued to eligible orphans as defined in this Act who are under ten years of age at the time the visa is issued: Provided, that not more than two such special nonquota immigrant visas may be issued to eligible orphans adopted or to be adopted by any one United States citizen and spouse, unless necessary to prevent the separation of brothers or sisters.

(b) When used in this Act the term "eligible orphan" shall mean an alien child (1) who is an orphan because of the death or disappearance of both parents, or because of abandonment or desertion by, or separation or loss from, both parents, or who has only one parent due to the death or disappearance of, abandonment or desertion by, or separation or loss from the other parent and the remaining parent is incapable of providing care for such orphan and has in writing irrevocably released him for emigration and adoption; (2) (a) who has been lawfully adopted abroad by a United States citizen and spouse, or (b) for whom assurances, satisfactory to the consular officer to whom a visa application on behalf of the orphan is made, have been given by a United States citizen and spouse that if the orphan is admitted into the United States they will adopt him in the United States and will care for him properly; and (3) who is ineligible for admission into the United States solely because the nonpreference portion of the quota to which he would otherwise be chargeable is oversubscribed by applicants registered on the consular waiting list at the time his visa application is made: Provided, That no natural parent of any eligible orphan who shall be admitted into the United States pursuant to this Act shall thereafter, by virtue of such parentage, be accorded any right, privilege, or status under the Immigration and Nationality Act.

(c) The assurances required in this section shall be in lieu of the assurances required in section 7 of this Act, and the provisions of section 7 (d) (2) shall not apply to eligible orphans as defined in this section.

ADJUSTMENT OF STATUS

SEC. 6. Any alien who establishes that prior to July 1, 1953, he lawfully entered the United States as a bona fide nonimmigrant and that he is unable to return to the country of his birth, or nationality, or last residence because of persecution or fear of persecution on account of race, religion, or political opinion, or who was brought to the United States from other American republics for internment, may, not later than June 30, 1955, apply to the Attorney General of the United States for an adjustment of his immigration status. If the Attorney General shall, upon consideration of all the facts and circumstances of the case, determine that such alien has been of good moral character for the preceding five years and that the alien was physically present in the United States on the date of the enactment of this Act and is otherwise qualified under all other provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act except that the quota to which he is chargeable is oversubscribed, the Attorney General shall report to the Congress all the pertinent facts in the case. If, during the session of the Congress in which a case is reported or prior to the end of the session of the Congress next following the session in which a case is reported, the Congress passes a concurrent resolution stating in substance that it approves the granting of the status of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence to such alien, the Attorney General is authorized, upon the payment of the required visa fee, which shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the account of miscellaneous receipts, to record the alien's lawful admission for permanent residence as of the date of the passage of such concurrent resolution. If, within the above specified time, the Congress does not pass such a concurrent resolution, or, if either the Senate or the House of Representatives passes a resolution stating in substance that it does not approve the granting of the status of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence, the Attorney General shall thereupon deport such alien in the manner provided by law: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not be applicable to any aliens admitted into the United States under the provisions of Public Law 584, Seventy-ninth Congress, second session (60 Stat. 754), Public Law 402, Eightieth Congress, second session (62 Stat. 6): Provided further, That the number of aliens who shall be granted the status of aliens lawfully admitted for permanent residence pursuant to this section shall not exceed five thousand.

ASSURANCES

SEC. 7. (a) Except as otherwise herein provided, no visa shall be issued to any alien under this Act unless an assurance, in accordance with regulations promulgated pursuant to this Act, shall first have been given by a citizen or citizens of the United States that such alien, if admitted into the United States, will be suitably employed without displacing some other person from employment and that such alien and the members of such alien's family who shall accompany such alien and who propose to live with such alien will not become public charges and will have housing without displacing some other person from such housing. The spouse and unmarried dependent sons and daughters under twenty-one years of age, including stepsons and stepdaughters and sons or daughters adopted prior to July 1, 1953, of such alien, shall not be required to have such assurances made in their behalf. The assurances shall be submitted to the Administrator and it shall be the duty of the Administrator to verify the authenticity and bona fides of such assurances and such assurances shall be subject to final acceptance and approval by consular and immigration officers. Blanket assurances, or assurances not submitted by a responsible individual citizen or citizens, shall not be considered as satisfying the requirements of this section. The assurances for employment and housing shall be indexed and filed in such manner so as to show the specific address or addresses in the United States in which both the employment and housing are available, the type of employment and housing which are available, and the conditions and terms of the employment. Each assurance shall be a personal obligation of the individual citizen or citizens giving or submitting such assurance. This subsection shall have no applicability to the alien eligible under paragraph (6), (8), or (10) of section 4 (a) of this Act, if such alien provides satisfactory evidence that he will not become a public charge. No visa shall be issued under the allotment of forty-five thousand visas heretofore made by paragraph (5) of subsection 4 (a) of this Act to refugees in Italy, or under the allotment of fifteen thousand visas heretofore made by paragraph (7) of subsection 4 (a) of this Act to refugees in Greece, or under the allotment of fifteen thousand visas heretofore made by paragraph (9) of subsection 4 (a) of this Act to refugees in the Netherlands, to an alien who qualifies under the preferences specified in paragraph (2), (3), or (4) of section 203 (a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, until satisfactory evidence is presented to the responsible consular officer to establish that the alien in question will have suitable employment and housing, without displacing any other person therefrom, after arrival in the United States. Verification of such available employment and housing shall be made in accordance with such regulations as the Administrator may, in his discretion, prescribe for the administration of the Act, including job order clearances by the United States Employment Service and its affiliated State employment services, and a certification by local housing authorities wherever they exist and are authorized and prepared to make such certifications.

(b) Any alien admitted under this Act and subsequently determined to have been inadmissible under the provisions of this Act at the time of entry shall, irrespective of the date of his entry, be taken into custody and deported in the manner provided by sections 242 and 243 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (66 Stat. 208-214).

(c) Assistance rendered an alien in connection with his transportation to and resettlement in the United States shall not be regarded as a cause for excludability as an alien likely to become a public charge. No alien with respect to whom assurances have been furnished as provided in this section shall be deemed to be a pauper under paragraph (8) of section 212 (a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (66 Stat. 182).

(d) No alien shall be issued a visa under this Act or be admitted into the United States unless he shall present to the consular officer at the time of making application for a visa or to the immigration officer at the time of application for admission (1) a valid unexpired passport or other suitable travel document, or document of identity or nationality, or other documentary evidence that he will be assured of readmission to the country of his nationality, foreign residence or in which he obtains a visa under this Act and (2) a certificate of readmission guaranteeing his readmission to the country in which he obtains a visa under this Act if it is subsequently found that he obtained a visa under this Act by fraud or by misrepresenting a material fact.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL ARRANGEMENTS

SEC. 8. The Secretary of State may, for the purposes of this Act, make such arrangements with foreign governments and with the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration as are necessary and appropriate for the purpose of financing the overseas transportation of persons who may be issued visas under this Act, such arrangements to be mutually beneficial to the economics of the United States and the countries concerned, as well as to such persons. Such arrangements, where appropriate, may seek to enable immigrants under this Act to transfer into dollar currency personal assets necessary for defraying the cost of transportation and for use in the United States. Arrangements between the United States and the other governments concerned and the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration should also provide for such cooperation and assistance as may be required in the administration of the program authorized under this Act in the territory of the intending immigrant's residence. All transportation by ships or airplanes of aliens under this Act to the United States, the cost of which is defrayed in whole or in part by the Government of the United States, shall be by ships or airplanes registered under the United States flag, if available.

SEC. 9. Within the categories established in section 4 of this Act the determination of the eligibility of persons to receive visas and the admissibility of such persons into the United States under this Act shall be made without discrimination in favor of or against race, religion, or the national origin of such persons.

EXEMPTIONS FROM VISA FEES

SEC. 10. Persons receiving visas under this Act shall be exempt from paying the fees prescribed in paragraphs (1) and (2) of section 281 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (66 Stat. 230-231).

CURRICULUM AND OTHER INVESTIGATION; EFFECT OF MISREPRESENTATION

SEC. 11. (a) No alien shall be issued a visa under this Act or be admitted into the United States unless there shall have first been a thorough investigation and written report made and prepared by such investigative agency or agencies of the Government of the United States as the President shall designate, regarding such person's character, reputation, mental and physical health, history and eligibility under this Act, and such investigations in each case shall be conducted in a manner and in such time as the investigative agency or agencies shall determine to be necessary.

(b) No person shall be issued a visa or be admitted into the United States under this Act if the consular officer or the immigration officer knows or has reason to believe that such person is ineligible for a visa or is subject to exclusion from the United States under any provision of the immigration laws or is not eligible under the terms of this Act.

(c) No person shall be issued a visa or be admitted into the United States under this Act unless the consular officer and the immigration officer, after an inspection and examination of such person abroad, are entirely satisfied upon the basis of affirmative evidence adduced by the applicant that the applicant has established his eligibility for a visa and his admissibility into the United States under this Act and under the immigration laws and regulations: Provided, That no person to whom a visa shall be issued shall be exempt from inspection and examination at a port of entry.

(d) No person shall be issued a visa under this Act or be admitted into the United States unless complete information shall be available regarding the history of such person covering a period of at least two years immediately preceding his application for a visa: Provided, That this provision may be waived on the recommendation of the Secretaries of State and Defense when determined by them to be in the national interest.

(e) Any person who shall make a material misrepresentation to any agency of the Government entrusted directly or indirectly with the administration, investigation, enforcement, or any other function relating to the implementation of this Act, for the purpose of gaining admission into the United States as an alien eligible hereunder, shall be excluded from admission into the United States under section 212 (19) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (66 Stat. 183).

PRIORITIES

SEC. 12. Priorities in the consideration of visa applications under this Act, except in the case of applications filed under paragraph (6), (8) or (10) of section 4 (a), without priority in time of issuance of visas as between such priorities or as between priority and non-priority cases under this Act shall be given to—

(1) Persons whose services or skills are needed in the United States, if such need has been certified to the Administrator, at his request, by the United States Employment Service and who are to be employed in a capacity calling for such services or such skills; and

(2) Persons who are (A) the parents of citizens of the United States, such citizens being at least twenty-one years of age, or (B) spouses or unmarried sons or daughters under twenty-one years of age, including stepsons or stepdaughters and sons or daughters adopted prior to July 1, 1953, of aliens lawfully admitted for permanent residence, or (C) brothers, sisters, sons or daughters of citizens of the United States.

SEC. 13. No priority in the consideration of visa applications under this Act shall be given to persons who were determined to be eligible or preliminarily eligible under the provisions of section (2) (c) of Public Law 774, Eightieth Congress, as amended,¹ solely because such persons were determined to be so eligible or preliminarily eligible.

PERSONS INELIGIBLE; OATH ON ADMISSION; PENALTIES

SEC. 14. (a) No visa shall be issued under this Act to any person who personally advocated or assisted in the persecution of any person or group of persons because of race, religion, or national origin.

(b) Before being issued a visa every alien eighteen years of age or older, authorized to be admitted under this Act, shall take and subscribe an oath or affirmation that he is not and never has been a person specified in subparagraph (A), (B), (C), (D), (E), (F), (G), or (H) of section 212 (a) (28) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (66 Stat. 184-186), except as provided in subparagraph (I) of such section, and shall be liable to prosecution for perjury if such oath or affirmation is willfully false. If any alien not entitled to be issued a visa under this Act and not entitled to be admitted into the United States shall nevertheless gain admission, such alien shall, regardless of the date of his entry, be taken into custody and deported in the manner provided in sections 242 and 243 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (66 Stat. 208-214).

(c) Any person or persons who shall knowingly violate, conspire to violate, induce or attempt to induce any person to violate any provision of this Act shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $10,000 or shall be imprisoned not more than ten years, or both.

APPLICABILITY OF IMMIGRATION AND NATIONALITY ACT

SEC. 15. Except as otherwise expressly provided by this Act all of the provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act (66 Stat. 163) shall be applicable under this Act.

LOANS

SEC. 16. Notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make loans not to exceed $5,000,000 in the aggregate, to public or private agencies of the United States for the purpose of financing the transportation from ports of entry within the United States to the places of their resettlement, of persons receiving immigrant visas under this Act, and who lack resources to finance the expenses involved. Such loans, which shall mature not later than June 30, 1963, shall be made under rules and regulations promulgated pursuant to this Act: Provided, That such loans shall bear interest at a rate of 3 per centum per annum on the unpaid balance from their maturity date until final payment. No public or private agency shall be eligible to receive a loan under the provisions of this Act while such agency is in default in the payment of any loan made to it pursuant to the provisions of the Displaced Persons Act of 1948, as amended.¹

ELIGIBLE ALIENS TO BE NONQUOTA IMMIGRANTS

SEC. 17. Any alien granted a visa under this Act shall be deemed a nonquota immigrant for the purposes of the Immigration and Nationality Act (66 Stat. 163).

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 18. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such funds as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act.

REPORTS

SEC. 19. The Administrator shall report to the President and the Congress on the operation of the program established under this Act on or about January 15 and June 15 of each year and shall submit a final report not later than June 15, 1957. Such reports shall include full and complete details regarding the administration of the Act and the administration of the funds provided for in section 16 of this Act.

TERMINATION

SEC. 20. No immigrant visa shall be issued under this Act after December 31, 1956.

PART I—PROGRESS REPORT

GENERAL STATEMENT

More than two-thirds of the life of the Refugee Relief Act of 1953, as amended,² has run its course. The original legislation was enacted by the Congress on August 7, 1953, with a specified termination date of December 31, 1956.

Of the 209,000 nonquota immigrant visas allocated by the Congress for issuance under the Refugee Relief Act of 1953, as amended, 73,331 visas have been issued worldwide as of December 31, 1955. Of this total, 77 percent were issued during 1955 and 49 percent from July 1, 1955, to January 1, 1956. Visas were refused or canceled on an additional 21,997 applicants. More than 107,000 applications are currently under active consideration. These pending applications probably will yield some 77,000 visas if the present rejection and cancellation rates continue. Procedures have been streamlined and paperwork cut considerably. There has been a substantial reduction in the period between the time an assurance is received by the Office of the Administrator in Washington and the time a final visa determination is made by the appropriate American consular authority abroad. Security requirements have been held at the level deemed necessary by the proper authorities to protect the best interests of the United States. Insofar as the factors are under the control of the Government, the program is prepared to issue as many visas as possible in each of the categories and in the areas authorized.

The refugee relief program is not a single program but a composite of different programs for diverse beneficiaries in various areas. Program prospects and status, therefore, are better viewed in the light of the various categories of beneficiaries in each area. Certain individual visa allocations will be, or have already been, reached. On the other hand, it is doubtful if allotments in other categories will be met. It is evident that, under existing circumstances, and barring unforeseen changes, considerably less than the authorized 209,000 nonquota immigrant visas will be issued by the termination of the refugee relief program on December 31, 1956. The graphic presentation given here (fig. 1) illustrates this fact. Figure I shows the current status of the program by section of the act in terms of visas already issued plus the potential yield from pending applications and shows quite vividly the extent to which additional assurances would be required for the issuance of the full allotment of visas.
